Y most Honoured Lords, Such is the indulgence of many men, especially Paper-wasters, to their owne imperfections; that when they are receiued with Fauour, and sometimes Pitie, they value them to bee iust such things, as the Mercy and Grace of those, to whom they were giuen, hath made them: And so, by the prosperitie of one fault, become confident to commit the second. I am afraid to be found in this Lift: that hauing about me a conscience of trespasse in my first Dedication of this TRANSLATION to your Honours, dare yet attempt you with the latter: All that will saue me in the Imputation, is, that I did then dedicate my selfe, with my vtmost abilities: From which, the fraileties that accompany Humanitie, Errors, are not easily separated. Yet, if in this second Edition they appeare lesse, either by my own industry, or the Printers, though not all found and weeded; that very study of bettering and hand-someing the VVORKE, will (I hope) commend both it and me, to your L.L. fauour: which Fauour (next to diuine Grace) I proclaime, claime, to haue beene the chearing meane, and inspiring power, enabling me to these, and more, that shortly couet the Light vnder your Honours names: At the foot of which two Pillars (may they be renowned as those of Gades) I haue written my Terme or Bound. There I wil stay, and contemplate your Virtue: which if in others breasts it finde Court, and Reuerence, in mine it hath Religion, and a Temple. And Iustice hath well provided, that such, who are not equall in Ceremonie, may yet be better in Deuotion: by how much the study of Truth exceeds that of Shew.

AN ADVERTISEMENT TO THE READER.

Gentlemen:

Hope you expect no long Apologie, either to recommend this Work, or to excuse my owne weakness. This French History hath beene a long probationer with you, & it seemeth you haue giuen it a good applause; for I heare, the Book-sellers shops are unfurnished. As for my defects, I confesse ingenuously that my Labors are unworthy of your reading. But your kind acceptance of my endeavors, haue giuen me courage to continue this presumption, hoping that if I doe not merit thanks for my Labors, yet I shall procure pardon for what you shall find amisse. The Printer desiring to bring this History the third time to the Presse, importuned me to continue it to these later times, wherunto I did the more willingly yeeld, being loath that any one should undertake my taske whilest God giueth me health and ability. I haue continued it from the death of the last French King Henry the fourth, vnto the last Peace concluded in the yere 1622. I haue not found Iohn de Serres nor Peter Mathew to translate, but haue collected it out of the best Authors I could get, which haue written of this Subiect: there is nothing of mine owne: I haue related euery thing plainly and truly without any passion, for the which my Authors shall be my warrant. I haue contracted some Articles in Treaties and Edicts, in the body of the History, but yet haue left the full sense: And haue omitted somewhat which was not proper to the History, but more incident to them that treat of points of Diuinity, else the Volume would haue bene immense, chargeable to the Buyer, and no great benefit to the Reader. I will plead no more for my selfe, but onely craue your kinde acceptance of the last Oblation which I sha<sup>ll</sup> offer you, being now almost out-worne with age and continuall toyle for the publicke; yet wishing that I may still liue in your remembrance, hauing spent a great part of my life,

To doe you service.

IOHN DE SERRES,

TOUCHING THE VSE OF THIS

his Inuentorie.

An History is the Theater of mans life, whereby all may learne one common lesson, by the goodly examples she represents vnto their eyes, eares, and understandings: Euen so shee inuities all men to view, heare, and to conceiue them well, what language foueuer shee speaks, what subiect shee treats of, what time shee notes, and what persons foueuer shee represents. Thus offering her selfe to all with this excellent vse, shee deserves iustly to bee imbraced, Experience verifying the testimonie which wise Antiquity doth giue her; That shee is the Mistress of mans Life, the Testimonie of Truth, the Recorder of Iustice, the resplendent Beames of Vertue, the Register of Honour, the Trumpet of Fame, the Examiner of Actions, the Comptroller of all Times, the Rendez-vous, of diuers Events, the Schoole of Good and Euill, and the Sovereigne Iudge of all Aden, and all Exploits. This praise is common to all Histories: But as in a generall action every one ought to haue a more speciall care of that which concerns his priuate duty: So in the generall History of all Nations, euery man is bound to bee more particularly informed of that which toucheth himselfe, and instructed in the managing of the State, vnder which he is borne: By reason whereof I haue alwaies held the complaint of Thucydides (one of the chiefe Architects of a History) very considerable, That it was a great shame for Grecians to bee Strangers in Greece; when as (buyling themselves in forreine Histories) they were ignorant of their owne. M<sup>y</sup> wee not in like manner say, That it is a great shame that Frenchmen should be Strangers in France? for why should the ignorance of our History bee more excusable in vs, then of theirs in them? Doubtlesse we often seeke for that a farre off, which is neere vnto vs at home. I commend the diligence of our men in searching out of forreine Histories: But if it may be lawfull to speake of this subiect (as one of the common sort) I dare say there is no Nason vnder the cope of Heauen (without flattering my selfe with the loue of my Country) since man was borne, that hath more admirable matters, or more worthy euents in euery kinde, and by consequence a History more memorable, then ours of France. Bee it for the forme of Gouernment: there was neuer Kingdome nor Common-weale established with goodlier lawes then our Monarchie. It is the true patterne of a perfect Estate, such as the wise Politicians in former times vied to discouffe of in their Academie. A soueraigne Commander, with Authority absolutely soueraigne, but fortified with a power so well qualified with the Counterpoise of inferior offices, as we may rightly call the French Monarchy, a mixture of all the lawfull governments of a common-weale, by a well gouerned proportion, if the lawes prescribed be well obserued, the which I haue (to that end) planted in the front of this building. Bee it for the greatnesse and strength of the State, although I know well that the foure Monarchies which commanded ouer Nations, had larger dominions then the French, yet was there neuer any Empire better vnitied, better grounded, nor of longer continuance, more famous for the beautie and bounty of the soyle, situation of the country, Riches of the people, and excellencie of wits, either in peace or warre. As for the greatnesse of her Provinces, what is the French Monarchie, but diuers Kingdomes vnited in one, and sundry Crownes annexed to one? But herein it excells the rest, that although they all in generall hold as it were of the Church, yet ours hath herein a more speciall priuledge, hauing diuerted from Europe that great deluge of Infidels, which threatned all Christendome with shipwrack. To conclude, it yeelds to no Monarchy whatsoeuer, neither needs it any thing but good husbandry. As for worthy men, which bee a liuing law, and as it were the soule of an estate, is there any nation whatsoeuer that can shew so many excellent personages, yea and Kings, as France may? There is no vanity more vaine, nor more vnworthy of a free minde, making profession of an History, wholly vowed to truth, then flattery. But the most strict Arcopagite that euer was, cannot deny, but our Monarchie may produce as many excellent Kings and Princes, as any other whatsoeuer. The three Races haue made thew in diuers seasons: But the third had the continuance of a more temperate, for the establishing of an Estate. Let iudgment be made by an vnpassionare tryall of their reignes and actions: to set downe Kings beautified with sundry graces, as neceffite required valiant in warre, wise for counsell, resolute in aduersitie, milde to pardon faults, when as forgetfulness was necessary for the good of the State, and the quiet of the Realme.

What shall we say of great and worthy euents, such as may chance to Man, being good or euill? Hath any History more rare examples then ours? eyther ordinary in the common suffrance of Prosperity or Aduersitie: or extraordinary in the greatest, and most tragically rare accidents that may be noted in any other Nation: there was neuer State reduced into greater difficulties, both within and without the Realme, and not subuerged: And in these extreme dangers, what valiant resolutions! Truly our History sets downe in diuers reignes, the courage and constance of diuers Kings and people: in shew conquered, in effect Conquerors: in that they neuer despaired of the Common-weale, in the midst of their dispaire:

The vse of this Inuentorie.

Excellencies remarkable in the miraculour pretensions
of this Estate,

what losse of Kings to their Subjects, and of Subjects to their Kings, in common calamities? Our Historie is full of examples; and of all things else considerable in the societie of Man, either in warre or peace- which depends vpon their vertues, which gouerne the helmes of this great Baske. But as wee cannot, hide, nor deprive of their due praise, these goodly lights which shine in diuers parts of our History, by the many examples of valour, equity, wilddome, magnanimity, modestie, dexterity, and other excellent vertues of our Kings; so to iudge thereof soundly, wee must flye to the Father of lights, who vnto these great and worthy personages for the building, preservation, or increase of this Monarchie, hath enriched them with great and precious graces, that acknowledging him the author of well of all these vertues, as of the happy successe of things managed by them, wee may learne to yield him homage, for the preservation, continuance, and increase of this great estate.

The negligence of our Kings hath too often brought our royall Diademe into danger, whereof they made themselves vnworthy, making it weak and contemptible in their persons, who (by their basenes and childish gouernment) suffered their seruants to command absolutely. The kingdomes hath bene as it were dismembred by the diuision of royall commands. And by this means brothers diuided by strange and elfe-wild difentions, haue abandoned all to spoyle: and from these home-bred diuisions, haue sprung ciuill warres, amidst the which, the Inferiours (sitting in a troubled water) freed themselves, and opposing against their Soueraigne, became perry Kings. Wee haue seene their rage extend farther, attempting against the Kings person, imprisoning him, forcing him to quit his crowne, and in the end reducing him to that extremity, as to dye desperately, seeing himselfe so oueragiously intreated withall. Wee haue seene Kings prisoners in their enemies hand, and abandoned by their subjects, Kings besieged in their houses. Wee haue seene a perry young man appointed to guide a ship (during the fury of a storme) without Helme, without Mast, without Sailes, and without Oares: beaten without by the tempest, and within by the Saylor: Seized on in his Cabin by mad men, imbrued with the blood of his most trusty seruants murdered before his eyes, yet euen in his bosome. Wee haue seene the Crowne of Kings in their minorities, set to sale by their Tutors, who became murderers, and of Regents, Theemes, making themselves Kings: Wee haue seene a King in his non-age become mad, gouerned by the passions of Men and Women, holding the chiefe degrees in state, which did strue to ruiue it with inbred factions, rages, and popular tumults, by tragical massacres, and furious hostilities. Wee haue seene amidst these combustions, the Stranger not only awaked at this brute, but also armed, entered within the Realme, and lodged within the bowels of the goodliest Prouinces. And (which is more) installed in the Kings authority by the Edict of a lawfull King, seated in the royall throne, hauing the Crowne on his head, with the Scepter and Purse in his hand, and a Daughter of France in his bed, for a pawne of this vniuersal pretension, a Sonne to warrant his possession, with the force and obedience of the Capitall City, and the first Princes of the blood armed with power and counsell to countenance these horrible confusions. Amidst these ruinous disorders of our Countrey, who hath preferred the realme of France, but hea that with one and the same hand, hath made both the law and the King of France?

O my Countrymen! it is to you to whom your History is directed, hauing the chiefe interest in the estate of our Mother, although Strangers are forced to admire it. But what? Our Ancestors haue seene all these things specified here, and represented in particular in the discourse I now offer vnto you. But I beseech you what haue wee seene with our owne eyes, within these thirty and five yeares? haue wee felt lesse misery, or found weaker remedies? What were our troubles, and to what extremity were we brought vnto of late yeares? By the conference of our History, with our Ancestors, ours serues as a Commentary for the well vnderstanding thereof, yet can wee not deny but our age hath seene things farre more extraordinary and miraculous: So as wee rightly may say, That wee haue liued in a time of Miracles. Without doubt our posterity will admire in particular the History of our time, as the rarest part of the whole body; wee that haue seene it, should often bely our eares and eyes in reading or hearing it, when she shall appeare in publick to put vs in minde of that whereof wee were eye-witnesses, and therefore witnesses about all exception: But euery thing must be done in order and time. Behold the first part of my designe, which is behouous you to observe: S H A L L I T then bee in vaine; and without any fruit? it is not my intention, if the end of euery commendable enterprise bee the vs: Shall wee thinke that the knowledge of our ancient Estate is vnprofitable, and in a time when as wee haue so great need of consolation? Truly in the continuance of our long calamity, wee must needs bee oppressed with a troublefome care. But in feeling the paine, why seeke wee not the remedie? If wee often apply the example to things wee doe euer without Law or against the Law, how much more should it auaile vs being ioynd with Reason? An example rightly represented in the History of our Ancestors, serues vs now as a good guide to comfort vs, whereas as the like misery is common to vs and them. And if it please God to make vs like in condition, what reason haue wee to complaine? At the least wee may therein observe, that not at this time alone France is afflicted, and hath shewed her indiscretion. So likewise by the same reason, it is not now alone that shee hath felt the succours of her Protector, who preserues her, amends her follies, and repairs her defects: without this protecting hand, shee had long since perished. What shall wee then say? truly wee were much too blame to accuse our Fathers, and seeke to excuse our selues of the like or greater errors: our waywardnesse were not pardonable, if our hearts should faint in these difficulties, seeing that wee learne in the same Historie, that our Fathers haue bin deliuered from the like afflictions. It is therefore a speciall vse of this Historie, to cast our eyes vpon the condition of our predecessors, to mollifie our languishings,

The speciall vse
of this History.

The vse of this Inuentorie.

guishings, as a necessary symptome of our inciuill warres, which like a continuall feuer hath sucked (euen to the marrow) all the vigour of this Estate, and hath not yet left it.

Wee must accuse our impatience and nicenesse, if we shall complaine to haue bin worse intreated then our fore-fathers, seeing we obtrude in them the like afflictions. Experience layes goodly grounds to reason, this certaine experience ingenders in our hearts hope of future things, without confusion or deceit. Doe we not then reape excellent fruits of this Historie? if by the deliuerance of our Fathers wee conclude and hope for ours, but in such sort, and at such times, as the wise prouidence of God hath appointed; which ordinance, neither Enemies can hinder, nor Friends aduance: and therefore the direction of this truth doth teach vs to faile in this sea, euen one as he ought, according to his degree, expecting a happy harbor by the bounitie and wilddome of him that rules the waues of humane confusions, as the Ioueraigne Iudge, holding in his hands both the hearts of men, and the euent of things. Doe we grieve at our long trouble? Let vs reade the reignes of John, Charles the first, Charles the sixth, and Charles the seventh. Doe wee repine at our late losses? let vs reade the reignes of Philip of Valois, and wee shall see that the losse of the same city was dearer to him then to vs. As wee may neuer dislembe our losses, so is there a time to losse, and a time to gaine; if in our houses in the countrey or city, all things succeed not as we desire, who can with reason require alwayes the like successe in a State? To conclude, if to flatter the disaite be no means to cure it, or to complaine, without remedie, (seeing that chollier and despair brings no help to the disaite) let vs rather seeke for remedie, then increase the disaite by a bootlesse complaint. If we will for peace abroad, let vs lodge it first in our hearts at home. This inward peace shall be a good warrant for the general; but wee are very sicke, if we thinke by waywardnes and hurie to cure the disaite. If then wee seeke any found cure for our griefs, the Apothecaries shop is open, behold some preparatiues. But what is that in regard of the serious reading of the History it selfe, as necessary at this day for French-men, as necessary doth force vs to seeke for consolation?

I haue endeauored therefore (my countrymen) to trace out some slender obseruations for you in this little worke, grossly such as I could: I see it is not according to the dignitie and greatnes of the subject, (worthy in truth of a good writer) but rather fit for that obscure age, when the most ancient Druides had a maxime, not to write at all, or of those which haue left vs these small abridgements, the which wee now vie for want of better: and without doubt, if our History had encouraged such spirits as the Greeke and Latin did, it had bin nothing inferior to any of them, in beauty and profit. This is the only cause why our countrymen haue not read our History, hauing not enjoyed the light of excellent writers, to represent her in her liuely colours, according to her worth. And although our France hath heretofore had cause to complaine in this respect, yet now that fault is partly repaired, by the industry of some that strue to plant and beautifie it.

Amongst such as haue labored in this subject, De Haillen in my opinion exceeds all others, and deserves immortal commendations, hauing so happily cleared these growne bushes, and made so plaine a path in this obscure Forrest: if I eale to do my countrey service, and hope by my example to awake the learned to do better, were not my iust excuse, where should I hide me from the blemish of inconsiderate rashnes: especially being in this citie of Paris, not only the capitall City of France (the fertile mother of good wits) but also the Rendez-vous of the greatest miracles in the world. I will therefore speake freely, that in presuming to beautifie this Historie, I haue taken for the only object of my aime, To secke the truth with the vse thereof, and to giue you some cause of content. Regard not my tongue, I offer you the simple truth without painting, the which I haue curiously searched for in many good Bookes, which my necessitie abroad here hath giuen me means to obaine, and the desire I haue to serue you, occasion to imploy them, for as I am wholly vowed to the publike, so will I yield an account not only of my idleness, but also of my employments, I haue therefore resolved to undertake a labour that should not bee vnprofitable, in preparing you a way to learne your Historie in the originals, with lesse paine and more profit. I doe therefore call this my endeauour an INVENTORIE, by the direction whereof, you may see the body and euery part at your pleasure. If I may perswade the Reader to conferre this my labour with the writings of others vpon this subject (both old and new) I shall not then need to put in caution, but be of an assured hope to obtaine a testimonie of my fidelitie: and it may be in time, of some diligence, at the least I bring nothing, that hath not bin well purified and applied to the vse. The fruit depends on the blessing of God, by the iudgement of such as shall read mee, I will protest only for that which doth concerne my selfe: I haue vied the Rule, Square, Lead and Compasse, to obstrue proportion both in stile and subject, that in my course I might direct you to the very truth; if it bee with that light and breuitie I pretended, I shall haue cause to thanke God, and to labour in some subject of greater moment, yet I haue done my best endeauour that the learned may supply my defect, in doing better. The course is open, euery one may run it. I leaue the prize to them that shall do best, my intent was only to profit the publike: and therefore I bring not an Abridgement, but an INVENTORIE. I haue searched the very Springs of such as went before me. The first haue not hindered the second: and why should the second take it ill to be followed by others? One kinde of meate may be diuently seasoned to good purpose. A small Dyal marks the houres in like proportion to a great Clock: It is one of my wishes, that this goodlie subject may be set to open view, that the learned may trine to exceed one another, and leaue no excuse for our Frenchmen to be any more strangers in France, making the way ealie and profitable: If in this respect my zeale and integritie may be approued of my Country, why should I repine the employment.

My end and purpose in this labour.

of some houres in so goodly and worthy a worke, as a testimonie (at the least) that I desire to discharge my duty?

The occasion of this History.

To conclude, my Countrymen, I must not conceal from you the chiefe cause that induced mee to compile this worke. About fixe and twenty yeares since, I was thrust forth vpon the Theater, (being very young) to represent the History of our miseries: the desire of forraine Nations began this deligne, being curious to vnderstand a particular relation of our Tragedies. By reason whereof I presented this my first worke in Latin, that Strangers might vnderstand it. I held it for an Abhorrie, and esteemed the losse but light, yet was the successe greater then my proiect, for being embraced by the publike beyond desert, it hath so increased, as of one Booke there are made fifteene, and corrected with diuers impressions. And as the child increased, so the Father had meanes to doe him good. GOD suffering mee to liue to be a witness of great accidents, not onely as many of my Country-men, that (see the danger from a safe Port, but imbarked in full Seas amidst these common tempests: for being employed in some and no small affaires (both within and without the realme) I had the Honor to be admitted into Kings and Princes Cabinets, to manage publique causes of Prouinces, and to conferre with the heads of Parties, to learne from their owne mouthes, and from others that had authority and employement vnder them, the Truth of all that passed: so as being able to giue a reason for many things which I had sene, I may likewise giue an account of most that hath passed, by the proceedings and instructions of both parties. I will adde to this opportunitie the priuate deuotion which hath alwayes held my minde inclined to this care, to gather together whatsoever was done, when as necessity of affaires thrust mee into employments: and this my desire succeeded so happily, that both great and small haue fauorably imparted vnto mee whatsoever might benefit concerning this subiect. So as I haue made a iust collection of all the substance, that may serue for the building of a perfect Historie, from the beginning of the troubles to this day. The end of this painfull labour depends of him from whom proceeds the euents of all our prayers. To him therefore I referre my selfe, protesteing onely of that which is in mee. As therefore I aduow my selfe both Debtor of this worke and Author of these Bookes, which wander among men: so I protest the fault shall not be mine, if all turne not to the publike good, where vnto it is appointed, as by the order shall be found most expedient. And expecting an end of this great masse, my intent was onely (as may easily appeare by the Table of the third Race) to set before your eyes (as in one Map) a Summarie of the ancient History, very necessary for the vnitng and resemblance of that which hath happened in our time. But the iudgement of my learned friends, hath made mee to take a new course, that the length of so tedious a payment might not bee troublesome vnto you, in giuing you the whole History vnto this day, fashioned of this meane and bafe stature, whereof I now offer you this first Part, as a Patterne of the whole peece, imbarcking my selfe from the maine land in this tempestuous Sea, which must needs bee fearful vnto mee, both by the feeling of mine owne weaknesse, and the apprehension of diuers iudgements, as the Ebbing and Flowing of the Ocean. I durst not hazard all this small modell at one voyage. Goe forth my first parcell, and seeke thy fortune, learne by the Chapmen, how the Market goes, that by thy successe, I may resolute with lesse danger to Ship the rest, the which in the meane time shall attend (in a safe Harbor) the winde of your fauourable consents.

A PLOT OR DESIGNE OF THE WHOLE HISTORIE

My meaning is to represent in this Discourse, what is most remarkable in the History of FRANCE, and (with a simple, faithfull, and lively breuitie) to report all that hath succeeded in the French Monarchy, worthy of memory, to make our Frenchmen see a modell of this great building, reducing it to the first foundation, according to the proportion of the subiect, and the order of times, the certaine light of truth, and by the changes of the greatest and most famous foraine States; to the end, that this our Inuentory may serue the learned for a memorialis, and learners for a direction: The enterprise is not small, although the worke be little, but as it must be valued by the fruit, so the proofe will appeare to such as shall vouchsafe to read what my desire was able to performe. And for a ground of this goodly and excellent History, so worthy of knowledge, wee must set downe in generall termes what shall be handled in the particular throughout the whole Discourse, and lay before our eyes (as in a Table, by the most cleare and soundest proofes that may bee drawne from likelihoods of so obscure antiquitie) the beginning and continuance, with the greatest appearance of Truth, the increase, with the diuers euents and successe of this State such as now it is.

It were to seeke truth in vanity, following the common error, to search for the originall of the French, in the ruines and ashes of Troy, or in the Fennes of Meotides; for in the most ancient Histories of the Trojans, there is no mention of Francus, or Francion, Iones of Hector, who had but one sonne, named Astianax, slaine at three yeares of age in the sacke of Troy. There is also no likelihood to finde the stemme of our French Nation in the fennes of Meotides, where they were first called Sicambres, hauing built a City by imagination named Sicambria: and that they issued from thence in great troops. There is no more proofe that they are come from these marshes, then from the deserts of Affrike. It appeares the Sicambrians were a different people from the French, and that the walls of Sicambria are yet to build. But the new presumption of a certaine writer is yet more admirable, who comes from farre to aduertise the French of their originall, the which hee finds be: and the Moore, and with so great an assurance as hee sets downe name by name the Kings of the house of Sicambria and of France, their race, manners, deeds, aduentures, and that in so good earnest (as reporting a thing but of yesterday, or as being a Counsellor to these supposed Kings) seeming with reason to apprehend such as will not take his word for present payment, vnder the authoritie of certaine old Registers produced by him, wherein he names these Kings one after one, like in presumption to the Castilians, the inuents of the fabulous History of Amadis: or the deniers of the off-springs of the Panim Gods, or of the Romant of the Rose, hauing forged names as their pleasure. Learning therefore all these Diuinations and Fepperies, let vs search (as neere as we may) what is most likely by the traces of truth, vntill it may guide vs to firme land, not plunging our selues any further in the boggs and unknowne deserts of an imagined Antiquity.

What then? doubtlesse wee shall now where finde a more certaine originall of our French Nation then in Germany. This is most apparant; Franconie beares yet the name of the old inhabitants, and the markes of their ancient possessions: the Cities of the one and the other side of the Rhine are full of their Antiquities. We can no way doubt by these markes, but they haue inhabited in these parts, and it is likely they were dispersed betwixt the Rivers of Rhine and Danubius, vnto the Ocean. Whether they had their beginning there, or came from any other part, it auails not to dispute, seeing the search is altogether vnprofitable, for that indeed it is impossible.

The deriuation of the name is very difficult, being wholly unknowne to the first Antiquity: for we read not in any ancient Histories of the name of Frenchmen among the Nations of Germany, yet carefully obserued by the most ancient. But who see not the change of ancient names to new? Alemagne is now called Germany: Helnetia, Suisse: Britaine, England: without seeking vnecessary proofe in so apparant a matter. The French therefore being an ancient people of Germany, haue changed their name with the whole country vpon diuers subiects, but when, how, by whom and wherefore, it cannot be certainly defined, but by coniectures, more easie to be refused then maintained. It appeares onely that France is a German word, which signifyeth Free, and that their ancestors either hauing shaken off the yoke of the Romane seruitude, and recovered their ancient liberty, or remaining free amongst so many neighbors subiect to that great Empire, were called Frenchmen in token of their liberty.

The French are come out of Germany.

Of the name of Frenchmen.

A Plot or Designe

There are learned men which write that France was the name of a Community of divers people, assembled and united together, to preserve their liberties, having taken that name as a mark of their generous resolution, and not of any certain nation: although Tully (a witness above all exception) notes the name of Francos among the nations of Germany, which had offered obedience to the Romans, whilst their common-weale flourished, before the Empire began, which shews that we cannot talk of so obscure Antiquity but doubtfully, so as it is hostile to pronounce Oracles, upon a subject so disputable. Truly to reverse the first memories of their name to the Empire of Valentinian, and the beginning of their liberty to the defeat of the Alans, and to the bounty of this Emperor, having freed them in recompence of so worthy a service: that were to make a leap of above an hundred and thirty years, to confound things, and to be ignorant of the estate of our Ancestors, who at the time of this memorable defeat, did in nothing acknowledge the Romans; But rather for a particular fruit of the victory gotten by them in common with Valentinian, they had possession of a great part of the Gaules, not holding it of any but of their sword, nor doing homage but to their own valor. It were (in briefe) not to have observed the originals of true Histories. Seeing then the ancient habitation of the French was in that part of Germany which lay neerest unto Gaule, who can with reason deny but they are issued from thence, and that in taking Gaule they made it to change both Maister and Name. This is in briefe what may be spoken with most apparancy of truth, concerning the original of our French Nation, if we will not urge more then may well be insisted.

By what means and when they ruined Gaule.

As for their estate and government, there is great likelihood that it was a great Nation grown warlike by means of defending themselves, and succouring others with their own forces. I add that they were led and commanded by a King, for the most ancient Histories represent them under a royall authority, as I will shew elsewhere. Doubtless they had no means to build this great Monarchy in Gaule without force and order, yet did they not erect it all at one instant, but step into Gaule sundry times, either employed to succour the Romans, or they themselves, seeing their fortune, and good adventures: and as they grew familiar by divers summonings, so they got footing by little and little, untill that having not only expelled the Romans, but all other tributary Lords, they became Masters and possessors of this goodly country: so this Monarchy was built upon the ruins of the Empire, and the end of the one, was the beginning of the other. The Romane Empire had not only seized upon all Gaule as the eye of Europe (having reduced it into the forme of Provinces) but did long enjoy it by their Governors and Lieutenants Generall. This authority and Romane power was in a manner dispersed over the whole world. But as this Empire was framed of divers pieces, and built by iniustice and tyrannie, so God (a just iudge and revenger of iniquities) raised them up great and powerfull enemies from all parts of the world, as it were hired to tear in sunder this Cloake, to dismember this body by piecemeals, and to punish their unwill rigour, by a barbarous cruelty, and their greedy iniustice, by the ravishing extortion of others. The Empire then which had robbed was sacked it selfe, and having taken anothers goods, lost their owne, being scarce able (and that by means of the French) to retain any shew of this great and vast body. The fury of Mahomet invaded Asia, and Affricke, with a part of Europe, like a violent flame, with an incredible swiftnesse. Spaine was seized on by the Vandales, Alans, Sueves and Gothes: Italy by the Vandales, Hunnes, Gothes and Lombards: Gaule wanted not sundry guests, the Gothes seized on that goodly Gaule Narbonnoise, called for the excellency a second Italy: and left their name to this goodly Province, which they enjoyed long, and called it by their name, first Gothia, and after Languedoc, as it were the language of Gothe, although they give other reasons of this name more subtil then true. The Bourgognons seized of the country which they called by their name Bourgongne, and erected a Kingdome which contained the one and the other Bourgongne with the Provinces of Lionnois, Dauphine, Sauoy and Prouence. The Normans, Brittons, and Picts, took every one their ticket, to lodge in Gaule, according to the divers occurrences of affaires which presented themselves in this generall disposition of the Romans Empire, who amidst these confusions did with great difficulty retaine the least portion: knowing not how to oppose themselves against so great and victorious enemies. So the French having likewise in the beginning seized on their quarter, were so favoured by the providence of God, that through their valour they laid the foundation of a new estate, so as having expelled out of Gaule, both the old and new usurpers, in the end they became masters, and built this goodly Monarchy, the which since hath given a law to neighbour Nations, seized the Romane Empire, swept the violence of these cruel & barbarous nations, & (which is the greatest honour of this State) hath maintained the Christian Church in Europe, the which God hath appointed for an habitation amidst the furious confusions of Asia and Affricke, where the deluge of Mahometes blasphemies hath horribly exceeded: wherein the greatnesse and power power of Gaule is to be admired, by the which Iulius Cæsar could first alter the common-weale of Rome, his country into the new forme of an Empire, and after, when as all the most furious nations did flocke together to cast downe this great Maister, Charlemagne with the same force could preserve a great part of the West from that cruell shipwracke which had ruined all the East. And as this spoile was not general at one instant over all Gaule, but by fits like unto a River which takes her course in a new quarter, so the French Monarchy was built by degrees: The French being first employed by the Romanes for their valour in notable occasions. We begin to read of their name with some shew and state, under the Empire of Gallienus, about the year of Christ two hundred and seventy. Posthumus gouverneur of Gaule armed them against his Maister and with the helpe of their forces, and the consent of the Gaules, hee enjoyed Gaule the space of seven years, with the stile of Emperor. It is likely this first abroad caused them to taste the fertile sweetnesse of this goodly and rich country. Thus both the example of Posthumus and the proofe of their owne forces gave them courage to attempt for themselves. We read that under the Emperors Aurelian, Probus, Dioclesian, and Constantius father to Constantine the Great, they have often returned without any other subject then to seek their advantage: so were they often repulsed by the Romans with great losse.

These fruitlesse striuings might well have cooled the heate of their attempts, but not their desire to seek for meanes: but they continued most obstinately their practice in armes, and maintained their reputation even with the Romanes themselves, who were glad to have them for friends, and to employ them in their warres, as Constantine against Licinius a great enemy to the Christians: and Constantius his sonne against the Germanes, and Iulian the Apostata, against the Persians. Truly armed the History of the Church, as S. Hierome in particular (one of the most famous Doctors) speaks of the French as of a very renowned people, who might both hurt and helpe, by their multitudes and the valour of their Armes. The style of this designe, which I have undertaken, doth only note the thing for your understanding, without spending time in longer proofes. This apprenticeship of the French by their many voyages into Gaule, continued a hundred and thirty years, for so much it was from Gallienus to Honorius, under whom they began to set footing into Gaule, upon this occasion. Those of the City of Treues tyred with the tyranny of the Romanes, were infinitely grieved that Lucius their governor a Romane, had by force taken the wife of a notable Citizen. This excess ministred a subject to call the Frenchmen to their aide, who expelled the Romanes, seized quietly on the City with the consent of the inhabitants, and so proceeding in their conquest they possessed their neighbour Countries, and in time became Masters of all that lies beyond the Rivers of Elcaut, and Somme: and in the end having won Paris, and the territories thereabout, they gave their name to the conquered Country. I doe briefly touch what shall be represented in particular in every place, and set downe truly the original of the French in this Realme.

Pharamond laid the first stone in the building of this estate, Clodion followed in this designe, Merovee made it appeare above ground, in a more goodly forme, having purchased credits among the Gaules, both by his valour and the happy successe of his Armes. Clouis (adding the profession of Christ to his Predecessors valour and his owne) did so winne the hearts of the Gaules (who were for the most part Christians) as by their haris he got their voluntary obedience, & the assured possession of these new Conquests. Two Nations united in one by the Conquerors, giving law to the conquered, with so wise & mild a discretion, as they held him worthy of this Alliance & name, and the fruit of this marriage was so happy as the new name of France was generally received in Gaule. Thus this new estate increased daily in the race of Pharamond by divers occurrences during the space of three hundred yeares. But it was much more augmented by the famous race of Pepin. And God the Author of all good order in mankind, giving him to some Charlemagne to prevent the ruine of the Empire, enriched him with singular graces, and confirmed in him that great authority and power of King of France, and Emperor of Rome, which greatnesse God would make profitable to all Christendome. But his race, inheritor of these great honours, did not inherit his valour and happinesse, having scarce continued two hundred thirty and seven yeares: but degenerating from his vertues, they lost both Authority and Crowne, so much augmented and beautified by him and Charles Martel. So this second race, unworthy of the blood and name of their Grand-fathers, was spoiled of their Kingdome by their negligence. But God the Guardian of Monarchies (who changing the persons, would preserve the State) raised up Hugh Capet a wise and modest Prince, arming him with wisdom and dexterity fit for the preservation of his Crowne, accompanying his Armes with Law, and his Royall authority with well-governed Justice. It is to Hugh Capet that the Realme of France stands most indebted for the establishment of these goodly Ordinances, by the which (together with the valour and fidelitie of the French) this great Monarchy hath withstood the stormes formes of so many ages, and maintained euen vnto this day, the lawfull heire in the same Race, for the space of one hundred and thirty years. So as gathering the summe of all these years, they reckon from Pharamond to Lewis the 13 that now reignes 1200 years.

The order and forme of this Inuentorie.

This is the Plot or designe of the whole History of France, the which being thus laid, before mee raise this great building in every part, according to the true measures and iust proportions, let vs make a Diagramme as a liuely figure, which may containe nakedly, and without circumstance, the names of our Kings, according to the order of these three royall Races. To the which we will adde a particular Chronology, which shall be proved by the Discourse of our Inuentory. I have distinguished it into three parts, according to the order of the three royall Races. In the front of every part I note the names of Kings, and the time they have reigned, that as my first entrance you may observe all that is represented in this particular Discourse, wherein the wise Reader (that shall take the paines to conferre this modell with the whole Historie) will iudge that I have omitted no thing that may concerne the subiect of the History, with all principall circumstances, to the end the truth in this short, simple, and wisely weeded, appointed for every day, may serue as well as that which the Learned and eloquent Writers shew forth in open Theatres at Festiual times. To actions carefully described, I adde sometimes my Iudgements, for the vse of the History, examined by the Maximes of State. To actions I say generally aduowed, as for the rest I leave them, remembering that I am a witness and no Iudge, to doe service to such as could not see the Originals. I note in the beginning the Elections, the Births, Lives, Adventures, Intent, Designes, Manners, and Completions of our Kings: the Motiues, Actions, Alterations, Crosses, Issues and Successes of their affaires, both in Warre and Peace: their Enterprises, taking of Cities and Countreies, Battels, Encounter, Victories,ouerthrowes, Aduantages, Disaduantages, and other things remarkable in State: finally I observe their ends in their deaths, as the Catastrophe of their Lives, and closing up of their Reignes. But to make this Discourse more proportionable for the knowledge of our Monarchy, it was necessary to explaine it by that which hath chanced of most import in furaine Estates, especially in the Church and Empire, the most famous Theaters of the world, by reason whereof I have added a most carefull Collation of the one and the other with our Realme. I intreat the wise Reader to weigh with iudgement what I shall report concerning matters most subiect to controll, as those of the Church. I doubt not but that he shall finde that I have contained my selfe within the limits of State, talking nothing of Religion, nor meddling with the diuers humours of this age. I have onely treated of the politique government of Rome, with as much modesty as the subiect would permit. I know likewise that making profession to write a History, no man will wish me either to disguise, or to conceale the truth, the which will warrant it selfe, and free me from reproach, in making knowne to iudicious and modest wits, that I have no other passion but my duty, whereof I can giue no better proofe, then in iustifying my Discourse with the Originall, if there appeare any difficulty. I protest I have onely had a true desire to serue the publique, whose profit is the onely scope of my labours. As for the Computations as they be very necessarie for the well understanding of the History (which is the Register of times) so hath it much troubled me, being altogether neglected by the most ancient Writers, borne in the first obscure ages. I learned which have happily handled this subiect before me finding plainly this notable difficulty, I have held it expedient to make little or no account to observe the dates: which was in my concept (vnder correction be it spoken) to cut the knot asunder in stead of vntwisting it. But it hath made me more carefully to labour in this search, to find out some meanes amidst these extremities. And therefore I have distinguished the most notable changes, not onely from one Race to another, but in the Races themselves, placing the dates in the front of the whole Discourse, as a Roundstone to limit the Lands. Moreover, I have faithfully collected in grosse, the yeares of every Reigne, and haue diuided them as I thought most likely, by the continuance of publike and private actions. It is all I could doe in the most ancient Reignes, being vnable to diuine further, but in those that approach neere to our age, the Reader shall see the writing of things from yeare to yeare by degrees, whereby hee may march plainly in a goodly alight without any confusions. The Diagrammes shall supply the particular defaults of times, which we cannot otherwise distinguish. But let vs first see the whole pattern of our Monarchy without any colour or flourish whatsoeuer.

PHARAMOND THE FIRST KING OF FRANCE.

C

PHARAMOND the sonne of Marcomir, is held for the first King of France by the consent of all our Writers. He began his Reigne the year of Christ, 420. A date very remarkable to describe the first beginning of the French Monarchy. At that time Honorius and Arcadius, brethren, (sonnes to Theodosius the great) held the Romane Empire, invaded so by strange Nations, as it was not onely dismembred into diuers parts, but euen Rome was spoyled and sackt by Alaric King of Goths. Amidst these confusions, the French Monarchy had her beginning vpon the ruines of the Empire.

The fundamētall date of the French Monarchy. In the year of Grace, 420.

The French inuited by them of Treues, for the aboue named occasion, first seized on the City, and from thence extended themselves to the neighbour countries; they name Tongue for their first habitation, which the learned hold to bee the country of Brabant, and about Liege. This conquest was not made at one instant, but augmented by degrees, and the nearest Prouinces were first surprized. The French coming from beyond the Rhine, it seemes they did first seize on that part which then lay nearest vnto them, as the countries betwixt the Rhine, the Elscant and the Meuse, and from thence extended themselves euen to the riuer of Loyre. They hold for certaine, that this happy exploit of the French, was vnder the name and authority of Pharamond their King, who departed not from his native country, but sending forth his troope, as a swarme of Bees, he reaped the honour and fruit of the conquest, as the Soueraigne head. Hee is commended to haue established good lawes, to haue framed and inured the French to a ciuill and well gouerned kind of life, and to haue laid the first stone of the foundation of this great Monarchy in E Gaule: he reduced into one body, and expounded more plainly, the ancient lawes of the French called Saliques: augmented them, and shewed the vie, as well for the gouernment of the estate, as for private persons: and therefore he is called the author of those Lawes, although he receiued them from his Ancestors. He reigned eleuen yeares, leaving Clodion his sonne for his successor, with a good taste of his integrity noted in his name: for Pharamond or Pharamond (according to the common pronunciation) in the old French language (that is to say, in Germane) signifies a true mouth: a vertue in truth worthy of a Prince, and necessary for the conduct of humane society.

Estate of the Empire at the beginning of it.

His policy.

The time of his reigns.

This is all that may be certainly written of the original of the French Monarchy: yet Gregory of Tours (a very ancient author) makes no mention of Pharamond, and lets downe the beginning of this estate in grosse, as a thing vncertaine. What certainty then may we looke for of more ancient times? We finde in the Romane Histories, some apparent steps to guide vs to the knowledge of our beginning. These goodly Prouinces of Gaule, were courted by all their neighbours: the Romanes vnder colour of conueniency, seized on that which lay nearest vnto them, by means whereof, they sought to become masters of the rest, but they wanted no competitors. The Heluetians (since called Suisse) and likewise the Germanes would haue lodged there, if Caesar had not withstood them. His successors were encountered with the like difficulties, but in the end they prevailed, to whom God had determined the possession, that is, to the French, issued double esse out of Germany, and governed by Kings. We read in the lives of the last Emperours, the names of Melbandus, Richimer, Marcomir, Berthar, Sunno, Pharabert, Theodemir, and Dagobert: but hereof we cannot with reason beleue all that the Registers of Hambauld, and Trithemius doe comment, touching these ancient Kings. Let vs therefore leaue these subtillties which as haue leasure to refuse their wits, and lay before our eyes the light of a more sound and profitable truth: let vs observe the estate of the Church, when as this Monarchy began to appeare, for hereafter the Church shall be her principall gemme, although the French Kings were Infidels in these first beginnings.

The estate of the Church.

Saint Jerome, Chrysostome, Ambrose, and Augustine, liued in those times, spectators of B the dissipation of the Empire, when the Church suffered much. Damasus, Ciriacus, Anastasius, Innocentius, Solimus, and Bonifacius, Bishops of Rome, liued there one after another (medrenowed for their piety, learning and dexterity) amidst the confusions of the Empire, and even at Rome where the Emperours were seldom seene; so as the absence of the Emperours (troubled to withstand the Barbarians, and the miserable estate of the time, which forced Christians to flee to their Bishop for counsell and comfort to their confused afflictions) laid the foundation of their authority, then small, being tied to their charges, and subiect to the Emperours command: but it grew by degrees, vntill it came to the height of this soueraine and absolute power, so as in the end they haue prescribed lawes to Emperours, Kings, and Christian Princes. A necessary obseruation, both C for the truth and order of this History, to vnderstand rightly both the times and meanes of their rising. In the first age, the Bishops of Rome durst not shew themselves (being persecuted, imprisoned, and martyred by the Emperours.) Since Constantine the Great, their authority began: in the dissipation of the Empire, it increased, and this Realme did forsake and augment it. Our first Kings knew them not: their next successors maintained and aduanced them, as Charles Martel, Pepin, and Charlemaigne, to whom they are indebted for the greatest support and increase of their chiefe authority.

Fundamentall Rules or Maximes of the State of France.

BEfore we proceed any further in this Treatise, reason & order commands vs to set D down the soueraine Maximes of our Monarchy, as goodly Pillars in the front of this great building: to the end we may not dispute either of the ancient forme of government in the first age of our Ancestors, or of the fundamentall lawes of the estate; It is necessary that our minds (euen in our infancy) be stationed with this common beleefe, being the bond and vision of the naturall obedience we owe vnto our Kings. Without doubt, it is neither true, nor likely that our predecessors (taking possession of this goodly inheritance) made any question of that which had bene concluded amongst them from father to son. The most ancient Histories (whose authority is without controule) testifie, that the French Nation was governed by Kings, and experience (iudged with reason, doth shew that the French cannot be otherwise commanded, then by a Royalty. Whereunto serues this E question amongst the French, touching the forme of government, when as Cauls was first possided by them: And to what end should these painted speeches be vttered by our ancient warriors, who made so great profession to do well, as they neglected eloquent words.

This Maxim thus laid, as the ground of the Estate of France, the truth of that which hath passed in ancient times, doth plainly shew, what the forme of this royaltie hath ben: for who doth not see, by the names of the Kings of France, (as they haue commanded in this Realme, amidst so many alterations of the State, in the change of the three Races, where we may note the succession from father to sonne, from brother to brother, and from cousin to the nearest kinsman of the blood Royall) that it was hereditary from all antiquity: This is the Law, the vice whereof is so worthily regarded in all commands, the F force whereof defends the State amidst the strongest confusions, yea sucking babes haue enjoyed it without any dispute or contradiction. At the very name of an infant King, Armies haue marched vnder the command of a woman (otherwise very odious by reason of her vices) and yet so respected (being the Kings mother) as the French haue grown desperate in most perillous battails, returning with bloody victories, thrust forward with this onely resolution, to preferre the estate of their young King, lying in his swaddling clothes. By the force of this law, the French (after the decaie of their lawfull Kings, leaving

A leaving their wiues with child) hauing reuerenced the wombe of their Queene, expecting her delivery: being a sonne, he was nourished, bred vp, and honored as their King: And if he died in his first infancy, they haue performed his obsequies, with the like respect and reuerence, as to a King in his majority.

To conclude: reason, authority, and experience, doe plainly shew, that a successeive royaltie is better, then that which depends vpon the peoples choice and election: for what is a Royaltie, but the image of a Fathers command: the loue, honor, and obedience which children beare towards their parents, be the effects of the law of nature figured in their hearts. A father commands ouer many children, who although they be planted in diuers parts (as we see in the peopling of great families) yet all returne to the chiefe stocke or stemme: all acknowledge and honor the father, all obey him while he liues, by a more voluntary obedience, for that it is meerly naturall. Behold the patterne of a ciuill government. To apply it to our subiect: it appeares, the first man had this naturall authority, euen as we see it at this day. As mankind multiplied into diuers families, so this multitude had need of a greater government. Man cannot liue alone: a Locustie confists in commandment and obedience. From this fountaine a royaltie springs. Lookie what is done in a family, the like is in a state, by the same force of nature: one commands and is obeyed. There this naturall respect is the bond of lawfull obedience. So here in like sort, whereas the commandment of one giues law to all, for that the law of nature hath power ouer all, it doth authorize this respect in the hearts of subiects, by a voluntary obedience C to their Kings as to their fathers. And as we need not to be taught to honour father and mother; So, who is so vnkind that will make any question to honour the Father vnder whom he is borne. It is that which the original of the first truth doth teach vs, Honour father and mother, not onely to eue vs to them that gaue vs life, but to those that make vs to liue happily in the common society of mankind: that is, to the father in the house, and to the King in the State, as the father of our fathers. Thus Royaltie is the most ancient and best forme of government, when as the King is Father of his people, according to the ordinance of nature, as we shall shew elsewhere at better leisure. I hope this small Digression shall be excused for the necessity of the subiect.

D A Royaltie then is the image of a fathers authority. How can a father then (whom God hath giuen by the course of nature) be chosen by his children? If to liue well according to nature, and by consequence, that which proceeds from nature, be the best, who doubts but a Royaltie (the which God hath giuen vs by the law of State, the soueraine law of society, wherein we are borne) is without doubt better then that which depends on the tumultuous factions of people? Thus much for reason. Now let vs see what Authority sayes, which speaks plainly, and in the goodliest estate of the world, which was the common-weale of Israel, wherein God had planted his Church, as his most precious Jewell. Truly, the lawfull Royaltie of the house of Dauid, hath bene hereditary and successeive from father to sonne, and from cousin to the nearest kinsman, a patterne E whereby to frame a perfect estate, farre better then the common-weale of Plato: who notwithstanding hath respected the blood Royall in the race of Kings, with great prerogative, moued thereunto by the force of nature, to acknowledge the best forme of government in an hereditary succession, whereas one is borne to command, another to obey. I will dilate no more of so rich and ample a subiect, hauing onely quoted that which is necessary for the circumstance of my purpose. But what shall wee say of Experience, the mistress of foolles? What is he, but may thereby feeble the visible proofes of this truth: Doublet those Countries and States, which haue kept this liberty to choose their Kings, doe often feele (to their costs) the tumultuous fruits of their elections, striving with much paine to maintain this priuiledge against the lawes of nature, positing from F nation to nation, with much toyle, and small profit, searching for that as farre off, which they might easily find at home: and for the auoiding of tumults, (which might grow among equall Competitors) they procure vnto themselves infinite troubles, the which they might auoid, in receiuing of him willingly whom God should cause to be borne among them, with a lawfull authority. But some will object, that which we cannot deny to haue bene practised in two Races, That the French had in former time authority to place and displace their Kings: as appeares, as well by the Kings chosen by Parliament, which were borne vpon Targets; as also by the famous examples of Pepin, and Charlemaigne, leaving

A Royaltie is the best forme of government.
How is it appeares by reason.

A successeive Royaltie is the best.

By authority.

By experience.

In old times, as the received of a new King, they vied to say him vpon a Target in a publick audience.

426 Capes. Whereunto the answer is true and plaine, that this consent was but the seale of the naturall prerogative due to the Race of our lawfull Kings; and their disallowing, a declaration of their bale sloathfullnesse, unworthy of that naturall prerogative, wherewith they were honored in their birth, and from the which they did degenerate in living ill.

The prerogative of a King is nothing impaired by the peoples consent at his first reception.

And as we see in the succession of Kings, the nearest allyed holds the other by the hand: so in these two alterations, when as necessity forced the French to change their King, (as when the like necessity constrained the children to give their furious father a tutor) we may observe that they have alwaies made choise of men nearest to the blood Royall, preferring vertue before a maske of authority corrupted with vice, the publique good before the private interest of a vicious man, retaining nothing but the name of his noble race. They have preferred (as much as they could) their natural respect to the blood Royall. The Law made the King: that is his birth. But the law of nature, followed by the law of Nations, and the free consent of the people, hath not beene the cause, but the very effect of this naturall authority. So this royall authority is limited and ruled by the foweraigne Law of State: which doth so advance the head above all the members of the body, as they may not be separated. For what is a King without subiects, but a head without members? The Kings prefers his estate, as the head doth the body. But, as the head (from whence life proceeds to the body) lives with the body, so the King (who preserves the estate by his authority) is preferred in the estate, by the consent of his subiects.

In this inseparable union, he doth fortifie his power by theirs, and his command with their voluntary obedience. Plato sayes, that Authority not subiect to controulment, is pernicious to him that commands, and to them that are commanded. It is a lawfull and profitable restraint for Kings, and the necessary counterpoise of their authority. This law will have every member to hold his place, in the body of a State: And by consequence, that the subiects consent, (who offer their goods and lives to their King) be respected in their degree. This hinders no more the hereditary prerogative of a Royalty, then the diuerse ministry of the members do the foweraigne authority of the head, ouer the whole body.

And as in the beginning, or in the rising, or infancy of an Estate, vertue ministers occasion for the people to choise such as should command ouer them successfully, leaving as it were in sacred guard, in the hands of their best men, what they hold most precious, and so to their successors, who by all reasonable coniecture, must be good and vertuous, being born of good parents: even so in the end, vice makes them to hate such as abuse this prerogative: and in like manner the same vertue makes them to flie to others, whom they hold more worthy to command, in that they are obedient vnto reason. This Maxime then stands firme, that the authority of the States not being incompatible with the foweraignty of a King, the Royalty of France is, and hath alwaies beene merely hereditary, without any exception, nor can it otherwise subsist & stand, all well considered. And who fo thinks or speaks otherwise, imagining popular common-weales in France, he is ignorant of the disposition of the French, and feeds himselfe with a dangerous vanity.

The third. The male only capable of the Crowne, the female excluded in France.

But this law of a succeeding Royalty is limited by a third Maxime: That the right of the Crowne is tied to the heyres male: whereas in many nations, for want of males, the foweraigne authority of a royalty falls to the females of the royall Race. And this Law received by the approbation of the subiect people, is happily put in practice. The president is very memorable and remarkable in the Realme of England, whereas Queene Elizabeth alone, hath surpassed the happinesse of the greatest Kings her predecessors, ruling a long time with great authority in peace: so as having gotten most famous victories ouer her enemies, she hath erected through peace, the goodliest trophies that euer King of England could haue planted there. So great is the force of the Law in the societie of mankind, the which God will haue inuiolable vnder the gage of faith and publique order. But the Royalty of France is wholly restrained to the males, the fundamentall law of State (being called the Salique Law) not admitting the females. For this foweraigne Law is set downe in these words; Is the Salique Land, let no portion of the inheritance come to the female: but let the male haue the possession. That is to say, the males only are, capable of the Crowne of France: the females being wholly excluded, and by consequence their issue, the which can pretend no more interest then their mothers, neither haue they any portion in the reuenues of the Crowne, which cannot be alienated. So as it is giuen them but for terme of life, by assignation of dowry at the Kings good pleasure.

The French were often called Salians, of the River Salin in Franconia: and the French lawes resembled Salique lawes.

This

A This fundamentall Law is called Salique, by excellency, although the Salique lawes containe the rights of priuate men: but amongst them, that which concerns the Maiesty of the Prince, is the principall, and for this cause is knowne by this worthy obseruation. The practice of this fundamentall Law is apparent in the first Race, where the chiefe proofe of Antiquitie must be made in the Daughters of Childebert, son to the first Clovis. In the Daughters of Childebert, sonne to Clovis the first: In the Daughters of Gontran, sonne of the same Clovis, all which are excluded from the Crowne, and in their places the nearest Princes of the blood admitted by the consent of all the French. The second Race hath no examples of this Law in the particular circumstance of women. The third hath very notable ones: Edward King of England was excluded by iudgement of the States, from the right he pretended to this Crowne, being son to one of the daughters of France, the onely daughter of Philip the faire: Philip of Valois was preferred before his Nece daughter to Lewis Hutin. And of late memory Francis the first of that name, Duke of Angoulême, before the two daughters of Lewis the twelfth, without any contradiction.

428 The fundamentall Law called Salique. The practice thereof. The Author himselfe writes that these kings dyed without issue.

This law was obserued among the French before Pharamond was borne: and by vertue of this Law he reigned as Successor to his Ancestors, Marcomir, Sunno, Astelobaudes, and others. And as hee was appointed by the wife providence of God, to be the first Architector of this Monarchy, so was hee endued with singular graces fit for so excellent a worke, in the which the Law should fortifie the valour of this fierce and warlike Nation.

Here the Author would haue a fained supposition to be taken for an undoubted truth.

C Thus Pharamond is renowned for his wisdom and iudgment, who did countenance and authorize the Salique Lawes, and that especially which was the chiefe, to take away all future debate from his Successors. And for the better strengthening of his lawes, he assembled his Captaines, whereof the Councillors of our ancient Kings were chosen. They name among the chiefe of them, Widoast, Sabogast, Wisogast, and Bosogast: the which our fabulous curiosities doe transforme into some great Orators, without any apprehension of truth. These were good Warriours, and yet wise men and iudicious. But who can beleue that they were great Rhetoricians? So Pharamond was not the author, but the beautifier of the Salique lawes, as Iustinian of the Ciuill lawes of the Romanes.

To search out the original of the word, neither my style, nor my humor will suffer me to dispute thereof: euerie one hath his iudgement free. But this is my opinion: as words be the images of things, so are they inuented to represent the nature of the thing whereunto they are applied. It appeares, that among the French, the Saliens were those that held the chiefe degrees, and gaue the name to the whole Nation. So as all Frenchmen are oftentimes called Saliens. The Salique Lawes therefore are the French lawes, appointed to rule and gouerne the French. It was the ancient name continued with the most ancient lawes, the which the honor of the Nation, and the reuerence of so sacred a thing, hath forbidden in any sort to alter. So the Salique law hath continued time out of mind, the foweraigne law of State, vnder which the French haue liued: and so haue continued from father to sonne, without any alteration, either in the substance, or the word, majesticall in the hearts and tongues of all French men. What apparence is there then, that Philip of Valois hath borrowed the name of Pharamond in the inuention of this law, to make it seruise his turne? How much unlikely is it, that so important a law being the ground of the Estate, should be vknowne to the French? What a drowinesse had it been in so wise and circumspect a Nation, to suffer themselves to be abused by a new-come Prince, and by so grosse a policie to draw themselves into apparent combustion, which hung ouer their heads, in preferring the French before the English, who had then so good a portion in France, where he possessed the goodliest and richest Provinces? How vnfounded is this policie, to imagine, that a poore Prince, Earle of Valois, hauing to doe with a rich King of England, who encountered the French mens minds with an intestine force,

Of the word Salique.

What these Saliques were.

F by the golden vertue of his Angels, could haue abused such as were kept in their obedience, by the force of right and reason, for the preservation of the Crowne of France, their Country? Who sees not, but it had beene the ouerthrow of Philip of Valois cause, to say that he had forged a Law at his pleasure, to exclude the lawfull heyre and her offspring, from her right? Truly the good cause of Philip of Valois made him preuaile against Edward King of England, and the ancient reuerence to him, authorized by a continuall vice, and received by the common consent of the French, reiected gold to respect the order of right, for the benefit of the lawfull Heyre.

An auenture, French Author writes, that it is but an obseruation & no law.

These

Etymology of the word Saliques.

These French laws were called Saliques, of the River Sal which is in Franconia, or East France: It joynes with Mein, and is not yet dried vp. It is neyther new, nor extraordinary for people to deriue their names from Mountains or Riuers: & to shew an example, springing from the same thing, by noting the riuers, The Country where the Citie of Paris is seated (not onely the chiefe of this great Realme, but the Theater of the whole world, if by a happy peace shee may recover her ancient beauty) is called the Isle of France, for the conourse of diuers Riuers, which ioyned with Sein: and to this end, the Ship (the Armes of our chiefe Citie) shewes the conueniency of these goodly Riuers: Who can with reason obiect the apparenny of this likelihood? That as our Ancestors remaining alongst the Riuer of Sal, were called Saliens, so the name hath continued to posterity: the which for the like reason, are called Ripuaires, as made for the commoditie and vse of the dwellers vpon that bank, the which they likewise called Ripuaires, or Ribberons. Truly long time after, Conrad of Francony, the Emperour, was called Salique, to marke his beginning in that Country by the ancient name. Thus much for the word. But the inuolable Maximes and Principles of the State of France, the consent of all the true and ancient writers, the prescription of so many ages, the generall approbation of all the French Nation, should make vs hold this Salique law for certaine, without seeking for new opinions, not onely weak and vnprofitable, but insupportable in the State, where the old prouerbe must stand for an oracle, Remoue nos les fons well laid. Thus hauing briefly set downe the principall lawes of the State of France, I will retorne to the course of my History.

Death of Pharamond.

Thus he reigned, thus he liued, and thus dyed Pharamond, the first King of France, leaving for hereditary Successor of his Realme, his sonne Clodion, according to the right of Law: and King in effect, by consent of the French. This age was the sincke of Barbarous nations, by whom God would iustly punish the vniust pride of the Romanes. The greatest part came out of Asia, staying first in Germany, and from thence like Caterpillers or Grasshoppers, spread themselves ouer Gaule, Italy and Spaine: that is to say, the Gothes or Getes, Alans, Hunnes, Sueues, and others: and from the North, the Bourguignons, Normans and Lombards. We must know the change of these Nations for the vse of this History. But it sufficeth to touch them briefly in their places, without cloying our chiefe subiect with a cumberfome discourse.

CLODION, or CLOION the hairy, The second King of France.

The first attempt of Clodion.

CLODION, the sonne of Pharamond, succeeded his father in the year 431. and reigned one and twenty years. He laboured to follow his fathers course, and to settle himselfe in Gaule: but hauing transported certaine troopes, which made a happy beginning, passing to the Countreys of Cambresie and Tournay, betwix the Riuers of Somme and Escaut, behold a furious multitude of diuers Nations assembled together, Vandales, Alans, Sueues and Bourguignons (ialous to see this great and warlike people follow their steps, in the conquest of a Land not onely set to sale, but abandoned in the disorders of the Romane Empire) opposed themselves against them. The French not able to withstand so great vnited Forces, retired themselves into their Country of Franconia. To this ialousie was added the practice of Stillicio, Lieutenant generall to Honorius Emperour of the West, who easily engaged these Nations (seeking for worke) against the French, laboring by all means to crosse them, and to possesse himselfe of Gaule: yet the successe did not fit his designe: for being prevented by Honorius his Master, he was slaine, with his sonne Eucherius, whom he had appointed absolute heyre of that goodly portion. But the prouidence of God had left it in prey to these great and victorious Nations, being come

A come from diuers parts of the world to diuide the Empire. Thus confusion preuailed by his authoritie, who had most interest in the practices of Stillicio, who, in taking Gaule for himselfe) retained still the Romane name, being overthrowne by Honorius. The deluge of these barbarous Nations ouerspread all Gaule, which from yeare to yeare was replenished with new guests. The Bourguignons had already seized on a great part, with the title of a kingdom, whereof Arles was the chiefe Citie. The Gothes possessed Gaule Narbonnoise, euen by the Emperours consent, who granted what he could not take from them, with promise to passe no further. So this victorious nation, dispersed in diuers places, as in Italy, Gaule and Spaine, were called by sundry names, Wisigoths and Ostrogoths, according to the places where they were planted, by their great multitudes, and manner. Such was the disorder of the Romanes, who in their feasons had subdued the whole world by their victorious armes, These tempests and stormes reigned during the Emperies of the two Brethren Arcadius and Honorius, the one commanding in the East, and the other in the West: of Theodosius the second, sonne to Arcadius, and in the beginning of Valentinian the third, a vicious and unhappy Prince. The reigne of Clodion fell out in those times not greatly memorable, but to obtruse his resolutions and mainly endeauours, to settle and encrease the conquest of his father, but with no successe. Thus great and heroicall Enterprises, haue often stayes and lets in the beginning, or such difficult crosses, as they seeme quite suppressed.

C Atius a Romane borne, succeeded Stillicio for the Emperour, in that which remained in Gaule. He opposed himselfe violently against the French, who at diuers times endeauoured to passe the Rhine, and to retorne into France. Clodion fortifying himselfe courageously against this storme, fainted not for all these first difficulties. In the end hee resolved to hazard all vpon this last cast: and to this effect he raised a mighty Army, with an intent to goe in person to the conquest of this goodly Kingdom. But God had resolved to giue it to the French: yet by another hand then that of Clodion, for he dyed in this voyage, being on the bankes of Rhine, with an intent to passe in, in the year of Grace 451. leaving Merovee heyre of his designe and valour.

Law for wearing long haire.

Hee was called Le Cheueu, or hairy, for that he made a law, that none but Kings and their Children, with the Princes of the blood, should weare long haire, in token of command: after the Romane manner, who shaued the heads of their slaues and seruants, and left the periwig onely to the Patriciens, and the head bare. This custome, confirmed by the law of Clodion, hath bene long time obserued in France: so as by this marke, Clodion myre the sonne of Clodion (being slaine in a battell by the Bourguignons) was knowne among the dead: And in token of a degrading or dishonouring, they shaued such as they degraded from the Royall dignitie: as it appears by infinite examples: amongst which our History makes mention of one very memorable, of Queene Clotilde, who chose rather to cut off the heads of her young sonnes, then to haue their haire pold or shauen; that is to say, she preferred an honest death before the dishonour of her Children: for in cutting off their haire (the marke of their naturall dignitie) they were deprived of all hope to enioy their degree, and were confined into a base estate, vnworthy of their greatnes, to dye with continually heart-breaking reproch and infamy.

The estate of the Church.

Genferic King of the Vandales, at that time seized vpon Africke, and euen when as he beleaged Hippone (which at this day they call Bonne, famous for the fishing of Corrall.) Saint Augustine dyed the third month of the siege, the fourth year of his Ministry in that Citie, and the 76. of his age, hauing both seen and felt those tragical ruines in the desolate estate of the Church, afflicted then in diuers parts of the world by these Barbarians, Theodosius the second, the sonne of Arcadius, a good and a wise Prince, did his best endeauor to stop the course of this last shipwracke, but he preuailed not. The insolency of Valentinian the third (a Prince extremely vicious) thrust it headlong, and the ill government of his Seruants, (namely of Bonifacius Governor of Africke, and of Atius Governor of Gaule) called in the Barbarians to the subersion of the Empire: who to be reuenged one of another, (being capitall enemies, for the ialousie of their greatnes,) did what they could to ruine their master.

The estate of the Church.

MEROVEE

MEROVEE, the third King of France,

Who gave the name and greatest grace to this first Race.

Meroove footeing into France.

BROVEE, sonne, or the nearest kinsman to Clodion, succeeded to the Crowne, as well by vertue of the fundamentall Law of State, as by the free election of the French, in the year 451. He was farre more happy then Clodion: for hee not only effected his designe in passing the Rhine, and taking footing in Gaule: but did happily extend the limits of his new kingdom. And the same Atius which crossed Clodion, made the way easie for Meroove vnawares, for the execution of his Enterprize, by this occasion: Atius fell in disgrace with Honorius his Master, being grieved to see the great successe of the Gothes, Vandales, and other barbarous Nations in the Empire, imputing the fault vnto his Seruants and Officers: Thus growing ialous, hee calls him from his government of Gaule, and sends Castinus in his place, who was not onely vnacquainted with the estate of the Gaules, but was also discontented with Bonifacius Gouvernor of Africke, with whom he had commandement to ioyne his Forces, to oppose against the common Enemies of the Romanes. During those actions Honorius dyed, leaving Theodosius in the East, and Valentinian in the West, two young Princes of diuers humors.

Meroove embracing this occasion with great dexterity, founds the hearts of his neighbours the Gaulois, and findes them disposed to his deuotion. He raiseth an Army, passeth the Rhine, takes Treues at his first approach, and then Argentine (which is now called Strassbourg) with the Countries adioyning to it. Hee extends euen to Cambresie and Tournay: & proceeding further into Gaule, he seized on the best Cities of Champagne, with so great expedition, as no Roman appeared to stop the course of his victory. Valentinian aduertised of this successe, called backe Atius to quench this fire, sending him into Gaule with an Army against the French: but there was other worke prepared for him, for Attila King of the Huns (who named himselfe the scourge of God to chastise the Empire) hauing assembled an incredible number of men in the Deserts of Asia (being five hundred thousand Souldiers) falls downe like a furious deluge, spoyling all the Countries where he passed: and hauing crossed through Poland into Germany, and passed the Rhine, he threatened to invade France, a Country desired by all these Nations for her fertilitie and beauty. Atius had no shorter course, nor better meanes to avoid this storme; then to become friends with the French, and with all the other possessors of Gaule, who were threatened by this common storme: so as in stead of warre, hee made a Peace with Meroove vpon this extremitee.

Attila entred Gaule, and aduanced so farre, that hee besieged Orleans, where Anian E liued then, a most famous Bishop, who did greatly comfort the besieged by his piety and wisdom, whilst that the Forces of their confederate Friends assembled by the meanes of Atius, Romanes, French, Goths, and Bourguignons. Orleans being at the point to yeeld, Thierry King of the Goths arises so happily, as he forceth Attila to raise his siege, and to take another course. Attila marching away with this vast body of an Army, he was pursued speedily by Atius and his Confederates, who ouer-tooke him in the fields of Catalaunias, the which is diuerly taken, eyther for the Country about Chalons, or about Tholouse. A battell was given, and the Combat was furious, but the checke fell vpon the Huns, who lost (as it is constantly written) 180000 fighting men, and the victory remained in common to the Romanes, French, and Goths: but the triumph and honor to Meroove and his men, who fought very valiantly. Thierry King of the Goths was slaine very happily, to make the way easie for Meroove.

It was propounded in councill, to pursue Attila, but Atius would not yeeld thereto, so as Attila saued himselfe, being beaten but not vanquished: for with the same Forces he seized vpon a great part of Pannonia the happy, whence in the end came the name of Hungary, although after the death of Attila, who did but lay the euain, and his posterity finished what he had begunne. A question is made what moued Atius to leaue Attila halfe

A halfe vanquished. The reliques of his discomfited Army were not small, after so great a losse: so as it seemed best not to force him to despair, seeing there is but one onely help for the vanquished, not to hope for helpe. Atius might also haue given this aduice, by reason of his ialousie against the French, who should haue reaped an ouerplus of greatness by the absolute ouerthrow of this Barbarian. But with what intention soeuer hee did it, it succeeded ill for himselfe: for Valentinian his master was so discontented with him, as he caused him to be slaine, depriving himselfe of a sufficient and faithfull seruant: and (as one reproched it vnto him) he had cut off his right hand with his left. In the mean time Meroove affaires succeeded well in all places: he had wonne much reputation: he was feared of the Romanes, honoured of the Gaules, and respected and beloued of all men. Thierry King of the Goths, gaue him place by his death, with whom the Romanes might haue ioyned: and his greatest opposition, was the wisdom and valour of Atius, the which did no more checke him.

Thus the providence of God (which meant to vse him for the building of this Monarchy) made way for him euerywhere. He likewise knew how to embrace all these opportunities with such dexterity, that taking hold of all occasions, he entred the Countrey, taking possession of Paris, Sens, Orleans, and the neighbour Prouinces, with the content of the inhabitants: and ioyning these with the rest, hee won the Gaules, with so good vsage, as he was held worthy to command ouer them: and so without any contention, he began to frame the body of an Estate, calling France (by the name of his ancient country) the country of the Gauls, being newly brought vnder his obedience. Hereby we may see, whether it be likely that Valentinian gaue the French their liberty, for recompence of this notable seruice: and that from thence they began to be called Frenchmen, that is to say, Franc and free, as some write, not well observing the Romane History, whence these Romane obseruations should with reason be drawne. Such was the valour, wisdom, and happinesse of this great and worthy Prince, who with great reason gaue his name to this first Race, called Meroingiens, to aduow him the principall pillar of their feeded estate.

He beganne to reigne in the year 451, and ruled tenne yeares onely, not omitting one houre to doe well. In his time there chanced notable accidents in the Church. As on the one side the Barbarians dismembred the State, so the Hereticks troubled the Church by their monstrous innovations, sprung vp against the truth of the ancient and Catholike doctrine: and their chiefe practices were against the Sonne of God. Nestorius diuided the Natures: Eutiches did confound them: Theodosius the second assembled a general Councell at Ephesus, against Nestorius and Martian his successor: another at Chalcedon against Eutiches. There were likewise Synods at Orange, Valence, Carpentras, Aises, Tours, and elsewhere, for diuers necessities of the Church, the which, order and discipline might remedy. Cyrillus and Theodoret liued in those times, great personages, and worthy defenders of the truth.

CHILDERIC, or CHILPERIC THE FIRST,

The fourth King of France.

In some Copies HILPERIC.

F

HE French and the Gaules being thus vnited, they chose Childeric the son of Meroove for their King, with great solemnity, being the first assembly of this new people, consisting of two Nations, and installed him, according to their ancient manner (raising him vpon a Target) they caried him about the Assembly. He began to rule in the year 461, and reigned thirty yeares. A Prince noted in diuers examples, both in his life and government: for in the beginning he was vicious and vnfortunate, but being reclaimed by affliction (hauing changed his life) happinesse did accompany him in the end of his dayes. At his comming to the Crowne, hee did greatly abuse his authority, in oppressing of his his Subjects with excessive Taxes, ransoming the wives and daughters of the French: who seeing themselves ill treated in their goods and honours, they assemble, and resolve to expell Chilperic as unworthy to reign, and to call in Gillon a Romane for their King, who gouerned in Gaule for the Romans, and held his seat at Soissons. The hate and contempt of Subjects against their Kings, is a great meanes to blemish their authority. The vices of Chilperic bred this discontent in the French, and the scourge was ready to chastise him, though not to ruine him.

Chilperic (not able to oppose himselfe against this common consent) gives place, by the counsell of Guyemans a man of great account, who promised him to be his faithfull friend in his affliction, and to vse his best endeouours to pacifie the French, being incensed against him, and to cause him to be recalled. To this end he takes a token from Guyemans for the more secret treating in his absence. The token was a peece of a gold ring, wherof either of them tooke a moiety. This done, Chilperic retires himselfe into Turlinge to King Bafin his deare friend and kinsman, expecting better fortune. Guyemans proceeds with such dexterity, as creeping into fauour with this new King, and keeping his credit with the French, he makes himselfe fit to effect his purpose, both by the one and the other. The issue answereth the proiect. Having plausible audience with Gillon, he aduiseeth him, that to get authoritie among his Subjects, he must inure them to obedience; and therefore he must not forbear to lay publike charges vpon them, else they would contemne him, and in the end, insule ouer him, if in time he did not accustom them to beare the yoke of his new authoritie. According to this aduice, the King (vncacquainted with the humour of the French) impositeth Taxes contrary to custome, and doubles charge vpon charge. The same fire which had inflamed the French against Chilperic, incensed them presently against Gillon. For (say they) to what end should this new master become a tyrant? Wee can dispossesse him with the like facility that we haue made him. Thus they generally complaine, euery one (according to the credit he hath with the people) cries out that they must preuent this mischiefe. Such as were the motiues and instruments to expell Chilperic, are not the last to complaine. Guyemans doth secretly aduertise Gillon, that the meanes to auoid the danger which Chilperic fell into, was to prevent this practice in the breeding, and to put the principall authors thereof to death, as the ring-leaders of rebellion. Gillon entertaines this aduice: he puts them to death that were the instruments of Chilperic's disgrace. And so with one stroke giues two strokes. He takes them away that might frustrate his designe, and disposeth the Frenchmens hearts to desire their King.

And thus he makes the way for Chilperic's returne, by a very happy dexterity, and the euent was answerable. Gillon (having put these aforesaid to death) became very odious to the French. Guyemans abandons Gillon, and cunningly embraceth this occasion, in fauour of Chilperic. He blames the French for their lightnesse, to haue expelled their naturall Lord, and received a stranger farre more insupportable. Thus he makes them resolute to call home Chilperic: who vnderstanding their desire, and seeing the peece of gold (the token of his returne) sent by his faithfull friend, returns confidently into France: he is received by the French, and by their aduise Gillon to resigne him the place, and to retire himselfe to Soissons. Such was the first part of Chilperic's life. The last was of another temper: for being taught by himselfe, he was so addicted to doe good, as he got the good will of the French, of whom he was beloved, honoured, and obeyed all the rest of his life. So as to good minds capable of reason, affliction serues as a chastisement, and not for a ruine: for an instruction, and not a destruction. He did fight happily against Adaire King of the Saxons, subdued the Germans, and wonne a great country along the Rhine. He added to this State the Country of Aniot, hauing forced the Citie of Angiers: and to make his happinesse absolute, he had one sonne, who augmented and assured his Realme. They onely obserue one notable error committed after his returne, in taking Bafin to wife, being the wife of Bafin King of Turlinge, who had courteously entertained him in his distresse, violating the sacred lawes of Hospitality, suffering himselfe to be abused with the loue of a woman, accounted a witch: for they say, this woman (who had forsaken her husband for him) made him to see a vision the first night of their unlawfull marriage, the which did represent the state of the succeeding Kingdome, by Lyons, Unicorns, Leopards, the which appeared first in this vision: then by Beares and Wolves: and lastly, by Cats, Dogs, and other small beasts, the which did reare one another

You must pardon these fables of antiquary, (bred as it seemes long after) by the which she would represent the estate of these three Races, according to their diuers occurrences. Chilperic having lived thus, and reigned thirty yeares, he left Clouis his son for successor, and heyre of one of the goodliest and beautifullest pillars of the French Monarchy: as shall appeare by the following discourse.

His success was Rayne - first of the line of Clovis - he had 3 children - 2 daughters - and 1 son - The long - Raigne - of Clovis - was the first of the line of the French Monarchy - The first of the line of the French Monarchy - was the first of the line of the French Monarchy -

LOVIS, succeeding his father Chilperic, was installed in the Royaltie, by the French, according to their ancient custome, borne vpon a Targer in open assembly. He began to reigne the yeare 483, and reigned thirty yeares. He had scarce attained to the age of fifteene yeares, when as he mounted to the royall throne. A young man of great hope, borne for the feeding of this Monarchy. His fore-fathers had laid the foundation, but he did build vpon those goodly beginnings with so great valour, wisdom, and good fortune, as he was to be held for one of the greatest Architects of this Estate, hauing had the honor to be the first King of France that receiued the Christian religion, the greatest beauty of this Crowne: and a priuiledge so carefully planted by his Successors, as they haue purchased the title of most Christian, as a marke of their chiefest greatness. The progresse of the History will shew both his vertues and vices. But at this entry, his mind being guided to so great a woike (whereunto the wise providence of Almighty God had appointed him) forthwith it selfe the first five yeares of his reigne (being the time of his apprenticeship) before he vnderooke any thing, the which he did manage so discreetly, embracing all occasions that were offered, as in the end he thought himselfe able to subdue all Gaule, if God had not raised the ambitious course of his unlimited desires, to let great men vnderstand, that he preserues a Soueraigne prerogative ouer all their enterprises.

We haue said before, that in the disposition of the Empire, the Gauls had many vsurpers, Bourguignons, Goths, and Frenchmen: the Romans had the least part, for hardly they could keepe Soissons, Compeigne, Senlis, and other small towne thereabouts. The Bourguignons enjoyed a great Country, the two Bourgondies, the Duchy and the Euidome, Saxon, Lyonnois, Forets, Beauuolais, Dauphine, and Prouince; Arles being the Metropolitan City of the Realme. The Goths possessed all Gaule Narbonnoise, to the which they gaue the name, and all Guyenne with the appurtenances. The French had the best part, from the Rhine vnto Louie, embracing all the rich Provinces of the low Countries vnto the Ocean, the Countiees of Hainault, Cambresie, Picardy, Normandy, the Ile of France, Maine, Aniot, Touraine, Vandomois, the Province of Orleans, Beaulieu, Hurepols, Gastoins, Sologne, Berry; and the neighbour Countiees, although these great and large territories had particular Lords: amongst the which the King was acknowledged for Soueraigne; such was the estate of Gaule, when as Clouis vnderooke the helme of this French Monarchy.

To become absolute Master of this goodly Country which was set so late to the mightiest, he begins with the weakest, the nearest, and him with whom he had the most apparent reason of quarrell; which was the Romane, who held nothing of this great name, but the shew and pride, in a weaknes altogether contemptible. Clouis turned to that Gyts of whom we haue spoken, commanded at Soissons for the Romanes. Clouis had an extraordinary quarrell against him, hauing sought to vsurpe his estate; irreconcilable quarrels amongst Princes. Having so goodly a shew to demand reason for so notable a wrong, he desires him: They assemble their Forces. Clouis calls to his aid Agastius the Count of Cambray, and Charis of Atypens: the first assists him, the other exhorteth him, frowns to keepe the Rakes, and to bee a looker on, and then to reigne with the stronger.

Agastius

Siagrius is overcome in battell. In this overthrow he leaves his estate to Clovis, and flies A to Alaric King of the Goths, being at Tholouse. Clovis not content with Siagrius goods, demands his person of Alaric, and obtains it. Siagrius is sent vnto him, his hands and feet bound. Having him in his power, he makes him taste the griefe of his misery, reproching him that he had basely lost his government, and deferred capital punishment, and so he cuts off his head; and afterwards he suppresseth Chararic, and Ragnachaire, vpon diuers occasions. Having seized vpon all that belonged to the Romane name, he turned his resolutions against the Bourguignons and the Goths: but with an industry fitting so politike a head, seeking some colour of iustice, he makes a league of peace with the two Nations, to pick a cause of quarrell, hauing some controuerfie with their Kings for some B tide in shew lawfull. The issue is answerable to his designe, for he knew so well how to obseure times, watch for occurrences, and creepe so cunningly into their affaires, as in the end he dispossesthem both.

In the house of Bourgondy there were four brethren, Gondebault, Gondegesil, Chilperic and Gothemar, the children of Gondioch. The ialousie of their portions thrusts them into choler, and the fury of courtoisnesse polluted the hands of Gondebault the elder with the parricide of his younger brother Chilperic, and of his wife, but God preferred Clotilde from the cruelty of this man, being the daughter of this Chilperic, to be the meanes of this murderers misery. She was exceeding faire. This quality bred a desire in Clovis, but especially to get footing in Bourgondy, and some interest to deale with the affaires of C that estate: for which reason Gondebault would by no meanes like of that alliance; yet not daring to shew the true cause, he made the pretext of his refusal to be the diuersity of Religion, which could not agree with these vnequall marriages. Clovis prevented it with great policy; for hauing promised Clotilde that she should haue libertie of conscience, he removes the let wherewith Gondebault did crosse him: so as the marriage was concluded. And although Clovis were a Pagan by profession, yet was he no enemy to the Christians, sitting himselfe to the humour of the Gaulois, who generally followed the Christian religion. He suffered his wife likewise to baptise her children: and she a wife Princeesse insinuating with her husband, desired nothing more then to winne him vnto God, the which chanced in this sort. Clovis did succour the Sicambriens his allies, (which be the D inhabitants of Gueldres and Iuliers) against the Germanes. Being in the battell, he found himselfe engaged in the middle of his enemies troopes, and in great danger of his life. He then makes a vow vnto God, that if he would give him the victory, hee would presently submit himselfe to the Christian Church, and be baptised. God heard him. He obtains the victory; and being returned, he resolves to performe his vow. His wife Clotilde infinitely glad of this holy resolution, sends for Saint Remy Bishop of Rheims, (a man of great piety and eloquence) to instruct him in the true doctrine, wherein he was very ignorant, as a man that had made profession of Armes all his life, borne and bred in superstition, and neuer had discurfed of Christian religion, but like a Souldier. It was necessary he should be instructed by a discreet man, that in leaving the vanity of the Pagans, he E were not infected with the errors of the Arrians, which then were dispersed in diuers places. And even his owne sister Lantide was infected therewith.

The preaching of Saint Remy had great efficacy with Clovis; and the example of Clovis with all his men of warre. In this action, these goodly sayings are worthy to be noted: Render thy necke to the yoke in mildnesse, (saith Saint Remy to Clovis) worship that which thou hast burnt, and burne that which thou hast worshipped. And he answered, I worship the true God, which is the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost, the Creator of heauen and earth. So, being baptised, he exhorts his men to the same beleefe. They cry all ioyntly, We leave our mortalld goods, and are ready to follow the immortal. So Clovis was baptised at Rheims by Saint Remy, with great solemnity, and with him three thousand of his Souldiers, to the F incredible ioy of the Gaulois, greatly affected to Christian religion: hoping by this conuerfion to haue better vltage in time to come.

This act is very remarkable, hauing consecrated our Kings to Christian religion, the which hath preferred this Realme vnto this day from most horrible confusions. Ammianus saith, that a Doue brought a viall full of oyle in her bill; at that instant, with the which our Kings are anointed when they are installed. But Gregory of Tours, a more ancient Author, writes onely, that Clovis was baptised. They likewise hold, that Clovis did at that time

The fifth King of FRANCE.

A time change the Royall armes, and that for three Toades, or as the learned say, three diademes guules, in a field argent, he took the flowers de-lis without number. Many monuments of our Kings in the first and second Race, iustifie this change of Armes, made by Clovis, as we see them in the most ancient Temple. Without dilating any more thereof, Charles the sixth, in the Scutcheon of France, reduced the flowers de-lis to three.

This publike profession of Christianity wonne the hearts of all the Gauls vnto Clovis; and did perfect the vnion betwix them and the French, making their yoke easie, and them tractable. Her fortified his command with this bond of Religion, and layd a foundation for the absolute greatnesse of this Monarchy, which euen then beganne to B take place throughout all Gaul. Thus Gaul (with more solemnity then vnder Mero-see) was called France, by the common consent of all Nations: the Gaulois were no more grieued to serue the French, being victors; hauing willingly suffered themselves to be conquered, and hauing one faith and one law, they could not but wish the good of their common country: so much may religion preuaile to vnite mens hearts in a common weale. In this beginning Clovis shewed an excellent fruit of his baptism, exceeding all his conquests. By his last victory he had subdued the Germans, and to accomodate them to obedience, had imposed great and rigorous burthens. But now he doth relieue them: sends home their hostages, and moderates their yoke, shewing thereby that he is growne milder. This humanity was approued as a second victory, and more honorable then the C profit. Truly it is as great a victory, in a great Prince to conquer by clemency, as it is a profitable policy to winne mens hearts by reason. The conquerour that pardons, beautifies his triumph, adding to their conquered bodies their hearts, admiring his vertue no lesse victorious then his forces.

Clovis was ill affected to the Visigoths, who held a great and large Country in Gaul, obscuring the French Monarchy, the which he desired to settle: but he must find some honest pretext to make warre. Although in effect the right of conuenience was his greatest interest, as it is often the most lawfull title of Princes: yet he seeks a quarrell against Alaric King of the Visigoths, vpon the alliance he had made with him, the which (he D sayes) had beene broken, for that the banished men and malefactors of France, had found a free and assured refuge in his dominions: whereunto he added a complaint of their bounds, in the diuision whereof he would resolutely haue the aduantage. But to giue a better colour to this quarrell of State, he ioynes religion: For (saith he to his people) to what end should these Arrians haue so good a part among the Christians? Yet before he would come to open force, he talks of a friendly conference.

The two Kings appoint a day and a place for an interview; to parlee of their affaires. But this meeting increased their hatred: for being both vpon the place, some confident seruants to Clovis, gaue him notice that Alaric had layd an ambush to surprize him in their parlee. Clovis was much moued herewith, and resolves to make warre against Alaric: he raiseth an army, and being ready to march towards Guyenne, behold a new occa- E sion, which makes him turne his forces towards Bourgonne.

We haue shewed, how that Gondebault King of Bourgonne, slew his brother Chilperic, father to Clotilde, vpon the first diuision of their portions after their fathers death. He had two brethren remaining, Gondemar and Gondegesil, of whom he desired infinitely to be freed, hauing too many brethren, and too little land, according to his insatiable desire. Their debate was for Prouence and Dauphine, which they demanded for their portions. Gondebault enioyed the chiefe Cities, except Vienne, which the brethren held. Clovis his army overcomes that of Gondebault, marching victoriously through the Countries of Venaifon, where the battell was fought. Gondebault saues himselfe with great difficulty in Auignon, and is presently besieged by Clovis, who yet grants him an honorable composition, and labours to reconcile him with his brethren: which done, hee F returns into France, and Gondemar and Gondegesil retire into Vienne, dreaming of nothing lesse then to haue their elder brother for an enemy. But Vienne must be the pitfall of their misery, to swallow them both vp, one after another: for behold, Gondebault is with a strong Army at the gates of Vienne: and his brethren are reduced to that extremity, as hauing no meanes to defend themselves, nor to get reliefe from their friends, the City is easily taken, and eury man seeks to saue himselfe as he can. Gondemar flies into a Tower, where he is besieged, assailed, and burnt, with all his troope. Gondegesil is taken aliu aliue after this tragick feare : but being alone, he slips away, and flics to Clovis, whom he A found in armes ready to march vpon this new accident.

Clovis takes new aduice. The ancient hatred he bare to Gondebauld: (who had croffed him in his marriage) the iniustice, and more then barbarous cruelty: the complaint of this poore Prince his allie, who cast himselfe into his armes, had much power to perswade him to the voyage of Bourgongne. But that which made him resolute, was for that Gondebauld prepared to succour Alaric, against whom Clovis did now march with his Forces. Thus the iust iudgement of God provided a scourge for this murderer, who addes rashnesse and infencly to his first disorders. Clovis enters with an army into Bourgongne. Feare doth not onely surpris the Country, but also the peoples iust hatred of B this tyrant, being infamous with so many parricides : so as in few dayes the principall Cities yeeld vnto Clovis, and the rest are ready to submit themselves into his hands, as to their deliuerer.

Gondebauld pursued by God and men, faints : being insolent in prosperity, and daunted in aduersity. All things conspired to his ruine. But as God doth not alwayes take sinners at the bound, hee stayed the blow by means of Cletilde, who grieuing to see her house decay, to the ouerthrow of the citie of Bourgongne, makes sute to her husband, for her vncl and his country, and preuailes so with him, through her intercession, as hee perswades him to passe no further, but to leave the rest to her vncl Gondebauld, with a reasonable peace, whereof the drew the Articles. Thus Clovis dismisseth his army, hauing C only provided for the guard of Vienn, Mafcon, Chalou, and other townes taken from Gondebauld, and he giues the charge of them to Gondegesil.

A treacherous attempt of Gondebauld.

This is all that Gondebauld could hope for in so great a danger : but hee would needs perish : when as he sees himselfe without any enemy by Clovis departure, he marcheth so secretly with his Forces, as in one night he surprised Vienn, by the Conduit heads, guided by him that had them in charge, being cast out of the City, with the scumme of vnprofitable people. Vienn must be the Sepulchre of Gondegesil, as it was of Gondemar : for in this vnexpected surpris, as he and the Bishop fought means to saue themselves in the Temple of Saint Mory, amazement giues an easie entrie vnto Gondebauld, who being master thereof, doth massacre both Gondegesil, his brother, and the Bishop, without any respect. D

A iust punishment of the murderer Gondebauld.

Clovis moued with this treacherous attempt, returnes with his armie, and besieged Gondebauld, who vnable to resist, escapes by night, and saues himselfe in Italy with Thierri King of the Ostrogoths, his friend and confederate. There being tormented in conscience, without all hope of reliefe, he falls into horrible despair, and dies, hatefull euen to those that had receiued him : leauing a notable example to all men, that man is the cause of his owne misery; that he deceiueth himselfe, when as ouer-ruled by his owne passions, he thinks to mocke God freely, who sleeps not, when as men are most secure in their wickednesse. But after a long patience, God payes both the principall and the interest, and he that seeks another mans goods, doth often lose his owne : the halfe being better then E the whole, for to liue quietly with content. This was the end of Gondebauld, and the beginning of the title which the Kings of France pretended to Bourgongne. The States of Prouence, Dauphine, and Sauoy, were dependances on this Crowne. Clovis retaining Dauphine, and the countries adioyning vnto Bourgongne, he left Sauoy, and Prouence to Sigismund, and Gondemar, the children of Gondebauld, ioyning equity and mildnesse to his iust victory.

The first winning of Bourgongne, Dauphine, and Prouence.

Hauing thus settled the affaires of Bourgongne, he marcheth presently with his victorious army into Languedoc, against Alaric King of the Visigoths, who held not onely that goodly Prouince, but all the Country from the Pirenaean mountaines, euen to the bankes of Rone and Loire, as we haue said. Clovis hauing assembled his Army at Tours, F marcheth into Poitou, where Alaric attends him with his Forces, meaning to fight with him at his entrie.

Alaric slain by the hand of Clovis.

The battell is giuen, and much blood shed on either side, but the absolute victory remains to Clovis : as the bodies, the field, and the head of Alaric, whom he slew with his owne hand : an accident very remarkable, that one Prince should kill another in the fury of the fight. This happened in the yeare of our Lord 509. The fruit of this notable victory was so great, as all yeilded to Clovis where he marched. Those of Angouleme

Alaric made shew of resistance : but a great part of the wall being false (as it were miraculously) not onely the City yeilded, but all the country (being terrified) offered their voluntary obedience vnto Clovis : as if God (holding him by the hand) had put him into the possession of all that Prouince, as the lawfull heire. Auvergne makes some shew to resist, but in the end it yeelds, with all the townes of the Prouince. In this general resolt against the Visigoths, Almaric, the sonne of Alaric, gathers a new head in the countie of his obedienc, with wonderfull speed. Clovis seeks him out, and finds him neare to Bourdeaux. The battell is fought, and the slaughter great on either side : the one army fights to honour, and the other for life and goods. But Clovis remains conqueror, who in dereliction of his enemy, calls the place the Arrien field : which name continues vnto this day. Almaric flies to Thierri his confederate, King of the Ostrogoths in Italy, with an intent to returne speedily to be reuenged of Clovis. All the Country remains peaceable to Clovis : yea Tholouse the capitall City of the Goths kingdom. And thus he returnes, leauing a part of his army in garison in the townes of his new conquest, vnder his sonnes command : and in his Standard (as a trophie) he caried for a deuice, Pestis, quidi, vici, he came, and law, and ouercame, like vnto Cesar. This great conquest gotten with incredible celerity, and admirable successe, is a worthy prooffe of Gods prouidence, who disposed of States according to his wife and iust pleasure, pulling downe one, and raising vp another.

C Thus Clovis hauing expelled the remainder of the Romanes, seized on the Bourgongnons estate, and of the Visigoths : remaining in a manner absolute Lord of the Gaules, vnder the title of the Realme of France. He desired much to liue at Tours (as indeed it is the goodly garden of France) but seeking to giue a perfect forme to this new estate, (as one head hath but one body) he chooseth Paris for his capitall Citie, being seated in the Ile of France, and the true mansion of Kings, as well for the fertile beauty of the country thereabouts, as for the concourse of Riuer, which bring infinite commodities from all parts, by the channell of the Riuer of Seine, into the which all the rest fall, as the common store-house of all commodities. Thus Paris from small beginnings (as may be noted by the low buildings and narrow streets of the Ile, being the first plot) is growne to a wonderful greatness, being the head City of all the Realme.

D The estate of Clovis force, published all ouer, with a great renowne of his valour, moued Anastasijs Emperour of the East, to desire his friendship: although he had more reason to be his enemy, hauing dispossessed him of his ancient inheritance. Thus the Empire declined, flattering his most dangerous enemies, against whom hee should oppose himselfe. Hee salutes him with a very honorable Ambassage, sends him a Senators robe, the priuiledge of a Patrician and Citizen of Rome, and the dignity of a Consul: in signe of the honour his successors should haue, to be Emperours, and to preserve the reliques of the Empire from a general shipwracke. Clovis entertained Anastasijs Ambassadors with honour and bounty, desirous to overcome them with courtesie, as well as by E the valour of his victorious armes.

The Emperour sends Ambassadors to Clovis.

The violent course of Clovis victories seemed vnresistable : but behold an vnexpected enemy, not onely staies him suddenly, but takes from him the greatest part of his new conquests, defeats his army, and draws him into danger neuer to performe any thing worthily. The Nation of the Gothes was then very great, being dispersed in diuers parts : in Gaule, Italy, and Spaine, so as one people issued from the same beginning (as we haue said) was distinguished by diuers names, to marke the places of their severall abodes. The Visigoths or rather Westgoths, were they that dwelt in the West, that is to say, in Gaule, west to Italy : the Ostrogoths or Eastgoths possessed Italy, by consequence East to Gaule. These Eastgoths had done great and notable exploits in Italy, taken and sackt F Rome, and hauing seized on the goodliest countries of Italy, had there established a kingdom vnder their name, the which was ruined by the Lombards, and the Lombards by the French, as we shall see in the continuance of this History.

These Gothes (named Getae by the Greekes) an ancient people of Asia, scattered themselves first along the Riuer of Danubie, entering the Country neare to Constantinople, as well on the maine land, as in the Taurique Cherfonef, neare to this quarter. And so extending their limits, did possesse Valachie and Hungary, and in the end Scandia, and the Country which lies neare the Riuer of Vistula, in the Country of Sweden towards the Balticque Baltique Sea: where they made their last retreat, after many losses, received in diuers A places, seeking of their fortunes. The Realme of Gothland carries their name even vnto this day. I thought good by the way to note the estate of the Goths, being fit for this Subject.

Thus the successe of the French forces, and the alliance so carefully sought by the Emperor (a capitall enemy to the Gothike name) did easily moue Thierri King of the East Goths, to succour his kinsman Atharick, a Prince spoiled of his possessions: whose example did sollicit all the Goths to prevent the danger, which did threaten them very neare. So as from Italy, Sicily, Sclauonia, and Dalmatia by his owne means, and the credit of his friends, he gathers together fourescore thousand fighting men, the which he giues to Thiba to lead against Clouis; and he himselfe remaines in Italy, to make head against the Emperours designs, lest hee should cause some division in fauour of Clouis his confederate. The Gothike army enters by Piedmont, takes Grace and Antibou; and in short time all Prouence obeyes him.

A great losse both of Prouinces and men.

The people of Languedoc (louing their old masters, and not able to endure the insoleney of a new yeeld easily to the stronger. Prouence remaines thus to the East Goths; and Languedoc returns to the Wisigoths: Clouis being brought asleepe with the imagination of a generall triumph, awakes at this brute: hee armes his marchers speedily against the enemy: he is beaten, and loseth 30000 men at this encounter: wherby it appeared, that he held not victories at his girdle, nor they proceeded not from his valour. Clouis who vanquished euerywhere, finding himselfe beaten, and not able presently to make head against a victorious enemy, returns into France, rather made then transported with furious choller, tossing in his braines how to bee reuenged of so notable a disgrace. The Gothes giue him leave to runne and take cold: being contented to haue recovered their owne. After this he attempted no more against them, and the greatest part of Bourgongne returned to the children of Gondebaud. But in the end, both Prouence and Bourgongne shall be incorporated to the Crowne, by diuers accidents, the which we will note in diuers places.

Clouis cruel practices to become great.

Clouis suruived five yeares after all these losses, remaining commonly at Paris, hauing no heroic mind to attempt any great conquests, yet of a cruell disposition, which made him die with desire of other mens goods: He employed all his wits to put his kinsmen to death, hauing some Signiorities included within the compasse of his great monarchy, with an imagination to leaue his children a great estate vnitied. In this designe he puts to death Chararic, to haue Amiens; Ragnachaire, to become master of Cambray; & Sigebert, to haue no companion at Metz, although he were acknowledged in all these places for Soueraign. This rauishing of other mens goods was vncurable: but his tragickall proceedings to haue it, was more detestable. I tremble to represent the horror of these execrable crimes: you may read them in the original of Gregory of Tours. The truth of the History requires they should be registred, but reason would haue the memory of so dangerous examples buried in obliuion. I desire to be dispensed withall, if I discoure not of these monstrous enormities. A modest tragedy goares not the scaffold with the blood of Iphigenia, being content to report by a messenger, that she was slaine by her fathers command, drawing a curtain to hide the blood. But if any one will vige me with the debt which a History doth owe, I will say that Clouis caused Chararic to be slaine, hauing seized on him and his sonne, and condemned them to a Monastery. As they were cutting off their haire the son seeing his father weep bitterly, he said: These greene branches will grow againe, (meaning the haire they cut off) for the stocke is not dead: but God will suffer him to perish that causeth them to be cut off. Clouis aduerted of this free speech: They complain for the losse of their haire, (sayes he) let their heads be cut off. And so they were put to death. To get Ragnachaire (who had faithfully serued him both against Siagrim, and in all his other enterprises) he corrupted some of his domestick seruants, with promise of great rewards, in token whereof he sent them bracelets of latten guilt. These traytors bring him Ragnachaire and his brother with their hands and feet bound; who beholding them: Outcasts (saith he) of our Race, unworthy of the blood of Merouce, are you not ashamed to suffer themselves to bee thus bound? you are unworthy to liue: repay the dishonour you haue done to our blood with your bloods: and so he stricke either of them with a Battle-Axe which he held in his hand, and flew them both, in the presence of his Captaines and Councell. But when as the tray-

A tors demanded their reward, and complained of his bracelets: Auant Traytors (saith he) Is it not enough that I suffer you to liue? I loue the treason, but I hate traytors. But the last exceeds the rest: He perswades the sonne of Sigebert to kill his father. This infamous parricide murders him and returns to Clouis, to put him in possession of his treasures, whom he had thus massacred; who being in the chamber and bending downe into a Chest, to draw forth bags full of gold, he caused his braines to be beaten out, and being the stronger, seized on Metz, making a good shew to the people, as ignorant of this murder.

Thus Clouis liued, thus he reigned, and thus he dyed in the yeare of our Lord 514: of the age of forty five, the thirtieth yeare of his reigne, in the flower of his enterprises in the Citie of Paris: a Prince whom we must put in balance, to counterpoise his vertues with his vices; valiant, politicke, cold, wise, temperate, diligent in execution, of admirable authoritie, and endued with excellent politicke vertues fit for an Estate. Contrariwise, he was extremely couetous, ambitious, wilfull, cruell, bloody, infinitely giuen to the world, immortalizing his good hap in this mortall life, by his many enterprises, the which he feared not to execute with the losse of other mens goods and liues. We must not wonder if we reade of confusions in the following reignes: wherein wee shall first see blood for blood, and the robber robbed, spoiled, dispossessed, according to the truth of Oracles: Woe to thee that robbest, for thou shalt be robbed: that killest, for thou shalt be killed: the same measure thou measurest shall be measured to thee againe.

C Under his reigne the Romane Empire vanished quite in the West. Spaine, Gaule, Italy and Germany, were seized on by strange nations, retaining no markes of the Romane name. The East had yet some shewes of the Empire, wherof Constantinople was the seat. Leo, Zeno, Anastasi Emperours liued in those daies, with many enemies, shame and losse. The Pope of Rome thrust himselfe forward amidst their confusions and ruines, recovering that which the Emperours had lost. Leo, Hilary, Simplicius, Felix, Gelasius, liued in those time, learned men. The Councell was held againe at Chalcedon, against Entiches and Discors.

D The sixt Reigne vnder the foure sonnes of CLOVIS:

Childbert, Clotaire, Clodomir, Thierri:

Who reigned together forty and two yeares, as Kings of France, yet with a particular title vnder this generall: but in the end Clotaire remained King alone; and therefore their reignes are distinguished.

E To this coniunction of foure brethren some giue the sixt degree in the number of Kings, and Childbert as the eldest, beares the title.

CHILDEBERT, the sixt King of France,

Rule alone in a great vnitied Kingdome, was Clouis his doingsigne, but he fees his resolutions frustrate: for this vaste body, compounded of many peeces, is scarce vnitied, but it is diuoyed againe, yea in his life time: and the rest is diuided into foure parts to his children, according to the lawes of nature, but to the visible preiudice of the Estate, incompatible of so many masters, as the following discourse will shew. A lesson both for great and small, and a notable president of the vanity of humane enterprises: where the end is not alwaies answerable to the beginning. They take great paines to settle a firme estate, which shall be, soone dismembered, either by law or force, and that shall be dispersed suddenly, which was gathered together too hastily.

Let

Let every one consider, what he leaues to his Children, for the which there is no war. A rantable caution, but a good title. These foure Sonnes diuide the Realme into foure Kingdomes. Childebert was King of Paris, and vnder this realme was comprehended the Princes of Poitou, Maine, Tournaie, Champaigne, Anjou, Guyenne and Auvergne. Cloaire King of Soissons: and the dependances of this realme were Vermandois, Picardy, Flaunders and Normandy. Clodomyr King of Orleans: and the estates of this Realme were all the Duchy of Orleans, Bourgongne, Lionois, Dauphine, and Prouence. Thierry was King of Metz: and to his realme were subiect, the country of Loraine, and all the countries from Rheims vnto the Rhine, and beyond it all Germany, which was the ancient patrimony of the Kings of France. He was receiued in this royall portion with his brethren, although he were a bastard, the which hath bene likewise practised by others in the first Race. And as euery one of these foure Kings called himselfe King of France, so they also added the name of their principall City where they held their Court. Thus they called them by special title, Kings of the City where they had their residence. And in truth euery one caried himselfe as King in the countries vnder his obedience, notacknowledging the elder, but by mouth onely.

Horrible confusion among brethren.

As the plurality of Masters is a plague in an estate, so is it miraculous that the realme had not bene ruined by so many Kings: especially amidst such monstrous confusions, which then reigned, full of trecheries, cruelties, and parricides. I tremble to enter into this labyrinth, the which I will but passe ouer, measuring the Readers sorrow by my griefe in writing and reading these tragical confusions. But let vs obserue things by order. After these foure brethren had peaceably made their diuisions, and taken lawes of their owne accord (in the yeere 515, according to the most approued calculation), they marry their sister Cloilde to Almaric, sonne to Alaric, King of the Visigoths, who had recovered a good part of Languedoc, the which Cleuis had taken from his father, and by this marriage they yeld vnto him the City of Toulouse. But this alliance was the cause of great diuisions, and ruine. Ambition and Couetousnesse (good Counsellors of State) made euery one to conceiue as great a Kingdom for himselfe as that of his father, perfwading them to attempt any thing to be great. Bourgongne was quietly returned into the possession of Gondebaunt his children, Sigismund had the name of King, as the elder, and Gondemar a portion.

Clodomyr King of Orleans, as nearest neighbour, casts his eyes vpon this goodly country, although he had no caule of pretension, but onely conueniency. Yet he finds a colour to beginne this quarrell. The rights pretended by his mother Cloilde, issued from the House of Bourgongne, and the zeale of Iustice, to chastise Sigismund, for that hee had slaine his eldest sonne, to please his second wife and her Children. He enters into Bourgongne with a mighty army, seizeth on Sigismund, his wife and Children, brings them to Orleans, and there casts them all into a well. Thus God punished the cruelty of Sigismund, an vnkinde father, by a cruell and disloyall hand. Clodomyr presumed, that hee had conquered all, having slaine the King of Bourgongne. But the Bourgongnons, incensed with this cruelty, confirme Gondemar in his brothers seat, and leaue an army to defend him against Clodomyr.

The armies ioyne, Clodomyr putt vp with this first successe, promised vnto himselfe a second triumph, who thrusting himselfe rashly into his enemies troopes, is slaine with a Lance, and is knowne by his long haire, the marke of Kings, and Princes of the blood, as we haue said. The Bourgongnons cut off his head, search it on the top of a Lance, and make shew thereof to the French, in desition: who retire themselves after the death of their General. But Childebert and Cloaire his brethren, returne into Bourgongne with a strong army, and force Gondemar to flee into Spaine, leauing them free possession of the realme, the which was their proiect, rather then the reuenge of this brothers death. Bourgongne was diuided among the brethren, as a common prey: all the realme of Bourgongne is therein comprehended. Thierry King of Metz had his part, but the poore Children of Clodomyr are not only excluded, but two of them are barbarously slaine by the cruell commandement of their vnnatural Vncles: and they say that Cleuis slew one of them with his own hands, in the presence of Childebert: the other was thrust into a Monastery. This confusion was followed by two others: Thierry King Metz, making war against them of Turinge, called his brother Cloaire to his aide, being repulsed at the first by the force of that

A that nation; but assisted by his brother, he preuailes, and the vanquished stand at the mercy of the conquering brethren: but behold they fall to quarrell for the spoile.

520

Thus the end of a forraign war was the beginning of a ciuill diffention betwixt them. They leaue Forces, with intent to ruine one another. Childebert ioynes with his brother Thierry, against Cloaire. Such was the good government of these brethren, as desire and ambition did counsell them. They are in armies, ready to murder one another. As their armies stood in field ready to ioyne, behold a goodly cleare day ouercast suddenly with such darknesse, that all breaks out into lightning, thunder and violent stormes, so as the armies were forced to leaue the place, and by this aduertisement (as it were from heauen,) these Kings, assembled to shed blood, change their minds, and turne their furious hatred into brotherly concord. Thus God (the protector of this Estate) hath watched ouer it, to preferue it, euen when as they fought to ruine it, and that men hastened to their owne destructions. But from thence the vnited brethren passe into Languedoc, against Almaric King of the Visigoths, their brother in law. The cause of their quarrell came from their sister Cloilde, married to this Gothe, as we haue said: so as the, which should be the vniing of their loues, was the cause of their bloody diffention. She was a Christian, and he an Arrian. This difference in religion was cause of the ill vllage she receiued from her husband, and his subiecs. These brethren, incensed by the complaint and calling of their sister, enter into Almarics Country with their Forces: who hauing no means to resist, seekes to saue himselfe: but he is taken and brought before his brethren in law, by whose commandement he was slaine.

Warre betwixt the brethren.

An admirable reconciliation.

Thus Childebert and Thierry, hauing spoiled the treasure, and wasted the Country of their confederates, return into France, accompanied with their sister; but she died by the way, inioying little the fruit of her vnkind impatience, although shadowed with the cloake of inconsiderate zeale. Thierry dies soone after, leauing Theodebert his Son, heire both of his Realme, and of his turbulent and ambitious humor. A part of Bourgongne was giuen him with the title of a King, the which he left to his Son, and as a chiefe legacie, the harred he did beare to his Brother Cloaire King of Soissons. As soone as he sees himselfe King by the deceale of his father, he takes part with his Vncle Childebert King of Paris, against Cloaire his other Vncle, but by chance they were reconciled. Theodebert impatient of rest, seeking where to employ his Forces, finds that the Danes (a people of the North,) did scoure along the Sea coast, to the great hinderance of the French Merchants: he marcheth against them, being resolute to fight with them. These Forces were better employed then against his brother: so the successe was more happy, for hee chased away the Danes, hauing defeated a great number, and purged the Ocean from pyrates. This exploit wonne him great reputation in all places, so as hee is sought vnto by the Ostrogoths in Italy, being pressed by Belisarius Lieutenant General for the Emperour Iustinian, and a very great capitaine, who had recovered Sicily, Naples, and Pouille from them, and in the end the City of Rome, which he fortified. As the Goths estate declined daily in Italy, Theodebert their King reiected, and Vitiger chosen in his place, Theodebert comes into Italy, putt vp with his victory: he takes footing, and makes head against Belisarius: but forced with sickness, he retires to his owne house, leauing three chiefe Capitaines for the guard of the places conquered. In his absence the Goths are defeated, and Vitiger slaine. Totila succeeds him, who (hauing taken and sackt Rome) did forsooke the Goths estate in Italy, as he became fearefull to the Romanes.

A good and happy warre.

But the chance turned against him: his army was defeated, and himselfe slaine: and to increase the mischiefe, those great Capitaine left by Theodebert were slaine one after another, so as the Goths being chased out of Italy, by Narses, all Theodeberts great hopes vanished: yet he laboured to attempt some great enterprise against the Emperour Iustinian, and drew much people to it: but hauing made this goodly shew, and put himselfe and his friends to great expences, he was forced to returne out of Italy, without effecting of any thing: leauing a goodly example to Princes, not to attempt lightly an vnecessary war, lest they buy losse and shame at too high a rate. In the end Theodebert (who thought to haue vanquished the mightiest enemies,) was slaine by a wild Bull, going a hunting: and his great enterprises were interred with him in the same graue, hauing hunted after vanity, and found death at the end of his immortal designs.

ringes, the which he did not long enjoy, dying without children, and almost without any memory that he had lived: but onely that he had by will, left his Vncle Clotaire heire of all his goods, whereby there sprung vp a new warre. Childebert endured this testament impatiently, as well for that he was excluded, as also for that his brother was made more mighty by his Nephewes estate: so couetousnesse and enuie giue him aduice to crosse him. Clotaire had one bastard sonne called Granus, a sufficient man, but very wicked and audacious, who (for his insolencies) was in disgrace with his father. Childebert resolves to oppose this sonne against the father, and to vie him in the execution of his malicious intent. Thus abusing the absence of Clotaire, (who was busied in warre against the Saxons), hee goes to field with a great Armie, supposing to haue to doe but with young men and irresolute: and the more to amaze them, he gaue it out that Clotaire was dead. This report was coloured with such cunning (as men doe often beleue that which they feare) that these yong Princes (seeing themselves ouer-charged with great Forces) yeeld to a preiudicial peace with their Vncle. This heart-burning seemed to extend further, when as death surpriseth Childebert, who dies the yeere 549, without any children, and leaves his enemy Clotaire for Successor, being vnable to carry his Realme with him.

A horrible punishment of a rebellious Son.

Clotaire returns out of Saxony, being offended with his bastard. Hee pursues him into Britany, whither he was fled, and by a wonderful accident (guided by the Iustice of God, the reuenger of the sonnes rebellion against the Father,) Clotaire findes his son with his wife in a peasants house, where (transported with fury) heburnes them aliue, (yet not extinguishing the memory of his rebellion) to terrifie rebellious children by so memorable a president. Thus there passed forty five yeeres in the barbarous & vnhappy reignes of these foure soueraigne Masters, children to the great Clouis: in the which there is nothing memorable, but the remembrance of Gods iust judgement against those that suffer themselves to be transported by their passions: for all these vicious reignes were vnhappy, passed with much paine, and ended with much misery: represented to the perpetuall infamy of the vnkinde cruelties of their Kings.

CLOTAIRE THE FIRST, The seventh King of France.

CLOTAIRE remained sole King of France by the death of his brethren: for their children were dead, and Childebert the eldest died without issue. Behold the fruit of so great paines, after their diuisions, to erect great Monarchies. Clotaire reigned five yeeres alone: he had by two wines, five sonnes and one daughter, that is, Cherebert, Chilperic, Sigebert, Gontran, Gautier, and Clofude: not reckoning Granus, whom he had by a Concubine. His reignes was short and wretched. He fought to extort the thirds of all Ecclesiastical livings for his priuate affaires: but the Clergie opposed themselves against him, so as his threats prevailed not. In the beginning he subdued the Saxons, subjects to the French: but the Turingiens being vp in armes, and hee about to suppress them, the Saxons ioyne with them, to withstand him with their common Forces. Yet these mutinous nations (seeing themselves encountered by too strong a party) craue pardon, and promise him obedience. Clotaire refusing to accept it, forceth them to make defence: the which they performed so desperately, as they defeated the French: and Clotaire with great difficulty, saved himselfe.

It is an indication for a Prince to thrust his subjects into despair.

An example for Princes, not to thrust their subjects into despair: but to imbrace all occasions wisely, that may purchase a willing obedience, and not to seek it by extremities. After this defeat, he returns into France, and being at Compiegne, he desires to go abunting. Being old and decayed, hee heats himselfe, falls into a quotidian, and dies, the yeere 567. Hee was much grieved in his sicknesse, hauing liued too too ill: but he protested, that he hoped in the mercies of God. As our histories report.

Before that he ruled as King alone, he erected the little Realme of Yvetot, vpon this occasion.

An occasion. On good Friday he slew Gautier of Yvetot his seruant, in the Chappell whereas he heard seruice. They report the cause diuersly. The greatest part hold, that the King had rauished his wife, lodging in his house, so as he that was beaten suffered the punishment. Pope Eugenius displeased with this infamous murder, condemned him to repaire the fault vpon paine of Excommunication. Clotaire for satisfaction ordaines that from thenceforth the Lords of Yvetot should be free from all homage, seruice, and obedience due to the King, for the land of Yvetot in the Country of Normandy. And so this small Signiory hath continued long with the title and prerogative of a Realme, vntill that this title of a Realme was changed into a Principality, the which the House of Bellay doth now enjoy.

This was the life and reigne of Clotaire the first of that name, vicious and vnforgotten, followed with a confused and horrible tragedy in his children; whom we must marke do finally in the front of this tumultuous reigne, thereby to walke more safely in the blinde maze of these obscure governments.

Clotaire the first of that name had foure Sonnes:

Cherebert King of France, Chilperic King of Soissons, Gontran King of Orleans or Bourgondy, Sigebert King of Metz, or Austrasia.
All which reigned together fifteen yeeres; but in this eighth Reigne they giue the Rucke and Name of King to Cherebert, as to the eldest, although each of them called himselfe King of France, and commanded absolutely over the Countreies vnder their obedience.

CHEREBERT, the eighth King of France.

The strange government of the foure Sonnes of Clouis we haue already seene; let vs now view the rest of this table in the children of Clotaire, who furnishing his brethren and their children, obtained the Realme alone, but presently to be diuided into foure parts. Of five sonnes lawfully begotten, foure suruiued him: Cherebert the eldest, Chilperic, Sigebert, and Gontran. His body was scarce interred, when as the fire of diuision kindled among the brethren, about the diuiding of the Realme. Chilperic a crafty and proud man findes meanes to seize on his fathers treasure, and labours to become master of the City of Paris.

But not able to effect it, he was forced by his brethren (supported by the chiefe Noblemen of the Court) to come to a diuision, euery one according to his order. Cherebert, as the eldest of the house of France, hath Paris for his part. Gontran, Orleans, and Bourgogne. Chilperic, Soissons; Sigebert, Metz, or Austrasia: euery portion with his dependancies. After this diuision of parts, their wills were so diuided, as it is strange the Realme had not bene vtterly ruined amidst the horrible confusions, in so feeble beginnings.

Diuisiō of portions excludes a diuision of hearts.

Prouence, by consent of the brethren, was giuen to Gontran King of Orleans, and Bourgogne. But notwithstanding this accord, Sigebert, King of one part of Bourgogne, and of Austrasia, contends for it with his brother, and lowes diuision among the Prouenfalls, doubtfull to whom they should yeeld obedience in this contention. It had bene wonne and lost by Clouis, (as we haue shewed) but soone after the death of Clouis Thierry the Ostrogoth (who had wonne it) lost it againe, through the inclination of the Prouenfalls, who willingly came to the ancient obedience of the Crowne of France. And the Emperour Iustin the second, liking it better in the Frenchmens hands, their in the Ostrogoths, leaues them that which he cannot take from them. In this respect, he added his consent by his deed onely. After the death of Cherebert, his brethren contend for his spoile, with irreconcilable hatred. Gontran was the most temperate and tractable, desiring that this discord for parts, might be determined by the French Clergie, as iudges competent, and without passion. But his aduice was not allowed. Chilperic and Sigebert ambitious ambitious and turbulent men, would cary it by force, yet was it agreed by common consent, that none of them should enter Paris before this Question were decided touching their portions. But there fell out other accidents vpon this Theater, whereas cunning, malice, impudency, and fury, haue caused both men and women to play a long and tragick Scene, being the authors and enders of these miseries. I tremble at those confusions, whereas Bruneault and Fredogonde two renowned women in our France, for their notable wickednes, shall appeare in diuers Scenes of this Tragedy. Bruneault was daughter to Amthagilde King of Visigoths, the wife of Sigebert King of Metz, or of Austrasia. Fredogonde first was concubine, and after wife to Chilperic King of Soissons. By the policies and impudency of these furious heads, it cannot be spoken how much misery France B suffered during their reignes. But let vs view every thing in order, if any order may be found in the most horrible Chaos of infernall confusions.

One brother makes warre against another.

Sigebert was much troubled in his territories of Germany, to defend them against the Huns. Chilperic embracing this occasion against his brother, enters his Country, with a great Army, and takes from him the Citie of Rheims. This surpris awakes Sigebert: and for that he would not lose the principall, to keepe the accessory, hee leaues Germany, and speeds into France, wonderfully grieved with the wrong he had received from his brother: pursuing his reuenge with such vehemency, that he takes Soissons the capital City of his Realme, with his sonne Theodebert, forcing him to retire with Fredogonde to Tournay, being assailed of his cowardly designe. Thus Sigebert comes a conquerour to Paris, C where he is receiued by common consent: and so all the Cities belonging vnto Cherebert yeld him obedience. But as he thought himselfe a peaceable King, mounted to the top of his desires, hauing nothing to crosse him, but wallowing in his delights, behold, two yong Souldiers (suborned by Fredogonde) came to his Court, enter freely into the hall, and approach to neare him, and with such opportunitee, as either of them slabs him with his dagger, and he falls downe dead in the place. These murderers were suddenly torne in peeces, so as they could not be knowne, nor declare by whose commandment they had committed this murder; yet was it generally thought that this was the practice of Fredogonde, to free her husband, and to make the way more easie for her affaires by the death of this brother who crossed her most. In truth, the death of Sigebert changed the countenance of the Court: euery one runnes after Chilpericks fortune, who was receiued King of France, D in the place of his elder Brother, and hee entertaines all those with fauour that offer him seruice.

CHILPERIC THE FIRST,

The ninth King of France.

Thus Chilperic beganne to reigne in the yeare 578: and reigned fourteene yeares at Paris and Soissons, while that Childbert the sonne of Sigebert reigned in Austrasia, and Gontran at Orleans and Bourgogne. He found Bruneault the widow of Sigebert at Paris, a woman of a subtle and audacious spirit: so as fearing lest she should animate his sonne against him, he confined her to Rouan, whither he likewise sent his sonne Merovee, to take possession of the City: but in stead of taking the Citie, he was surprisid by the beauty of Bruneault, who could so cunningly gaine the loue of the Inhabitants, that the Bishop himselfe allowed of this marriage although shee were his Aunt. Chilperic moved with fame of this loue which proceeded vnto marriage, came to Rouan, and according to the Ecclesiasticall Discipline degraded and banished this Bishop: and by his absolute authority puts Merovee into a Cloyster. But hee stayed not long there; for after the departure of Chilperic, a certaine friend of his who was called Basson drew him forth being set on by Fredogonde, hauing brought with him three hundred men (too small a number

A to fight, and too many to fly.) And so it hapned to Merovee, for being pursued and taken by his father Chilperic, he was slaine by his commandement. And last Audouere his mother (a vertuous Princeesse) and Clouis her other son, should seek means of reuenge, to retiect his wife; and exalteth Clouis his other sonne to be secretly slaine, being brother germane to Merovee. These disorders could not be done without the complaint of the Nobility against Fredogonde, who held not yet the degree of a wife with Chilperic, although she had free access both to his Court and bed, from the which she had disposed his lawful wife. Chilperic (to pacifie these complaints) pretends some reasons for this diuorce: and disguising the murders cunningly, he takes Galsinde to wife, the daughter of Athanagilde King of Spain. But the impatience of Fredogonde doth soone dissolve the bonds of this ballfull respect, thrusting Chilperic into such a fury against this second wife, as he strangles her, and maries Fredogonde publicly: who possessed her husband so absolutely, as he commanded imperiously, vnder the cloake of his authoritie.

He opposeth his subsidies.

From these domestick crimes, insolvency rageth against the poore people, by taxes, impositions, and insupportable exactions: and report imputes all to the deuires of the same workman. Complaints found out in all places: but absolute authority had so prevailed, as they could find no remedy: the people being weak, and such as they might haue had means to countenance the ancient French liberty; were either terrified, or enhanced by this Proserpine. But Chilperic must beare the punishment of his execrable wickednesse, by the malice of her who had made him an instrument to massacre brother, children, and wife, and to consume by degrees his poore subsidies. Whilest that Chilperic loved her exceedingly, she affected a Nobleman in Court called Landry de la Tour (who by her fauour had obtained two of the greatest offices of the Crowne, that is, of Duke of France, and Maire of the Palace) to whom she most vildly afforded the best place in the Kings-bed. This villanous and detestable loue, was cunningly cloaked with the deuires of this tempter: who hauing a sonne by Chilperic, a new gage of loue, she purchased daily more credit with him. But this was a short comfort for Chilperic, for four months after the birth of this sonne, whom he named Clouis, he was vnhappy slaine by her and Landry, when he least expected death: this was the occasion. One morning as Chilperic D (ready to goe to hunting) came booted into his wives chamber to salute her, hee found her combing of her head, with her haire ouer her face: drawing neare vnto her without speaking, hee toucheth her in iest with his riding wand on the hinder part of the head: she supposing it to be her adulterer Landry, accustomed to come secretly vnto her at all houres, saith vnto him; In my iudgement Landry, a good Knight should alwayes strike before, and not behind. The King vnderstanding by halfe a word, more then he desired to know, departs amazed, takes horse and goes a hunting, not with any intent to kill the beast, but deuiuing how he might be freed of Fredogonde and Landry. But hee had to doe with a woman of too subtle and wily a spirit, who hauing passed her apprenticeship in so many other murders, could soone resolute to depriue her husband of his life, to saue her owne. Without any further delay she sends for Landry, reports to him the history, concludes with him to kill the King her husband in his coming from hunting, and findes ministers to execute this designe: the which succeeded as they had plotted against Chilperic, suffering in the end (by the same hand which he had caused to shed so much blood) the horrible paine of his miserable massacres: for as hee came melanchollicke from the chase, accompanied onely with one Page, he was suddenly set vpon by these murderers, who slew him with his Page, so commodiously, as they returne vnderfired to the troope, as if they had neuer dreamt thereon.

The punishment of these crimes.

The King is found dead, euery one cries out, euery one runnes vp and downe, and those first of all that had done the deed. But it was giuen out that the murderers were fled into Loraine, from whence assuredly they were come by Childberts command. The Court is filled with teares, especially Fredogondes chamber, who continued in passions with her Landry, and could not be comforted: the one calling for her good husband, the other for his good master: but the quick sighted held them for Crocodiles teares. Thus liued, and thus died Chilperic, hated and deserted euen then, and of the posterity, for prooffe that a wicked life will haue a wicked end: and that God ruines the wicked by themselves, euen when they promise vnto themselves all impunity. They adde impiety to his execrable wickednesse: for he denied the truth of the three Persons in one Deity, and the incarnation of the Sonne of God, wherein consists the hope of our saluation. But admiffed by the French Church, he protested to leave his error. A monstrous reigne vnder a monstrous King: where Potestates may see, that misery is the true reward of him and that horrible crimes are punished with extraordinary pains even in this life. This tragical end of Chilperic, a wicked and vnfortunate Prince, hapned in the year of our

CLOTAIRE THE SECOND,

The tenth King of France.

A memorable Reigne in confusion.

Efficacy of the law of State.

He beginning, middest, and end of this reigne is remarkable, being apparent, that God is the true guardian of this Realme, without whom it must needs haue perished in these strange confusions. Clotaire a young child of foure months, gouerned by his mother a most wicked woman, being come to years, he findes himselfe incumberd with many wars, yea ciuill wars against his owne kinsmen and blood. Who will not then con-fesse the illue of his reigne (being peaceable and well governed) to be a singular testimony of the prouidence of God towards this Estate. This young child, the sonne of bad parents, was notwithstanding receiued for lawfull King by the French, by vertue of the fundamentall Law, which had appointed this Realme to be hereditary: Whereby is shewed how farre the election of our Kings extend euén in this first Race.

But to conceiue well the diuers accidents of this reigne, we must remember, that Clotaire the first had foure sons, Chilperic King of Paris, who is reckoned the right King of France, and died without children: Sigebert King of Metz, slaine by Fredegonde, and Gontran King of Orleans, who furnished all his brethren, a good and a wise Prince, and
wife Brunehault, a subtle and a wicked woman. This ground being laid, I will returne to the course of my History.

Gontran King of Orleans, vncle by the father to this young King, was his nearest and most assured kinsman, so as by a generall consent of the French, he was called to be Regent of the King and Realme. And now they talked of an assembly: Fredegonde (saying the light and liberty of publique assemblies, fearing not onely to be reiected from the go-uernment, but to be accused for the murder of her husband) prevents the States from the calling of Gontran, the first Prince of the blood, and the Kings vncle, as they shoulde haue done, if leifure had suffered them to assemble, and to speake in an vnited body, with publike authority. Thus he gaires time, beseeching the chiefe of the Councell, to pro-uide for the Conuocation of the Estates; and in the meane time to giue order that Gon-tran may come to Paris, both to informe of the execrable murder, and also to take vpon him the charge of her sonne, and the gouernment of the Commonweale. This discourse was farre from her thoughts, but she supposed to make an euasion by this goodly shew.
And in the meane time she practised to kill Gontran. She did write vnto him in all humility, holding him as a father to the king her son, and the support of her widowhood. Gontran foreseeing the policy of Fredegonde, provided so wisely, that being arriued at Paris, hee was receiued by a generall consent Regent of the Realme. He made no shew of discontent to Fredegonde, who notwithstanding (hauing a guilty conscience) packs vp her baggage being ready to flye vpon the least shew that Gontran would call her into question.
But it was not his meaning: his onely proiect was to bring vp his young nephew, and to preferre him with his Realme, wherein he was borne, supposing this milde manner of proceeding to be the best, both for the King and the Realme.

Thus without any alteration, he wisely diffembles all the actions of Fredegonde, he re-specks her as the Kings mother, and employes her in the education of her sonne. And knowing

A knowledgeable King, he makes a progresse throughout the Realme, leading with him this young infant, with the mother, receiuing in all places the oath of fidelity and obedience. Being returned to Paris, he giues him in guard to the mother, and applyed himselfe wholly to the gouernment of the Realme. As the affaires were managed with this good order, two great difficulties crosse Gontran almost at one instant: for Childebert King of Metz (zealous of his vncles authority) requires to be associated in the Regency, the which he pretended to appertaine vnto him, with the same right it did to Gontran and Fredegonde: for the punishing of whom he complained much, both of the foulness of the fact, which should not remaine unpunished, and of Gontran's sufferance, which was too palpable. For the which Gontran provided, Ropping Childebert's entrance into Paris, and causing Fredegonde to retire her selfe quietly to Rouen, by reason of the peoples hatred, returned by Childebert's complaint. And for that he would not seeme to haue altogether neglected the punishing of Chilperic's murder, he caused information to be made against a Chamberlaine of the Kings, called Cherulphe, who being found guilty, he caused him to be slaine in the Temple, whither he was fled. And so proceeded no farther in this search, left Fredegonde should be found too farre engaged. Besides this crosse, there happened a second, for one named Gondebauld, hauing termed himselfe a long time to be the sonne of the great Clotaire, and kept in a Cloyster: in the end he escaped, and was openly maintained by Childebert, who sought but a colour of trouble and inuocation. He is followed by a part of the Nobility and Clergy, and seizeth on many good townes in Guienne.
And hauing written his Letters to all the Prouinces, he carries himselfe for lawfull heyre of the Realme, with better right (saide he) then this young child, the Son of a strumpet: And by consequence a doubtfull heyre to the Crowne.

That which was most feared in this new accident, was the spirit and force of Childebert: but Gontran prevented it with iudgement. For seeing himselfe old, and without children, and knowing his Nephewes humour, he doth institute him his heyre, and by that means makes him to abandon Gondebauld, by this supposed King left by Childebert, was loone abandoned by all the rest, and by them was deliuered into the hands of Gontran, who presently put him to death. And hauing assembled the Clergy of the Realme, he caused the Bishops to be condemned, who had so rashly followed the frenzie of this bold Impostor. Gontran hauing with such dexterity prevented these dangerous difficulties, and performed those good offices to the King his Nephew, in his infancy, he retires himselfe to Chaalons, where loone after he died without children, leaving his estate to Childebert, and the Realme of his poore pupill (who had scarce attained the age of ten years) to the mercy of the waues and tempests of all sorts of miseries incident vnto States.

Gontran was no looner dead, but the ambitious desire of Childebert, grown great by the new Estates of Orleans and Bourgongne, inflamed him against young Clotaire, conceiuing an assured victory in his over-weening braine, imagining soone to suppress a young child and a woman ill beloued. But the God of victories had otherwise disposed: for Childebert hauing brought a mighty army to field, and entered into the heart of France: behold Fre-degonde (armed with more manly courage and wisedome) encounters him with an other army, being fortified more by her exhortations, and the presence of the young King, (whom she shewed openly to the French) then by the number of men of wage. The battell was giuen, and the imagined Conqueror was vanquished by a child and a woman, being surprised with so happy a celerity by Fredegonde, as he could hardly beleue thee had bene parted from Paris, when as he sees his whole Army defeated. He lost in this conflict 20000. men, his honour, and his life: for hauing recovered his Country with much adoe; he died of melancholy, leaving a memorable example to Princes, neuer to attempt a warre to take from another without iust cause.

He left two Sonnes, Theodebert and Thierry. The first had for his portion the Realme of Austrasia: the second had Bourgongne. Brunehault his mother furnished him, and kept Metz with the eldest: the presently stirred vp these two Princes (ouer whom she had great authority as their grandmother) to pursue Clotaire, for the shame and death of their father. Behold suddenly an Army of Austrasians and Bourgignons marcheth into France, led by these two young Princes. Clotaire accustomed to these sports, opposeth himselfe in person, and gets the victory, with such successe, (as they say) the course of the riuier of Aurance (where the battell was fought) was layed by the dead bodies of the conquered. *Fre-

Fredegunde dies with her vi-

degonde leapt for ioy of this second triumph, by reason of Bruneault, who was her chief object: but her ioy was presently converted into her owne funeral, for she died soone after: to teach reuenging spirits, that their hatreds which they would haue perpetual, are mortall, and at the least wise end with their deaths.

Thus Fredegunde died in her bed, and was interred neare to Chilperis, whom she had caused to be slaine: so as in this peaceable death we may consider the patience of God, which doth often attend those it referres to his last iudgement. But Bruneault (who thought her selfe a conqueresse, by the death of Fredegunde her capital enemy) incenseth Theodebert and Thierri her grand-children anew against Clotaire. They raise another army, vnder the conduct of Bersald, not willing any more to hazard their persons, being taught by the successe of two great defeats. Bersald is slaine in this battell, and yet the victory remaines to his men, with great losse to the French: so as it seemed the war would grow more violent betwixt these Princes, who now began to see a part of their reuenge against their cousin Clotaire. But the malice of Bruneault, who had banded the cousins, must now diuide the brethren.

This old bitch, euen in the fury of war, found still means to follow her beastly lust, and then had she got a yong courtier called Protade, for a stallion: who she entertained in view and knowledge of the whole Court, and aduanced him beyond duty or desert. The dislike of this vnchaste conuerfation (offensive to the whole world) doth in the end force Theodebert to find a means to withdraw his mother from the view of the multitude, who were eie-witnesses of the filthinesse of this shamelesse old woman, and of the ignominy of his house. He supposed to send her away with policy: perswading her she should doe best to retire her selfe to some monastery, there to lead a godly life, and to seek for rest befitting her age. This admonition caused her to leave the Court and state of Theodebert, but not to change her mind. She retires then from Metz, & comes into Bourgogne to her other son, full of choller: and finding Thierri ill affected against his brother, he presently kindles the vnfortunate fire of dissention betwixt them, which consumed them both, and finally her selfe. That posterities may note in this tragedy, the examples of Gods iust iudgment, who punisheth one sin by another, and the sinner by his owne sin.

This lewd woman perswades Thierri, that Theodebert was a bastard, the sonne of a gardiner, and that he had lawfull cause to make war against him, as an usurper of that which belonged vnto him by right. Thierri being exceeding couetous, embraceth this occasion, prepares an army against Theodebert, and employes this Protade in the principall charge, who was a kindler of warre in the spirit of this yong Prince. The chiefe Noblemen of Bourgogne infinitely grieved with these disorders, not daring directly to charge Bruneault, they let vpon her minion, and kill him. By this means they draw Thierri to an accord with his brother Theodebert: and so either of them sends back his troops. Thus this fire seemed to be wholly quenched, the which kindled soone after in another place, and by the practices of the same work-woman. Thierri had remained long vnmarried, entertaining change of women, by the counsel of this bitch, who daily provided him store of such stuffe: but solicited by the continual perswasions and prayers of his Councell, he takes to wife Membergue, the daughter of Dataric, King of Spaine, louing her with that honest affection that a man ought to loue his wife. Bruneault is jealous of this lawfull ioue, fearing to be dispossessed of her authority and credit, if a lawfull wife possessed her husbands heart, she workes by her charmes, reducing Thierri to that extremity, that he was not able to accompany with his wife; and for a bait to his adultery, she furniseth other women (whom he might freely vse) so as she loathed him of this poore Princesse, causing him to send her home to her father Dataric, as vnable to beare children: who infinitely grieved with this disgrace done him in the person of his daughter, resolues to reuenge. He complains of this injury, both to Clotaire and Theodebert, whom he knew to be enemies to Thierri, and all together resolue to make war against him.

Bruneault seeing this great storme ready to fall vpon Thierri, she perswades him to compound with his brother Theodebert, at what price soeuer, whose humor she knew well. This accord was sold to Theodebert by Thierri at a deare rate: (for he had the Countreies of Champagne, Touraigne, Arrois, and many other places) but it cost himselfe much dearer: for by this composition, all the army was disperfed, and euery one retired home. Thierri (who by the aduice of his mother, stood vpon his guard) surpriseth his brother Theodebert,

A debert, with such aduantage, that not onely he recouers all that he had giuen him, but by the counsell of this Proserpine, he embrewes his hands in his blood, murdering him most barbarously. Theodebert had but one onely daughter, whom Thierri would take to wife, to haue some honest pretext to seize vpon all his Estates. But Bruneault (who desired greatly to see him murther, but not to haue a companion in this absolute authority) diuides him from this marriage, inferring (to couer her hidden intent) that it was not lawfull to marry his neece. Thierri blinded with passion (who by a iust iudgement of God, sought to dye by payson of this viper, by whose meanes he had done so much mischief) replies, that the daughter of Theodebert was none of his Niece, seeing that Theodebert was not his brother, being begotten by another father: reproaching Bruneault, that he knew no more then she had taught him. And that vpon this occasion she had encouraged him to kill him. And as they grew to hot words, hee threatened to kill her. Bruneault (seeing her selfe taken by the nose, and measured by the same measure she had measured to others) resolues to prevent Thierri, and to murther him. She therefore gives him a morrell point with a languishing payson, which caused him to be consumed of a bloody fluxe: that as hee had spilt the blood of others, so he might die in blood; and that the same wretched countessell which had bene the Sepulchre of his brother, should likewise be his owne: for a memorable example to posterity, that God suffereth nothing unpunished, and doth often punish the wicked by themselves, and by their owne practices. Such was the tragical end of the troublesome life of Thierri. But what shall become of Bruneault? The iustice of God goes slowly; but he recompenceth the slownesse with the grieuousnesse of the punishment. Let vs then heare the continuance of our History. Bruneault makes a good countenance after the death of Thierri. She makes him a stately Funerall like a Countrey, and of foure bastard Sonnes which Thierri had left, she chooseth him that pleases her best, to infall him King in his fathers place: and in the mean time she continues the government of the Realme, and calls her selfe Regent. To conclude, she doth promise vnto her selfe, in all her courses farre better successe then Fredegunde; presuming that she exceeded her iudgement and experience, no man remaining to controule her actions: but her discourses were vaine imaginations, and her foolish hopes the snare of her owne ruine.

D Nobility of Bourgogne (infinitely grieved with the horrible wickednesse of this woman, resolute not to endure the new tyranny which she practised) had recourse vnto Clotaire, as to their true and lawfull Lord. Bruneault plies the resolute: she prepares to warre, sends diuers Ambassadors into Germany: the chiefe was Varnare Maire of the Palace of Austrasia, a man of great authority both at home and with strangers.

Having sent him for succours to some Princes of Germany, these growes zealous of him without cause, and sends a trustie seruant of hers named Albon, to finde meanes to kill him. Albon having read those deadly Letters, teares them: but vnwares he lets fall the pieces of this Letter, the which are gathered vp and carried to Varnare: who vpon this new accident takes a new aduice. He resolues to crosse the practices of this

E murtheresse (so well knowne and hatefull to all men) who likewise would make away her best seruants, who had bene too faithfull vnto her, in the execution of her wicked designs. Varnare doth treat so politically in Germany, as he with-drawes their hearts and Forces from Bruneault, and wins them vnto Clotaire. This counter-battery thus made, he returns into Bourgogne. His returne bred an vnexpected change, for see, who had alwayes deceived, was deceived, and in the end fell into the snare which she had made for another. Varnare did not seeme to know what he had designed: whereby he had meanes to countermeine all Bruneaults policies, with so wise a dissimulation, by his great authority, as he gaires all the chiefe men for Clotaire: deliuiers into his hands the children aforesaid, pretended to be heires, and by this meanes giues him an easie victory over F Bruneaults troops: who yielding vnto Clotaire, deliuer vp this wicked woman, the cause of all their miseries. So at length the Wolfe is taken vnwares. Clotaire a victory was receiued by common consent of the Austrasians and Bourguignons, and by these meanes (being absolute master of that great inheritance of Clouis his grand-father) beganne his reigne by a worthy act of memorabile Iustice. Having in his power the chiefe motiue of all these mischiefs, he caused Bruneaults proceesse to be made by the greatest personages he could chooseth in all his dominions: that in so notable an Assembly the sentence might be irrefutable. By their censures Bruneault was found culpable.

of infinite and horrible crimes, and was condemned to dye, by a terrible and extraordinary punishment: for she was tyed to the taile of a wyld Mare, and drawne through a stony and rough Country, so as (being torne into diuers peeces) she died at diuers times most iustly, as she had cruelly caused many others to die. A notable example, to shew, that the greatest cannot auoid the soueraigne iustice of God, who punisheth in this world when it pleaseth him: and when he spareth them, it is a signe that he reserueth the punishment to his last iudgement. Thus died Brunehaut, onely commended in Historiques to haue built many temples, and giuen great reuenues for the maintenance thereof, whilst that she wallowed in her pleasures. Saint Gregory hath set downe certaine Letters of his to Brunehaut, wherein he commends her highly for her piety and singular wisdom.

Clotaire seeing himselfe King of so great a Monarchy, after a long and horrible confusion of intestine wars, employed all his care to pacifie the Realme, leaving notable examples to Princes, to cure the wounds of an Estate, after ciuill wars, by mildnesse. He doth publickly proclaime pardon of all iniuries both generall and particular, to abolish the memory to come, making his example a law of perpetual forgetfulness. This moderation, more victorious then any great and seuerie chastisement, won him the loue and obedience of his subiects, and confirmed a true and so counterfeited concord amongst the subiects themselves. He gouerned them after their owne humours, vsing his authority with mildnesse. And for that they had liued in the Court of Kings from whom they received aduancements and honours, the which they could not doe by their annuall offices, (as then the governments were) he erected perpetual Magistrates, with such authority, as it might well be termed the true pattern of a Royalty.

He then augmented the great authority of the Maires of the Palace, who controuled Kings, and in the end vsurped the Royalty, whereas before they were but controulers of the Kings house, and not of the Realme. A notable president for Princes, in the setting of an Estate, not so to communicate their authority to their seruants, whom they desire to gratifie, as they may haue means to become masters. Clotaire layed the first stone in the change, which shall happen to his posterity. He had one onely sonne, whose name was Dagobert. It was his greatest care to haue him well instructed, committing him to Arnoul Bishop of Metz, a learned man, and of a good life, and likewise to Sadragefile gouernour. But Dagobert discovered euen then his bad disposition, intreating his gouernour Sadragefile vnworthily. Wherewith Clotaire the King was wonderfully moued against his sonne, who shewed afterwards that this was but a preparative to that he would attempt against his owne father, forcing him in his life time to giue him the Realme of Austrasia for his portion. This kind of rebellion was the fruit of *Clotaire*s too great lenity: as also of priuie quarrels, which bred great disorders in the Court.

Thus we see, there is nothing absolutely perfect in this world. Clotaire dies in the year of Christ, 631. having gouerned 44. years, from his cradle, and passed happily through many perillous difficulties. A happy and a wise Prince. But as humane things are subiect vnto change, so we may say, that the French Monarchy reuiued and died in him. And at his death sprung vp the soueraigne authority of the Maires of the Palace, the which grew to that greatnesse, as they dispossest this Race of the Crowne. It was *Clotaire*s intent to gratifie his subiects, and to ease the succeeding Kings: but in effect it was a means to haue many Kings, and to make the lawfull contemptible, setting the seruant in the Masters place. In truth as it is most dangerous in an Estate to giue too much authority to a seruant, so is it most certaine, that the sloathfulness and disloyaltie of these last Kings, was a ladder whereby our Maires mounted to this greatnesse, to their ruines. The which succeeded by degrees, vnder the respect of the Kings name, for from that time of Clotaire, vnto the last King of this Race, are 120. years. Pepin grandfather to that Pepin who was the first King of the second Race, was Maire of the Palace, and began first to deale absolutely in the government of the Realme.

The lenity of Clotaire is also noted by another error: for he tooke so great liberty to doe what he list without order, as his subiects would doe the like. And by this contempt of the law, the King grew contemptible, being not well obeyed in his age, the which bred great quarrels betwixt great and small, who shewed no great respect neither to King nor iustice. In this estate died Clotaire, leaving Dagobert for his successor, the year 632.

DAGOBERT THE FIRST, The eleuenth King of France.

DAGOBERT the first of that name, tooke possession of this great Monarchy, without any controuersie. Some write, that he had a brother called Arbert, to whom hee gaue for his portion all the Country on this side Loire: but dying without children, it returned to him againe. At his comming to the Crowne, he found great difficulties among his subiects, being bred vp without Iustice, vnder the long liberty of ciuill Warres, and the lenity of Clotaire: for the which he provided wisely, reducing Iustice, fortifying it by his authority, with so good a moderation, as no man was offended at his too great seuerity, neither durst any man attempt against the lawes, seeing both the reine & the rod in the hands of their lawfull Prince. Thus he purchased the commendation of a good & wise King, and peace to his people, by their obedience to iustice. To this good order he added profession to loue holy things: and the better to confirme this opinion in his subiects minds, he built & enriched many Temples, especially that of S. Denis, the which since hath bene the sepulchre of our Kings.

There were great numbers of Lewes in France, the which were hurtfull to the Realme: he banished them by a perpetuall Edict, out of the territories that were vnder his obedience. But this zeale of religion, was polluted with the foule blot of Adultery, which made him infamous both to subiects and strangers. Amond Bishop of Paris admonished him of his fault: but Dagobert impatient thereof, banished him. Pepin his Maire continued to in this reprehension, that although Dagobert were moued, and threatned to banish him, yet in the end he yielded to reason, by the vertuous constancy of Pepin: and having dismissed many of his lewd followers, he calls home Amond. An example of Princes and seruants: for the one to continue firme in their duties, for the other to yeeld to reason. Dagobert subdued the Gascons that were reuolted: brought the Brittons to obedience, suppressed the Sclauons, settled the Realme of Austrasia, and gaue seasonable succours to the King of Spaine against the Sarazins. This is the summe of his armes led by Pepin, whilst that he liued at his pleasure, in his chamber, amongst his women, or in his Monastery at his deuotion. He had two Sons, Sigebert and Clovis. Having assembled the Estates in great solemnity, he declared, that he had ordained Sigebert to be King of Austrasia, & Clovis King of France, preferring the younger before the elder without any controuersie. Hee gaue them likewise gouernours, by reason of their yong yeares. And so he died in the year of grace 645. having reigned 14. years without any trouble. A Prince to be numbred amongst the most worthy, but for this blemish of incontinency. Thus vpon the facility of Clotaire, the voluptuousnesse of Dagobert layed another dangerous stone in the foundation of a new Royalty, the which vnadvisedly they built for their seruants, to their Childrens cost.

The younger brother preferred

the elder.

CLOVIS THE SECOND, The twelfth King of France. The first of the idle Kings.

F

NOW we take the declining of the hill, to seeke the last of these Kings, who neath in the valley, who had nothing royall but the Race, the name, and the habiliments, having resigned their Maiesty, authority, and power to the hands of their Maires. It shall bee sufficient to shew some names, the dates of their reignes, and the continuance of their time, till a more vigorous Royalty come to take their time.

Here after in this first Race, you shall see our Kings but once a year, the first day of May, in their Chariots deckt with flowers, and Greene, and drawen by foure oxen, who so hath occasion to treat with them, let him seeke them in their chambers, amidst their A delights. Let him take of any matters of State, he shall be sent to the Maire, who deals with all that concerns the State : hee opens packets, and makes answers without any counsell but his owne. Hee heares the complaints of subiects, and giues audience to Ambassadors of foraigne Princes. He ordereth all as it pleaseth him. He giues, reuokes, dischargeth, contracts, ordaines, makes Edicts, and difanulls them. To conclude, he frees his Master from all trouble, to impose it on himselfe. But we shall see to what end hee labours thus, and why he hath taken vpon him the authority and purse of his master. Let vs now speake something of our Clouis.

Clouis then remains in France, a peaceable King ; and Sigebert his elder brother retires B himselfe to his Realme of Austrasia, according to Dagobert their fathers decree. This accord was embraced by two brethren of a good and mild disposition, and was maintained wisely by their mother Nantilde, and their Tutors. A notable example of rare loue betwixt two brethren, especially in great diuisions, and the ieaiousie of mothers, who doe often support one child against another.

Clouis had married a Gentlewoman of Saxony, named Baudour, a woman of a good and holy life, & much giuen to deuotion, as the Abbey of Shelles, Saint Baudour, with other Foundations doe witnesse. Whilest that the busied her selfe in her deuotion, and to build Monasteries, Clouis laboured to confound his minde, drowning it in the flood of his voluptuousnesse : Yet they obserue one thing in him, which shewes that hee was not wholly C deprived of iudgement: the which happened in a time of a great dearth: To releue the poore people, he suffered them to take the siluer, wherewith the Temple of Saint Denis had been couered by Dagobert. Doubtlesse, the care of the poore, is a worke worthy of a great Prince. Bountie is better then sacrifice : and Christian soules be the true stones of a spirituall Temple, where God dwels, as in his proper mansion. So as to nourish and support the poore, the precious members of the Church, is to build a goodly Temple.

Sigebert King of Austrasia (having no children, nor hope of any) was so solicited by Grimoald Maire of his palace, as he adopted his sonne Childeric, and soone after he himselfe had a sonne, and died, leauing him heire general of all his Realme. But Grimoald, vnder colour of this adoption, desirous to establish his sonne in the possession of Sigeberts D estate, takes his yong son, and sends him to be brought vp in a Monastery of Scotland. In effect, he had seized on all the Realme, if Ercombault, Maire of the palace of France, had not valiantly opposed himselfe against this his cruell vsurpation, having defeated & taken both him and his son, and punished them both by a solemne sentence at Paris. A notable example for many considerations : but especially a singular prooffe, that God is the Protector of Orphelins, and a iudge of the vsurpers of anothers right. Clouis had three sons by Baudour, Cloataire, Childeric, and Thierry. All three shall be Kings successively ; but Childeric was presently King of Austrasia, left without any lawfull heire, after the death of the sonne of Sigebert. He reigned sixteene yeares, and died in the yeare 662. having left his Realme in great peace, without any enemy. E

CLOTAIRE THE THIRD,

The thirteenth King of France.

CLOTAIRE, the eldest Son of Clouis, was King of France, first vnder the government of Erich, and then of Ebrain Maire of the Palace : a wicked F and cruell man, who shall minister occasion to talke of his life, in the succession of these latter Kings. Vnder his reigne, he made great exactions vpon all the people, who (as he said) liued too plentifully, and forgot themselves by the enioying of too happy a peace. Cloataire reigned foure yeares, and died without name, and without children, in the yeare 666. of whom we may say as of the rest that succeeded him : That they haue left nothing memorable, but that they left not memory.

CHILDERIC, OR CHILPERIC, THE SECOND,

666

The fourteenth King of France.

B

HILDERIC the second Son of Clouis was already in possession of the Realme of Austrasia : but a greater drawes him into France, where hee finds important difficulties, for Ebrain doubting (if Childeric should reigne) he would take from him the dignity of Maire, and giue it vnto Wfald Maire of Austrasia, who was his trusty seruant; perswades Thierry, the yonger Son of France, to seize vpon the Realme, and causeth him to be crowned King. But Childeric comes with a strong Army, being fauoured by the French, who hated Ebrain, (and in respect of him Thierry) & were well affected to the elder : so as he seizeth vpon Thierry and Ebrain. He did only shauel Thierry and put him into the Monastery of Saint Denis : and he sent Ebrain to Luson in Bourgogne. Too small a punishment for so foule a fact : nay rather, a perpetuall prison, and insupportable torments had beene more meet for his ambitious spirit.

Childeric then was receiued of all the French, to whom soone after hee made a bad recompence : for he grew so proud and cruell, as there appeared in all places signes of his tyranny and cruelty. One amongst the rest cost him deere : for hauing caused a Gentleman called Bodille to be whipped, hee gaue him a iust occasion to seeke his ruine. The French, wearied with his insolencies, take this barbarous act very disdainfully : so as Bodille had an easie meanes for reuenge vpon Childeric, although hee were a King: hee resolves to kill him, and want no friends to accompany him in this execution. The match is made to surpris him hunting, at their best advantage. Childeric being there, he is enuironed by Bodille and his Companions, who increase still : and he being ill attended by his followers, is slaine by Bodille : who followed by his confederates, goes presently to a neere Castle, whereas Blitilde the Queene remained great with childe, being entred, hee D slew her with her child, leauing a memorable example to Princes, neuer to thrust their subiects into despair ; nor to abuse their authority to the dishonour and contempt of their Nobility, which is their right arme.

Thus died Childeric, hauing reigned but two yeares. Leauing an odious memory to his posterity, to haue begun well, and ended ill : cleane contrary to Childeric the first, his Predecessor, who began ill and ended well.

THIERRI THE FIRST,

The fifteenth King of France.

F

THE French, not able to liue without a King, and desiring none, but one of the blood royall, (Childeric being thus slaine) poste to Saint Denis, draw forth Thierry, and establish him in the Realme, from the which they had deposed him, for his elder brother : and make Landregesil the Sonne of Archembauld Maire of the Palace, with whom they were displeased, during his Mairalty. A notable example, both of the peoples consent governed by reason, and the efficacy of the Royall law, the which is the soule of an Estate, and the ground of a lawfull Empire.

The Realme was very peacefull in this beginning, when as Ebrain (perswaded by some discontented Noblemen) leaues his Cloister, and raiseth an army, in the beginning but small, but it so increased, by the Kings contempt & his Maiores, as hee remoueth a Victory, with an incredible celerity. Ebrain seizeth on the Kings person, and treateth him with all reverence reuerence, and respect, and protests to require nothing, but to be held his most faithfull A seruant, as he had beene in his first reigne. Landregisil was then absent: who seeing the King taken, and all the fauour of the French turned to Ebrin, being victor, he willingly giues eare vnto him, and vpon his faith & promise of good vñage, puts himselfe into his hands, by whom he is treacherously and cruelly slaine, Ebrin hauing begun this course, continues his cruelty, to satisfie his reuenging mind, vntill that he after that he had murdered many good men, contrary to his oath, amongst the rest, Leger Bishop of Autun, hauing admonished him of his duty, and Martin Maire of the Palace of Austrasia, to whom he had giuen his faith with a solemne oath) in the end thrust himselfe vnadvisedly into the hands of Ermanfroy, a French gentleman, his capital enemy, who slew him when B he least feared it, hauing now an imagination to be mounted to the top of his greatnesse, and to taste the sweet liquor of his insatiabie reuenge.

A notable obseruation for treacherous & reuenging spirits, who are then vanquished when they think to be Conquerours. Thierry a King in shew, is a spectator of these Tragedies, as of a game at tables, of his diuers Maires, which play at leuel coile, vntill that Pepin gets it, and enioyes it only, with the foueraign gouernment of the French Monarchy.

Pepin during the confusions of these reignes had been in Austrasia, and purchased great credit with all men: so as he was held worthy of this great charge, the which he gouerned with so great wisdom and valor, as hauing fetled France in a peacefull Estate, he had purchased more credit, and authority among the French, then the King himselfe. In the end C Thierry dies, in the year 693, hauing reigned nineteene yeares, leaving Clevis and Childebari, his children, for a witnessse, that he had liued: but in effect Pepin, and his, for the true heires of the Realme.

CLOVIS THE THIRD.

The sixteenth King of France.

B<sup>E</sup>ing the eldest sonne of Thierry, he reigned foure yeares, and dies without name, and D without children: to whom succeeds his brother.

CHILDEBERT THE SECOND,

The seuenteenth King of France.

V<sup>V</sup>Ho reigned seuentee yeares, and dies in the year 718, hauing left two Sonnes, Dagobert and Clotaire, of like humour to himselfe.

DAGOBERT THE SECOND,

The eighteenth King of France.

H<sup>E</sup> reigned foure yeares, and left two Children, Chilperic and Thierri, with no better memory then the rest. So there passed fortie and foure yeares, during which time Pepin had good meanes to fortifie his authority, the which was in effect absolute, by the negligence, or rather idleness of these Kings, who made a necessary F way to new delignes, by their voluntary sufferance to inroach vpon their authority. Pepin well acquainted with the humour of the French, (naturally bent to loue their Princes) did not openly despise his masters: but excused their weak dispositions, not capable of much paine, representing the heavy burthen of a great Estate, and that the honor to gouerne it, is a trouble which costs deare. He fetled an impression in the Frenchmens minds, that those only were worthy to be Kings, that knew how to gouerne.

So

A<sup>A</sup> So without any insinuating speech, the ordinary seruices he did to the Realme, maintaining it in peace, his great profession to loue Religion, Iustice, and the people (whose ease he was wonderfully carefull of), did recommend him to all men: and the good turnes hee did to all persons by reason of his charge, did daily purchase him many friends and ser-uants. Doubtlesse, as it is great policy to be a good man, so is there no small dexterity in the taking of Cities and Countreys by the hearts of men. Thus Pepin laid the foundation, and his successors finished the perfect building of a new gouernment.

A lesson for our Kings, to haue a care how they referre the charge of affaires to their seruants, and to whom they trust, and how. This example doth verifie, that they were better to be more careful, and to take more paines, then to disturne themselves of this great authority, which makes them not only eminent aboue all men, but carries (as it were) a type of the Maiesty of God in the gouernment of the world, whereof they must yeeld him an account, and not lose that by base cowardinesse, which they should maintaine by ver-tue. But let vs returne to Pepin, he made great show to loue Religion, and vpon this cause he makes warre against Rabod Duke of Frise a Ragan, whom he conquered and forced to receiue the Christian Religion with all his souldiers. He restored Lambert Bishop of Vtrecht to his dignity, being expelled by Ebrin, and confined into a Monastery: finally, he infinitely fauoured all that tended to the seruice of God: and one of his chiefest cares was to aduance them that had charge ouer the Church, whose loues he had so purchased by this good vñage, as they soone required him, causing the people to loue him, with whom such as rule their consciences haue great authority.

This was a point of state, as much as of deuotion. He also made proofe of his valour in diuers foies, reducing the people of Germany on eyther side the Rhine, to the obedience of the French, who beganne to mutine, and forsooke the beauty of the Realme of Austrasia. He was carefull to maintaine iustice, and to embrace the people, no way oppressing them with any new impositions: In the meane time, he was not careless of himselfe and his children. He commanded absolutely, being armed with the authority of his Soue-raigne; neyther was there any appeale from him vnto the King.

He had two sonnes by Plectrude, Dragon, and Grimbold: he gaue Champagne to Dragon, and after his death he caused his sonne to succeed him with the title of a Duke: In the beginning he gaue the Offices of great Master, and General of the Treasurers to Nordbert his deare friend: but after his death he inuested his owne sonne Grimbold in those places.
 But as the vanity of man transports it selfe beyond the limits of respect, it changed in the end, that Pepin forgot himselfe in his prosperity: for not satisfied with Plectrude his law-full wife, he fell in loue with a Gentlewoman named Alpaide, by whom he had one bastard, (which shall be very famous in the course of this History, vnder the name of Charles Martel) and as the mischief encreased he puts away Plectrude, and maries Alpaide. Lambert Bishop of Vtrecht admonished him of this fault: but he suffered Alpaide to cause him to be slaine by her brother Dodon, who soone after felt the punishment of this blood, for being E strucke with a disease of wormes, nor able to endure his owne stench, hee cast himselfe headlong into the riuer of Meuze. Grimbold the sonne of Pepin following his fathers example, abandoned himselfe to strange women, disdainig his wife. But this adultery was deare to them both: for Grimbold, too familiar with one named Rangare, sonne in law to Rabod Duke of Frise, was slaine with him, by a iust iudgement of God, hauing taught him so filthy a trade, to abandon himselfe to stumps, and to reiect his wife. Pepin was so perplexed for the death of his sonne, as he died for griefe and choller against Rabod the author of this murder. Thus both he and his sonne reaped the fruits of their adultery.

Vpon his death-bed he ordained Charles (his bastard) to succeed him in the gouernment of the Realme: but Plectrude embracing this occasion, vpon the death of her husband, and well supported by her kinsfolkes, caused Charles to be taken and put in prison at Cologne, and aduanced Thybauld the sonne of Dragon, her owne sonne and Pepin's, to the gouernment, although in effect the vnder his name gouerned all the affaires of State. This gouernment of a woman, (which is visually imperious and without reason) offended this most reuolte among the French: so as weary to be commanded by a distaffe (Dagobert dying during these alterations) they tooke a Prince of the blood called Daniel forth of a Cloister, who had beene a Monke the greatest part of his youth. Him they crowne King vnder the name of Chilperic the second, to haue a royall name to countenance his actions:

Charles Martel
 bastard to *Pe-

and they giue him a Nobleman of France called Rainfroy, to be his Maire : who hauing A leauied an army, defeated Thibault, and his grandmother Plectrude with small fight. But when as Rainfroy thought himselfe void of all his enemies, he finds a strong Competitor : for Charles Martel being freed from prison, could politickly embrace the occasion, and get authority by the perplexity of Plectrude, to whom hee offers himselfe with all his meanes. The decree of Pepin did import much : but the dexterity and valour of Charles could be no more concealed, then a goodly light in darkness. He entertaines such as were affected to Plectrude, and her sonne, in such sort as (seeing themselves abandoned) they receive him for Maire, according to the will of Pepin, whose image Charles did carry in his forehead, and his memory liued yet in the hearts of the French.

Charles being received and installed Maire of France, first assured himselfe of the childre of King Dagobert, causing them to be gently brought vp in a Monastery, and afterwards (not pursuing his reuenges as Ebwin had done) he made a publicke declaration, that his only intention was to free the Realme from the confusions which were so visible to all men, and restore it to the ancient dignity. Heither would he attempt any thing but by the consent and aduice of the French. And indeed he beganne to manage the Affaires to the great content of all men. He established an old Prince of the blood, named Clotaire, with a Councell of State, vnder whose name and authority he gouerned as Maire and chiefe of the Councell, and therefore some writers reckon this Clotaire amongst the Kings of France, although he were no King. Rainfroy with his Chilperic (having himselfe too weak for such an enemy) had recourse to Rabod Duke of Buris, a capital enemy to the House of Pepin, with whose aide he leauies an Army, encounters Charles, and ouerthrowes him at the first charge. But Charles nothing amazed at this check, rallies his Forces, and knowing that the Enemy put vp with this victory, marched in disorder, he charged their confused troops with such aduantage, as hee decimates them quite, neare vnto Cambrai: so as Chilperic and Rainfroy could hardly escape with a small traine. And so Charles proceeds with his victory: for being aduertised that Plectrude was at Cologne, where he is received by the inhabitants, and hauing Plectrude and her sonne Thibault in his power, he inflicts no other punishment, but inioines them to liue in quiet, and to attempt nothing without his liking. A worthy reuenge of a generous mind to pardon the vanquished. Eudon succours him; but being vanquished by Charles, he submits himselfe with the pretended Chilperic, to his discretion: and so did Rainfroy, relying vpon the Conquerors faith: Charles vseth the victory modestly, pardons Rainfroy, and giues him the government of Aniou, and suffers Eudon to enjoy his liuing, vnder the obedience of the Crowne. And to settle the Realme in good order, he degrades Chilperic, being aduanced against law, and causeth the eldest sonne of Dagobert to be chosen King, named Chilperic, as the true and lawfull heyre. So he reigned vnder the government of his Maire.

CHILPERIC THE THIRD,

Prince of no valor, simple and voluptuous. In his time the Sueses, Saxons, and Baurians (disdaining to liue vnder a simple and effeminate King) sought to withdraw themselves from the French obedience: but Charles reduced them to the yoke, reaping repentance for their rebellion. Plectrude was weary of ease: who abusing the mildnesse of Charles, retires to Vlmes, with her daughter Sena-childe, the lawfull child of Pepin, and seeks to draw the people of Danuby into rebellion against Charles: who hauing intelligence of her practices, postes thither with a running camp, pacifies the Germanes, and puns her in prison, but we reade not how he disposed of her, nor of her sonne Thibault. Thus he confirmed his authority in all places. In the meane time Chilperic dies, hauing reigned five yeares, and in his place his Brother was crowned King.

THIERRI THE SECOND,

The 20. King of France.

He reigned ten yeares, and dying, left his sonne Childeric, the last King of this first Race of Merovingiens. This is all that is memorable in these two reignes; whilst that the second Race prepares to come in place; and to take possession of the Crowne and Scepter of the French Monarchy.

Charles Martel, from Maire of the Palace, is chosen Duke or Prince of the French. He layes the foundations of a new reigne for his posterity; and in this respect is numbered among the Kings for the two and twentieth.

Now our discourse must be of that great Charles, surnamed Martel, by reason of the force both of his body and mind: shewing briefly according to our style, what means he had to aduance his Race to the Royall Throne.

As things succeeded in this manner: Charles Martel, who knew what force an interest purchased by good order hath in an Estate, enioynes his friends priuately (which were many) how much it did import (considering the apparent weaknesse of the King, and the necessity of the Realme) to haue one Commander, whom all the rest might obey: for when the King speaks not, euery one (holding himselfe as great as his companion) will play the King, and so by consequence many mischiefs grow daily, a multitude of matters being a ruine to an Estate. That the authority of a Maire was not great enough to that effect: and although it might be extended vpon necessity, yet was it not conuenient: seeing that which concerns the good and quiet of all, ought to be approved by all, and settled by a free and generall consent. Hauing thus disposed the minds of such as might rule in matters of great import, he makes a conuocation, which he calls a Parliament, in the which it is concluded, That seeing Charles Martel had by many proofes shewed himselfe worthy of a great command, hauing well vsed his authority of Maire, and that vrgent necessity required a speedy and conuenient remedy: therefore the absolute government should be deliuered into his hands. And to the end his authority should bee knowne, and obeyed with more respect, hereafter he should be called Prince, or Duke of Frenchmen. This decree did greatly countenance the authority of Charles Martel, being confirmed by such an Assembly, and by so affectionate a consent: but his vertues made him to be held most worthy of so honourable a charge: occasion made proofe of his vertue, and the success was a foretelling that the Realme was appointed to his posterity. Soone after there fell out this notable occasion.

We haue made mention of Eudon, the pretended Duke of Guienne. Martel hauing vanquished him, suffered him to enjoy his liuing, vnder the obedience of the Crowne. This accord pleased not Eudon, who not able to be reuenged of Martel, practised such meanes as ambition and couetousnesse did prescribe him. The Sarazins (a Turkish nation) had passed out of Asia into Africke and Spaine, and had possessed those goodly and great Provinces vnder the command of their King Abderamen. Eudon solicites them to come into France, and promisseth a free passage. The Sarazins willingly embrace the offer of so easie an entry, and resolute to people France with a great Colony of their nation. They enter Guienne with an army of four hundred thousand fighting men. A fearful number at this day, but plainly set downe by the common consent of all writers. Charles Martel seeing this great storme ready to fall vpon France, resolves first to take away the cause of their coming, and as *Eudon*s discontent had drawne them in, so he labours to be reconciled vnto him.

He concludes a peace with Eudon, taught by the horrible spoyle of Guienne, what it is to set such men to worke. In the end he disposeth all things to stop the violence of so ravishing an enemy, assembling all the Forces he could, to make a body able to encounter them: but he armed himselfe chiefly with resolution and courage, fit instruments in necessity, vnder the providence of the God of armes and victories. The Sarazin was already aduanced as far as Tournay, within view of Tours, neare to the Riuier Loire, where Martel refol-resolved to attend him, as well to ingage him in a country far from retreat, and to make A Endon and his men more resolute, in whose Country it was to be tryed, as also to haue France ready in case of necessity. Abderamen trusting in the multitude of his souldiers both of horse & foot, resolves to compasse in the French: and to this end had dispersed his bataillions, euery one a part, making shew of a great Army, appointing his horse mingled with Camels, and furnished with sundry new kinds of Armes, so ioyne the bataillions one to another. The order and countenance of this army was fearful to men, neuer wonted to behold such an huge inundation of strangers.

Martel encoun-raged his men.

Martel (who fought more with courage and valour in a good cause, then with numbers) B hauing assembled the body of his army, he confirms their resolutions before the combat, wishing them to haue no hope but in God, and in themselves, shewing that they had their enemies before, and the river of Loire behind, that hee had commanded them of Tours not to open the gates; but to the Conqueror, and had appointed troops of horse vpon the wings of his army, to kill such as fled, as enemies. To conclude, they had no other France, but where they were, in the which they must either conquer or die. Endon with his Guennois made their army apart, not far from Martel, and with his consent.

The batells being aranged, and euery Commander hauing perswaded his men to doe their best endeouours, the Sarazin giues the charge, supposing to compasse in the French easily, as with a net: but of all sides he findes men couragious in their defence. The encounter was great, and the combat furious. In the heat of the conflict Endon disbands, and violently chargeth the Sarazins campe, being full of women, children, and baggage, and with a small guard, he forceth the defences, and enters it, cuts in pieces, and kills all he encounters, without difference of age or sex. The Barbarian not accustomed to the realitie of the French, who encountered his sundry Bataillions in grosse, as they presented themselves, turning after the manner of their discipline, seeing many of his men slaine, and for a second mischiefe, hearing the cries and shriekings of women, and children, massacred in the Campe, began to be amazed, and to wauer. Martel (discouering their countenance, and that their bataillions grew thin) cries out mainly to his souldiers: Courage my friends: God hath set vp his banner, he fights for vs, let vs charge these miscreants. The Souldiers (incouraged at this voice, and at the visible successe of their Armes) cry victory, D victory. The Sarazin not knowing which way to turne him, being charged on all sides, breakes his bataillions, abandons his ranks, and casts away his Armes. All are dispersed, the multitude oppresseth them. Hereupon Martel and Endon ioyne together, after the spoile of the campe: vpon this disorder they charge valiantly through these dismembred troops, as into a thicke haruest, without any resistance: all ouerflowes with blood, they are weary with killing. The remainder which fled is small, the prisoners lesse: all die by the sword, or are beaten downe with battle-axes: the vigorous French (inraged with the sight of these vanquished Barbarians, seeking to dispossesse them, their wiues & children, of their habitations) made them the subiects of their choller. King Abderamen is found dead in a heap of carcases, not wounded, but smothered by the multitude that fled. His sloes assure, there were slaine vpon the place 375000. men, and of the French 1500.
among the which were many of the Nobility and men of account. Thus God did ouer-throw the greater number by the lesse, and by his force the multitude was an incumber to the enemy. But about all, this delucrance was remarkable, for that God not onely freed France from the slavery of Infidels, but also the rest of Europe, the which this deluge had almost ouerflowed, as it had done Asia and Africke already. So thanks were giuen vnto God, in all Christian kingdomes, & the name of Martel generally renowned, as a chiefe instrument of the singular deliuerance of all Christendome. After this defeat, he diuided the spoiles amongst the Souldiers, and the better to reward the Nobility, he remitted them the tenths and tithes for certaine yeares, with the consent of the Clergy, to whom he F promised satisfaction.

A memorable defeat of Abderamen, and his death.The battell of Tours.

This memorable defeat was a scale of the new dignity granted vnto Martel by the fa-uour of the French, confirmed by his owne valour, or rather by the bounty of God, the essentiall cause of his happy successe. This battell was called the battell of Tours: it happened in the yeare 730. but the end of this war was the beginning of another, and almost from the same spring, and by the same current. We haue shewed Endon deces at the battell of Tours. For this great seruice he expected some notable recompence: But Martel

A famous war in Languedoc.

A Martel excusing himselfe, that he could not alienate the reuenues of the Crowne, nor doe any thing to the preiudice of his Master, left Endon no more advanced then before the warres, and very ill satisfied: but he died soone after, leauing Hunault and Ieffrey his children, heyres of his discontent.

After their fathers decease, they seeke all possible meanes to trouble the quiet of France.
Their chiefe strength was in Guienne: they had likewise some in Prouence, through the faour of Maurice, Gouvernour of the Country, and Earle of Marcellis; but especially in Languedoc, whence they were issued, as I haue said, being descended from the Visigoths, whose memory with their names liues still throughout all that Prouince, although they all depend vpon the Crowne of France. Thus they assemble all the people they can, either by friends or credit, and fortifie good townes against the French, attending to make war with all violence. But finding all these meanes too feeble for so great a proiect, they proceed farther. The Sarazins remaining in Spaine, were much grieved at so great a losse of their men, being a generall dishonour to all their nation: They are easily drawne into this League, to be reuenged of the French: and the better to fortifie their party, they ioyne with the Vandales, Ostrogoths, and Alans, which remained yet in Spaine, not friends amongst themselves, yet common enemies to the French.

King Athin led the Sarazins troopes: Hunault and Ieffrey brethren commanded those that were assembled in the Prouinces on this side Loire. Besides their Forces, they had intelligence within Lions, and the best Cities of Bourgongne, assuring themselves to seize vpon Dauphine, as well for the nearnesse of Languedoc, (where they had a great partie) as also by meanes of Maurice the Prouençal, and the credit they had with the principall of the Country.

Thus they make a great party to vndermine and ruine the State of France, and did manage their practices with such secrecie, as their Army was sooner in field then Martel could haue intelligence of their preparations. The body of this army assembled in Languedoc, passed the Rofne, entred into Dauphine, and goes through it with such celerity and ease, as the Cities of Pierrelate, Saint Pol, Montmar, Liwon, Valence, Romans; and other townes bordering vpon the Rofne (hauing yielded as the first brute) they surpris the City of Lions, by meanes of their intelligence. Vienn alone held firme for the Kings seruice, in this deluge of Goths and Sarazins. They passed from Lions by Sauoy, and the Countreies on either side of the mount Iura; and in the end seized on many of the best Cities of Bourgongne, Chalon, Malcon, Dijon, and Auxerre, by meanes of their intelligences and the generall amazement. Martel slept not in this confusion: but to prevent this vnexpected storme, he assures the Cities, and leaues men with all expedition. The Towne of Sens (through the resolute counsel of their Bishop Orso) fillies forth so fitly vpon the Sarazin Army, as (hauing slaine a great number) they force them to raise the siege with shame. Other townes by their example grow resolute, vnder the assurance of their Commanders, whom they find careful of their preservation. Thus this army halfe victorious (feareing a second skirmish of Tours, by the walghty blowes of Martel, loth to ingage themselves farther in France) retires into the Countreies of their allies, leauing garisons in the townes they had pursued: One part passeth into Languedoc, and lodgeth in friend townes: another seizeth on Auignon (then a City of Prouence) by the meanes of Maurice gouernor of the Country: Arles holds firme for the kings seruice. Amidst these confusions and the re-uerber of Maurice, Hunault and Ieffrey returne into their Country of Guienne, to prevent the designs of Martel, and to retaine their townes in obedience. Hauing thus disposed of their affaires, they send ioyntly into Spaine for new Forces, whilst that Martel labors to seise that which they had disordered in many places. And in truth they had provided work for him, the which he presented in this sort.
D

The fidelity of the Visigoths.The courage of a Bishop.New attempts of the Langued.

He finds Childbert presently in Prouence with a meane army, as well to assure the townes that stood firme, as to keepe the enemy at a bay, and to croise their designs: He himselfe remains in Bourgongne with a great army, to reuocate such townes as were held by the enemy. Both work according to their projects, but not with like successe.
Childbert besiegeth Auignon, but with much rayle, losse of time, and small hope of successe: so at length is shamefully forced to raise the siege: but then comes Martel with his army, hauing recovered the Cities of Bourgongne, Lions, and the rest of Dauphine with the like facility as they had beene lost : punishing the rebels in all places. Being encamped A before Auignon, he so presteth the siege, as in few dayes he takes the towne, and cuts the Sarazins in pieces : yet their King Athin saved himselfe in Languedoc, by the river of Roine, and retired to Narbonne to his other troopes. Martel (having relieved the City of Arles with a new garison) passeth into Languedoc, and besiegeth Narbonne, being then a very strong City, and of great importance for the whole Province. And as this siege grew long, behold a new army of Sarazins comes out of Spaine, vnder the conduct of Amore, another petty Sarazin King. Martel fearing lest they of Guienne should come, and those within the City issue forth, and all being vnited make one body of an army, he resolues to fight with them apart, vsing this stratagem which succeeded happily. He leaues B a part of his army before the City, with the same countenance as if it had beene whole, rising without sound of Drumme or Trumpet: and surpriseth this new army of Sarazins, with such celerity, as he defeats them.
the

Languedoc
severely punished by Martel.

Athin frustrate of hope of any succours, saues himselfe by Sea, with a small troop, and abandons Narbonne, and the whole Country, to the mercy of Charles Martel then a conqueror. This was the end of that perillous warre bred by Hannault and Ieffroy the sonnes of Eudon: and the fruit of all these broyles in Languedoc, was that they brought those Cities which had followed them, to extremity, whom Martel punished severely for their rashnesse and rebellion. The Historics name Narbonne, Nismes, Beziers and Agde, the which he caused to be sackt and burnt. It is likely that the ancient walles of Nismes were C then pulled downe, whereof we now see the ruines of an admirable greatnesse: vndoubted signes of the ancient beaury and wealth of that goodly City : the which in the time of the Romane Empire, being free in Gaule Narbonnoise, did enioy the priuiledges of Italy, hauing had the honour to furnish Rome with an Emperour.

Hannault and Ieffroy (being authors of this warre) remained yet unpunished. Martel was diuierged by the warre he made against the Friscons, whom he vanquished and forced to become Christians : and to that end he sends them Doctors. A pardonable zeale in a warrior : for in truth mens soules cannot be wonne by the sword, nor religion forced, but must be planted in the heart by reason. The punishment of these turbulent men, was reserved vnto Pepin, who knew well how to effect it as we shall see. At this time King Thi- D erry died, having reigned five and twenty years in conceit : and left Childeric his sonne, not heyre of the Realme, but of his idleness, to make the last releafe of the Crowne, and consign it into a better hand.

The 21. King of France.

And the last of the first Race.

was King in these nine years, five vnder the authority of Charles Martel, and foure vnder Pepin, who did possessed him, made him a Monke, and seated himselfe in his place, as we shall see in order.

But let vs obserue what remains of Martel. The care and toyle of great affairs, with his old age, hauing sore broken him, he resolues to dispose of things in time, & to leaue a peace to his children. He had a sons, Caroleman, Pepin, Giles, & Griffon, all of diuers humors. Caroleman & Giles more modest, and of a milder spirit: Pepin and

Griffon, more rough & ambitious. While he liued, he greatly honored the Kings person, neither did he in open shew meddle with that maine point of Royalty: but in effect, diuiding his authority to his children with the title of gouernments. He purchased them an interest by his vertue, and infinite the possession of the Realme. To his eldest sonne Caroleman he left Austrasia, to Pepin (whom he knew to be of a more quicke and hardy spirit) France, as the body of the Estate. And seeing Giles visit for Armes, and giuen to detest on, he made him Archibishop of Rouan. To bridle the turbulent spirit of Griffon, and to take from him all occasion of debate, he would not giue him any certaine portion, but the good

A good will of his elder brethren: being taught by the experience of former reignes, that many commanding brethren are dangerous to an Estate : shewing himselfe more wise and happy therein then Cleus.

Thus Charles Martel (having liued fifty five yeares) dyed in the yeare of Grace 741. hauing commanded absolutely in France twenty and five yeares, as Maire or Prince of the French, vnder the reignes of Chilperic, Thierry, and Childeric. One of the worthiest men that euer liued, either in this Monarchy, or in any foraigne Estate. He was religious, wise, iust, valiant, modest in prosperity, resolute in aduersity, temperate in authority, not passionate nor reuengefull, diligent and fortunate. By these excellent vertues he did quietly B purchase this great degree, whereby his posterity hath mounted to the royall throne, although he had but the paine to get it, and the honour to perserue the Realme from shipwracke in the weaknesse of these kings, and the stormes of many confusions. His children (according to the diuersity of their humours) had diuers euents. Caroleman wanted no valour, but having accompanied his brother Pepin in diuers exploits, in the end he resignes him all his authority, becomes a Monke, and dies so at Vienne. Giles full of ambitious heart, not pleased with the wise resolution of his father, did all he could to crosse his brother Pepin, although he had giuen him a sufficient portion in Normandy. Transported with this spleene, he stirs vp the Saxons, Bauarians, and those of Guienne, against him at diuers times. In the end (being suppressed in all places) he vndertakes a voyage into Italy, C to attempt something against his brother : but he was slaine by the way, by a gentleman of Bourgongne, as a man of no valour nor quality. This fire was thus quenched, and Giles died vnworthily, leauing this lesson to posterity, That ambition hastens ruine, and contrariwise, that the one halfe is better then the whole.

Forerunnings or preparatives to the reigne of Pepin.

Pepin, seeing himselfe alone in great authority, vnderpropr by the merits of his grandfather, resolued so to behaue himselfe, as his owne defects should not onely con firme this reputation left him by inheritance, but also perswade the French that he was worthy of a greater command, and by their free consents, hold him capable of the Crowne. He knew the humour of the French, who loue and honour their King with an especial de- D uotion, and cannot be induced to doe otherwise, but by great and urgent reasons: He manageth this designe with such dexterity, as he effects it, and the meanes (which the prouidence of God did minister vnto him) did as it were guide him by the hand, for to him we must attribute the principall cause of this notable change. The Sarazins infinitely grieved with these two defeats, prepare another army : Ieffroy was also of this party, and it seemed this third league did threaten France with a greater storme. Pepin remembering that his father had beene surpris'd, sends forth his spies, and being speedily aduertised of their designe, he assembles all the Forces he could, with an incredible celerity : finding himselfe first in Armes, he enters into Guienne, and seizeth on the passages of the Pyrenean mountaines. Ieffroy being thus surpris'd, lets a good face on it, promising obedience E to Pepin : and is a mediator for the Sarazins, vndertaking that they should renounce their interest, and neuer enter more into France. Pepin obtaining his desire (being glad to haue preuented this storme, and forced so redoubted enemies to receiue a law from him), applied himselfe to the peoples humour, He dismisseth his army, buying himselfe in repairing of the Churches which the Sarazins had ruined, to ease the Citizens that were appoy- led, and in giuing them meanes to recouer themselves : to establish iustice, so vnburthen the subiects of publike charges, and to let the French vnderstand that he was as fit for peace as war. The Church of Rome was then in great reputation, and the Popes did once ly busie themselves with the seruice of God, and to maintaine Princes in concord, the which purchased them great credit, for the respect Christian people bare to religion. Zachary held then the Pontificall seat, and had the Lombards for a subiect of continual feare, being his irreconcilable enemies, against whom he could not haue more assuredly speedily help then in France, & by Pepin's meanes, who held the soveraigne authority. Martel had already avoided a dangerous warre through the amity he had with Luithprand King of the Lombards, after whose death Rachise Duke of Friol, chosen in his place, threatens the Pope openly: for all the Lombards faire shewes, & large protestations of friendship, were but foretellings of his vnfaithfulness. Wherefore Zachary entertained Pepin carefully, which helped him much to compass his desire. And although his ambitious humour made him sometimes to speake too peremptorily of his victories and ordinary defects, yet could he A containe himselfe in greatest occasions: and behaved himselfe in such fort, as hee seemed not to aspire vnto the crown, but that necessity and the common consent of all the French did (as it were) force him thereunto. The most remarkable thing in all the course of this History, is the order he held to compass a designe of so great importance.

As he discoursed covertly of his intention, & openly of the vrgent necessity to provide speedily for the estate of the Realme: he had feed men to preach forth his praises, and the disgraces of Childeric, being as visible in the one, as remarkable in the other: reason giuing due praise to vertue, and dishonour to vice. In the one they see a simple stupidity, in the other a staid gravity; in the one a brutish fury, and in the other a moderate and temperate B spirit; in the one a beastly carelesnesse, in the other an active diligence; in the one a dissolute intemperancy, and in the other a well grounded continency. So as in the one was all good, and in the other all bad; in the one all pleased, in the other all displeased; and their actions were the table of their contrary dispositions. Childeric loued no man, neither did any many loue him: Pepin loued all, and was beloued of all, tying all vnto him by all occasions and good offices, and all to his masters losse. The common people loue Pepin entirely, as the protector of their liberty: and hated Childeric as one that regarded not the common good, in respect of his foolish and beastly voluptuousnesse: being neither willing nor able to doe well.

So the one being contemned and hated, was held vnworthy to reigne, the other praised C and beloued, was esteemed most worthy to be a King. The friends of Pepin failed not to proclaim his merits in all places, and the people embraced it with all content. But there were many difficulties in the execution of this generall desire: Religion (much respected by the French) the naturall reuerence and deuotion they bare to their Kings, and the remembrance of the merits of old Clouis, were strong lets to stay the violent desires of the most affectionate. But Pepin could well prevent all this by an admirable and happy dexterity: To the remembrance of Clouis vertues, he opposeth the memory of horrible disgraces and infamies, wherewith his posterity had beene polluted: and withall, the carelesnesse of these later Kings, noting all in rancke from father to sonne. And contrariwise, he did represent vnto them, the liuely remembrance of the great merits of Pepin his grand- D father, of Martel his father, and his owne, and from experience past, hee concludes of the future hope. As for the reuerence of the French to their Kings, he shewed that it was vowed to true Kings, and not to Kings in imagination, painted and disguised: and that the oath of alleageance tied them to a religious King, being valiant, iust, mercifull, ypright, diligent, practised in affaires, fit to withstand his enemies, to punish the wicked, to defend the good, and to protect the Christian law, according to the expresse words of the solemne oath which the French giue their King at his coronation. Why should they then be bound to a vicious King, negligent, and carelesse of himselfe and his Subiects, vnder the colour of a Crowne and Scepter? To conclude, the contract was limited, and the French were bound to obey that King, that was a lawfull King, who (being endued with royall E vertues) performed the office of a true King. These reasons were plaine, and easily receiued of all men, finding this change to be very necessary for the common good: neither was there any one but expected some profit in his owne particular, and sought to purchase the fauour of Pepin.

But yet there remained a scruple of Religion, for the dispensing of their oath. This article must be decided at Rome, where Pepin (assuring himselfe of his good friends, who were necessarily vnto him) hoped for a good end, seeing the principall was determined by the consent of the French. He therefore sends Bruchard Bishop of Bourges, and Pobed his Chaplaine vnto Rome, (men pleasing to all, and faithfull to himselfe) to represent the care of France, and the generall desire of the French, to Pope Zachary. The Pope (duly informed of the weaknesse of Childeric, being hated and contemned of all men, without any support, and of the generall resolution of the French to rectifie Pepin, burthensly inuoyed with hope, to draw great helpe from him against the Lombards, his capital enemies) dispensed the French from their oath of obedience to Childeric, and to all his Race.

Now shall that Race be dispossessed, and this decree shall be the last act of the Merouingians Tragedy.

CALLED CAROLOVIN'GIENS:

eyther of CHARLES MARTEL, or of CHARLEMAGNE,
the chiefe Pillars of this Race.

Oracles to iudge rightly of the estate of this second Race.

God is Iudge, he puls downe one, and sets up another. Man walkes as a shadow: hee strins in vaine: he gathers goods, and knowes not who shall enioy them. O Lord, what is man, that thou shouldest be mindfull of him? or the some of man, that thou so regardest him? Man is like vnto nothing: his daies are like a shadow that vanisheth, the somes of men are as nothing: and great men are but as a lye. If they were all together put in ballance, they would be found more light then runnity. It is be not withstanding, that preferueth Kings.

CHARLES MARTEL, the Stem of this second Race,

A Particular Chronologie of the second Race,

From the year 741. unto the year 988.

Years of Grace.	Number of Kings.
741	22	Charles Martel , the stem of this second Race, is numbred among the Kings, the 22. for he reigned in effect during the life of the Idle Kings, and so was buried among the Kings. After the Royall gouernment of 25. yeares, he left it to his sonne
750	23	Pepin the brieft, or short , who was crowned King, Chilperic 4 being degraded in the year 750. and left the Crowne peaceable to his sonne
814	24	Charlemagne , great in name and in effect, who remaining absolute Monarch of the Realme of France &amp; Austrasia , with all the dependances Northward: he added to this great masse, all Italy , and the greatest part of Spain , and so possessing the territories of the Empire in the West, he was receiued and installed Emperor of the West, having reigned 40 yeares
840	25	Lewis his sonne, surnamed the Gentle , succeeded him, and reigned King and Emperour, 27. yeares, and to him succeeded
878	26	Charles the 2. called the Bald , King and Emperour, who reigned 33. yeares: and to Charles the 2. succeeded
879	27	Lewis the 2. his sonne, called the Stuttering , King and Emperour, who reigned but a yeare and six moneths: At his death he left his wife with child, who being borne, was acknowledged for lawfull King, and called Charles the Simple : his minority lasted 22. yeares. Many Tutors, and many confusions. These Regents are crowned Kings, and (acknowledged by that name) doe hold the ranke among Kings, and so wee must diuide these 22. yeares, to euery Regent according to his reigne.
881	28	Lewis the 3. and Carlois , bastard of Lewis the Stuttering , reigned as Regents five yeares.
889	29	Charles the 3. a Prince of the blood, called the Grasse , as Regent, he reigne 7. yeares, being both King and Emperour: he was put from them both.
896	30	Ende or Odon sonne to Robt. Duke of Amou , as Regent he reigned 10. yeares. In the confusion of these last Masters , the Royall authority being greatly weakened, many Countreies freed themselves from the obedience of the French Monarchy: So fell out

THE ECLIPSE OF THE EMPIRE,

Robt in Germany and Italy. The body of the Empire remained in Germany, being afterwards gouerned by an Emperour, chosen by the Princes Electors. And Italy was dismembered into diuers Principallities, unto diuers Potentates. In the end, after this minority of 22. yeares

899	31	Charles the 4. called the Simple , sonne to Lewis the Stuttering , was crowned as lawfull King and reigned 25. yeares. But Raoul of Bourgoigne , A Prince of the blood, was called by the league, to put downe King Charles , called the Simple : being imprisoned by them, and forced to renounce the Crowne. Charles dying with griefe, Raoul reigned 13. yeares; but in the end was expelled from this usurpation.
936	33	Lewis the 4. called d'Outremur , or beyond the Sea , sonne to Charles the Simple , being called out of England, (whether his mother had caried him to preferre him from the League) was acknowledged King, and reigned 29. yeares.
954	34	Luthaire his sonne succeeded him, who reigned 33. yeares.
986	35	Lewis the 5. sonne to Luthaire , reigned about two yeares, and dying without issue, interred with him the Race of Charles Martel , as his Ancestors had of long time obliuiscd his vertues, and that of the valliant Charlemagne , vnfortunate in their successors.

Thus the second Race called Carlovingiens, having reigned 230. yeares, ended in Lewis the 5. and gaue place to the third Race, which reignes at this day.

B PEPIN THE SHORT, THE 23. KING OF FRANCE:

And first of the second Race.

THE French thus freed by the Popes dispensation, from their oath of obedience, assemble the Generall Estates: and to auoyd confusion in the Realme, apparently growne by the negligence of their Kings, they concluded to reiect Chilperic, and to choose Pepin: the one vnworthy to reigne, by reason of his vices, and the other most worthy to bee King, for his Royall vertues.

And to the end, the fundamentall Law of State should not bee directly infringed in this new Election, they bring Pepin from the race of great Clouis, of whom they said, he should be acknowledged for the next heire, seeing that (vertue and his race being duly weighed) he approached nearest to him in ver-tyue. Pepin himselfe would not assit at this Assembly: that the offer of this dignity (being made without his apparent seeking it) might bee the more honorable. Being called to heare the Generall conclusion of the Parliament, and the common desire of all the French, he presents himselfe, being pleasing to all men, in more then an ordinary sort: little of body, but shewing in his countenance the greatnesse of his spirit: amiable by his mild and modest behauiour, and admirable for his graue pleasing Maiesty.

The Assembly lets him vnderstand by Boniface Archbishop of Mayence or Mentz, that the French (in regard of his vertues, and their future hope) had by a free and Generall consent, chosen him King of France. And for execution of the said Decree, he was instantly (in the presence of them all) installed King, the Royall Crowne was set vpon his head by the said Archbishop, and then hee was raised vpon a target, and caried about the Assembly, after the ancient ceremony of the French. And by vertue of the same decree, Chilperic was chalenged as vnworthy of the Crowne, degraded, shauen, and confined into a Monastery, there to passe the remainder of his daies. This notable change hapned in the year 750. in the City of Soissons, but with so resolute a consent of all the French nation, as there appeared not any one that made shew to dislike thereof. A most assured testimony, that God had so determined, (having referred to himselfe the soueraigne authority ouer Kings,) to place and displace, gird and vngird, raise and cast downe, according to his good pleasure, alwaies iust, and alwaies wise. To him wee must ascribe the principall and soueraigne cause of all changes: For God is the gouernour, as he is the Creator: It being a necessary consequence, that he gouerns that which he hath created, & by his prouidence watcheth especially ouer mankind, for whom he hath made the world. If we shall otherwise seeke the nearest causes of this alteration, we may iustly say, that vice dispossessed Chilperic, and vertue set Pepin in possession of the Crowne: Ioue & the reuerence of subiects, being the support of publike authority: hate and contempt the ruine thereof. To the end that Princes by so worthy an example, may learne to banish vice, which (making them hatefull and contemptible) thrusts them from their Thrones, to plant vertue, which (causing them to be respected and honored) makes them to reigne ouer nations.

Pepin chosen King by the Parliament, and Chilperic reiected.

Soueraigne cause of this change.

The estate of this second race.

Now we begin a new gouernment, vnder new Kings, and in a new race. In the beginning we shall see two great Princes, vnder whom good order shall make an alteration of affaires, with an abundance of all blessings, both spirituall and temporall. Iustice, wisdom, policy, armes, valour, large limits of territories, abundance of peace, and the excellent knowledge of learning, to raise this estate to the greatest happinesse that euer it enjoyed, and scarce any other kingdome whatsoeuer, let foraine nations say what they please. But the happinesse of these two Kings shall not be hereditary in their posterity, who beginning soone to degenerate, shall decline by degrees, vntill that vice depriving them of the Crowne, vertue shall giue it to another, who shall shew himselfe a more lawfull successor, and righter heyre to Charlemagne, hauing a better part in his vertues. This second Race shall enioy the kingdome 237. yeares, beginning to reigne in the yeare 750. and ending in the yeare 987. hauing begun by vertue, and ended by vice. A goodly lesson for Potentates: that bounty, wisdom, and valour, are no hereditary possessions to be left vnto their children, but they are the gifts of God, the author of all good, and their soueraigne Prince, to whom they owe homage for their greatnesse, as to him of whom depends absolutely all the Kingdomes of the earth, and whose providence is the infallible rule of the changes which we see incident to mankind, the which the ignorant without reason, attribute to blinde Fortune.

Instruction for great men.

Pepin striues to win their loues by good deeds.

Pepin seeing himselfe seated in the Throne of the French Monarchy, by the honourable fauour of the French: he resolues to satisfie their hopes by the effects of his actions: and begins to confirme in their minds the true and firme bond of obedience, the which is vnitied with these two strings, loue, and the peoples respect to their superiors. Nothing being more naturall, then to loue him from whom we receiue, or hope for good, and to respect him whom we hold sufficient to make vs to liue peaceably, and in quiet, especially when he hath power and command in the common-weale, without the which the particular cannot subsist.

An assembly of the generall Estates.

The Saxons rebell and are subdued.

Thus Pepin assembles the generall Estates, meaning to lay a good foundation in time for the affaires of the Realme, by the aduice of such as had called him: and according to his fathers stile, he names this Assembly a Parliament, whereunto he calls the Clergy, the Nobility, the Iudges of the Land, and the common people: that with one consent they might resolue what was necessary for the whole Estate, consisting of these goodly parts. During these alterations, the Saxons (as farthest from their Master) had shaken off the yoke of the French obedience: and by their example and practices, had drawne other people of Germany (subiect to this Crowne) to the like revolt. Pepin armes presently, and goes with such expedition, as he ouerthrewes them at the passage of the riuer of Vistula: but the Popes distresse giues him presently a new cause to employ his Forces: for Zachary being dead, Stephen the second (a Romane borne) succeeds both in place and troubles: being forced to defend himselfe against the Lombards, the capital enemies of the Romane Sea. Astolpho was then their King, who made great preparatiues against this new Pope, although he made no shew of open hatred. Stephen well informed of the Lombards humour and intent, resolues, not to attend the stroke, but to fortifie himselfe in time, and seeking first to Constantine Emperour of the East, without any successe, he entreats Pepin to succour him: from whom hauing received a fauourable answer, the better to obtaine the remedy hee expected, hee resolues to goe into France: where being honourably entertained by Pepin, he doth againe crowne him King of France, in Saint Denis Church, in a great and solemne Assembly, and makes miserable Childeric a Monke, assigning him the Cloister for a perpetual prison, and a Friars frocke for an ignominious punishment, without any hope of returne. Then hee employed all his wits to perswade Pepin to vndertake the voyage of Italy against the Lombards, and drew him easily therunto. But Astolpho (fearing the Pope) employed Caroleman (the brother of Pepin) to diuert him from this enterprise. This Caroleman was a Monke, and in great reputation of piety, but he could not dissuade Pepin from this designe: yet would hee not attempt any thing rashly, but first try mildnesse before force. He therefore sends his Ambassadors to the Lombard, to summon him to yeeld Raenna, & at the towns

A of the fixe Gouvernours to the Pope. Astolpho vlteth great temperance in his answers, to shew the reverence he bare to the Church of Rome, and to Pepins intercession: but he resolved neuer to yeeld any thing. Pepin finding the Lombards euasions, and policie (who sought but to auoide this storme) assembles a Parliament: and laies before them both duty and necessity to succour the Pope. To this end he resolues to leauy an Army against the Lombard. Winter being spent in these treatises, and in the preparations for warre: in the Spring he enters Italy with a strong and mighty army, which marcheth victoriously in all places, taking townes, and spoyling the Country of Astolpho, and then he went to besiege Paui, the chiefe Citie of Lombardy. Astolpho foreseeing his ruine, flies to humble intricacies both to the Pope and Pepin. The Pope lulled asleepe with the Lombards fayre promises, not greatly louing the French, but by constraint, suffers himselfe first to be abused, and then he perswades Pepin to returne backe into France.

Astolpho promised to yeeld vp both Raenna, and all that he detained from the Church, the which he could not performe in so great a desolation of his country, being furcharged with such an enemy. Stephen was well satisfied with this promise, forgetting the Lombards humor, so well knowne vnto him. Pepin glad to see the Pope satisfied (hauing no other object but to giue him satisfaction) returns presently into France to his owne affaires: But he had scarce passed the Alpes, when as Astolpho assembles all his subiects (being mad with rage for their great losses, and infinitely incensed against the Pope, who had drawne in the French) and enters the territories of the Church in hostile manner, sacks and spoiles all with a furious cruelty, and suddenly besiegeth Rome, where the Pope was resident. Stephen amazed at this vnexpected violence, sends backe to Pepin, implores his aide, laments his credulity, and detests the treachery of the Lombards: he beseecheth him to make haste, if he will preferre his old age from the cruell hand of this dissolay, and the whole Church from a horrible desolation, exceeding that of the Vandals and Ostrogoths.

The Lombard besiegeth Rome, and is forced to receiue, and to sue for a peace.

Pepin moued with the Popes entreaties, and the apparent danger, assembles his Forces, with a wonderfull celerity: and although Constantine by a most affectionate message laboured to diuert him, yet he brings backe his Army into Italy. The fruit of his returne was both sudden & great: for Astolpho at the brutt thereof raiseth the siege from before Rome, and retires to Paui the chiefe City of his Realme. Pepin besiegeth him, and forceth him to accept of such conditions of peace as he would prescribe, viz. That Astolpho should presently deliuer up all that he held of the Church, and giue hostages: and Pepin should remaine in Italy at the Lombards charge, vntill he had performed all things. Astolpho sends in forty hostages, yeelds Raenna, with the Cities of the fixe Gouvernours, and those he held in Komagnia: but when there remained no more to deliuer vp, but the Cities of Ferrara and Paenza, the Lombard did cunningly delay the full accomplishment of his promise, to find some meanes to send backe so rude an officer as the French, lying vpon his Country in garrison, and spoiling it: and so to deceiue both the Pope and Pepin. But behold a strange accident befalls him. Being hunting, chasing more after his fantasies then the beast, his horse casts him downe a rocke, and breaks his necke.

Of an ill life, and unhappie end.

Thus the subtil Lombard thinking to deceiue, was deceiued: hee ended his subtilty with his life, and the warre (begun by him without reason) by a iust death. The Pope recouers his places, and Pepin returns into France, taking nothing in Italy, but leaving the Realme of Lombardy in the same estate hee found it, without any alteration. This Kingdome ended not with Astolpho, for Didier Duke of Herruria his peer kinsman, seizeth presently thereon, by means of his intelligences: but Zacharys brother to Astolpho (who was lately become a Monke) leaues his frocke to enioy his fathers Kingdome: yet for that he was the weaker with this iustitie, the Pope compounds this contumelious in fauor of Didier, who remained King of Lombardy, vpon condition that the Cities of Ferrara and Paenza should be yeilded to the Church.

Of the way that he took to be crowned by a Parliament.

But lets returne to Pepin: his absence, with two yeares continuall warres, had broken the usuall custome to call a Parliament, and bred many disorders within the Realme: so as being returned into France, hee presently called a solemne Parliament, wherein he established lawes according to the inconueniences that were to bee redrest: as good Lawes do commonly proceed from bad manners. In this Assembly he gaue audience to the Ambassadors of the Emperour Constantine, who demanded a confirmation of the amity and alliance which the Emperour had with the House of France, and receiues the new homage of Tassillon Duke of Bauaria. So referring all matters of importance to the judgement of A the Estates, honouring them that had honoured him, he doubled his subjects devotion, and made good lawes within his Realme. But knowing the humour of the French, impatient of rest, he found how difficult it was to retaine long in peace, without some foreign employment: and necessity presents him two occasions, one in Guienne, and the other in Saxony, Countries subject to the Crowne of France, but both impatient of the French command. The Saxons beganne first: with whom Tassillon Duke of Bauaria, (who as we said did homage to the King) joyne, contrary to his oath. This war seemed to be of some difficulty, drawing to it all the other Germanes subject to this Crowne. But Pepin prevented it with such speed, as having suppressed the Saxons, he forced them to a new obedience, charging them to bring him yearly three hundred good horses for an homage, that they should vndergoe the censure of the Estates, and to be enemies to the enemies of the King and Realme.

Having thus pacified Saxony, he makes a general assembly at Worms, to settle the affairs of Austrasia: from thence he marcheth with his victorious army, against Ieffroy Duke of Guienne, according to the resolution of the Estates, being leauied for that occasion. We haue said, that Eudon, father to Ieffroy, was much troubled and annoyed France, and left his children heires of his discontent: but Martel withdrawne by some new difficulties, could not finish that which he had begun. Ieffroy remains sole Duke of Guienne, by the death of his brother he growes daily more insolent, bandies all his subjects of Guien openly against C France, and afflicts the Clergy infinitely in their liues and liuinges. Pepin begins with admonitions and threats: but Ieffroy growes more obstinate in cōtemning his Kings command, so as they must come to open force, and Ieffroy must pay the interest of his long delays. Pepin enters Guienne with an army, and Ieffroy seeing his resolution, sends his deputies to avoid this storme, beseeching him with all humilitie to pardon what was past, promising obedience. Pepin (having commanded him to make restitution to the Clergy) returns into France and dismisseth his army, supposing Guienne to be quiet. Ieffroy seeking his owne ruine by his furious rashnes, goes to field with such Forces as he could leaue among his subjects; and hauing passed Loire, he enters Bourgonne in hostile manner, hoping to surpris Chalons. The King held then a Parliament at Orleans, when this intelligence D came vnto him, he sends them presently to Neuers: assembleth his Forces and marcheth against Ieffroy, who suddenly repaeth the Ruier, and with great marches recouers Bordeaux, as the City of his greatest safety, being as much confused in his defence, as he was rash in his attempt. Pepin pursues him, and in his passage all the Townes of Guienne yeeld without any difficulty, as to him whom they acknowledge for their lawfull King. Ieffroy forsaken of all men, pursued criminally by his Prince, is slaine by one of his household ser- uants, and is interred like a beast, in a marshy neare to Bordeaux. In detestation of his memory, the place is called the Tombe of Caipha vnto this day. Thus was the vniust and rash rebellion of Ieffroy punished: and by his death the warre dyed in Guienne: and the wise valour of Pepin was so much more commended, for that his iust pursuit was accom- E nished with patience and mildnesse. But Pepin was mortall the toyle of so great warres, and the care of publick affayres, had much broken him, so as his old age might be more profitably employed in the maintenance of Iustice and peace, then in warre, the burthen whereof he might without danger lay vpon his eldest sonne Charles, a wife and a valiant young Prince, of whose modesty and obedience he was well assured.

Thus resolving to passe the rest of his dayes in quiet, but not idly, he retires to Paris; but soone after he was surprisid with a sicknesse, whereof he dyed, and so went to heauen there to finde rest which he could not enioy on earth: it was in the year 768, and 18 of his reigne. By his Wife Berthe with the great foote, he left two sonnes, Charles and Carloman: recommending them to the Estates, to giue them portions at their pleasures. F So great was the assurance of this good Prince in the loue of his Subjects, whom as hee had made the most assured guard of his Person and State, so at his death he left his Children to their faithfull discretion. Hee had seauen daughters: Berthe the wife of Attilan Earle of Mans, mother to great Roland: Hiltrude wife to Rene Earle of Genes, mother to that renowned Oliver: Robarde, Adeline, Idubergue, Ode, and Alix. He had the happinesse to enioy his owne Father, vntill he came to the age of man: the like good hap continued in his children: & for the perfecting of his happinesse, he had a sonne, one of the greatest

A greatest and most excellent Princes that euer wore Crowne. Thus Pepin the first of that Race, mounted the royall Throne of France: thus he reigned, thus he liued, and thus he died, leauing to his posterity a happy taste of his name. A religious Prince, wife, moderate, valiant, louing his subjects, and beloued of them, happy in father, in children, and in his gouernment, an excellent patterne for excellent Princes, who by his example hold it for a resolute maxime, That the strongest fortresse for a Prince is the loue of his subjects, and the iurest bond of their authority, a respect gotten and preferred by vertue.

Estate of the Empire and of the Church.

B Vt before we enter the reigne of Charlemagne, we must briefly represent the Estate of the Romane Empire, the which was happily vnitd to the French Monarchy, and of the Church of Rome, by reason whereof there happened great and notable exploits vnder his reigne. The Empire of Rome had nothing remaining in the West, as we haue shewed. The Empire in Gaule was possessed by the French, with the best part of Germany: and since the beginning of their Monarchy, vnto the time we now describe, it hath bene greatly enlarged, not onely in compass of territories, and obedience of people, but also in reputation of ciuility, mildnesse, iustice, wisdom, and valour, as well by the happy successe of their victorious armies, as by the modest vfrage of their victories, towards such as they subdued. Spaine was apportioned to diuers nations: Vandales, Goths, Sarazins, pel mel, some here, some there. Italy was in miserable estate. Rome (sometimes the head of the world) was C then the sincke of all confusion, the Rendezuous of all furious Nations, as if they had vnder- taken the ruine thereof by taske, hauing sackt it three times: for vnder the Empire of Honorius, in the year of Grace 414. the Goths, by their King Alaric, tooke it after two yeares siege, and sackt it, without demanteling thereof. Forty five yeares after, vnder the Empire of Martian, in the year 459. the Vandales vnder the conduct of Gensericke their King, take it againe, sacke it, spoile it, and disgrace it, leading the widow of the Emperor Valentinian the third, basely in triumph. In the time of Iustinian the Emperor, the Goths vnder the command of Totila, hauing vndermined it with a long siege, tooke it, sackt it, and demantled it. Thus Rome was no more Rome, but a horrible confusion, after so many ruines, retaining nothing of her ancient beauty, but only the traces of her old D buildings, and the punishment of her tyranny, hauing endured that which she had caused other Cities to suffer.

Behold Italy wasted, infinitely tormented by sundry enemies, who had vnjustly afflicted all the Nations of the earth. The Goths had first seized thereon, and enioyed it long, but as vnder the Empire of Iustinian in the year of Christ 552. they were expelled by the valour of Narses, an excellent Captaine, who defeated their army, slew their King Totila, and repossessed Rome: soone after, the Lombards coming out of Germany, lodged in their place, as if they had played at leuell coile, being drawne thither by Narses himselfe, being discontented with the ill vfrage he had receiued from Iustinian his master. The Lombards held Italy about two hundred yeares, vntill that Charlemagne expelled them. At E the same time the sixe Gouernors for the Empire of Rome, held Rauenna and some other Cities depending, (thus was the greatnesse of the Romane Empire restrained) but with such couetousnesse and insolvency, as it tired them no lesse then forraigne foes. That gouernment of sixe ended by the Lombards, and the Lombards by the French (as the sequell will shew) who purchased credit euerywhere by comparing of the barbarous and confused inuasions of these warlike Nations, they adding to the valour and good successe of their armes, iustice, piety, temperance and clemency: this reputation of vertue winning them as many hearts, as their swords did Cities.

During these confused and obscure times, there passed about foure hundred years, from the first sacke of Rome, vntill that Charlemagne, (expelling the Lombards) became absolute master of Italy, and was made Emperour at Rome. All this passed vnder the Emperors of Constantinople, from Acadius, of Valentinian the third, Martian, Leo the second, Zeno, Justin, the first, Iustinian the first, Iustin the second, Tiberius, Mauritius, Phocas, Heraclius, Constantin the second, Iustinian the second, Philippicus, Artimius, Leo the third, Constantin the third, Leo the fourth, Irrenus, Nicephorus, vnder whom by a publicke and solemne contract, the distinction of the Easterne and Westerne Empires was made good.

The command of the West is left as it were in guard with Charlemagne, and the French nation.

Estate of the East.

The beginning of Mahomet's Religion.

nation. But the East was in a bad plight, although the name and fear of the Empire were A yet at Constantinople: for besides the dissipation of the State, (to increase their misery) a new sect sprung up, forged by Mahomet an Arabian borne, vnder a colour of liberty, by the mixture of sundry doctrines, and after a mould of carnall felicity. With this charme he corrupted infinite numbers of people, and created a new Kingdom in the East, from whence he utterly expelled the Romane name, with all the dignity of the Empire. This was in the time of the Emperour Heraclius, in the year of grace 623, an infamous date, to note the beginning of Mahomet's blasphemies. He began in Arabia, having wonne credit with the Sarazins, who were Arabian souldiers, desperate aduenturers, and discontented with the Romans: and by the first beginning of his new doctrine, he got so great B reputation, as hee assembled an infinite number of men, armed with an incredible celeritie, vnder the ensigne of libertie. So as hee marched as a Conquerour in all places, hauing not onely subdued (by the force of these tumultuous troopes) Arabia (where he was borne) but also Persia, Palestina, Iudea, Egypt, and Africke, and then ranging ouer Asia the Lesse, he came to the gates of Constantinople, in lesse then thirtie years.

But the providence of God, caring for the preferuation of his Church, opposed the French Monarchie, against the violent rage of Mahomet, which else had ouerflowne all Europe, into the which hee had already made a breach by Spaine: had gotten a great Country, and was ready to invade France, if Charles Martel had not stoppe his course at C Tours, as we haue said. During these confusions in the Empire, the Bishop of Rome grew great by these ruines. The Goths and Vandales were more enemies to the State, then to religion: for although for the most part they were Arrians, yet did they aduow themselves Christians, and held the common signe of Christianity, so as in the taking and sacking of the City of Rome, the Bishop was somewhat respected, and in his fauour the people built vpon the foundation of the ruined houses: and many of the Country finding more safety at Rome, then in other Cities of Italy, retired themselves thither, and peopled the City. So by this occasion new Rome (the seat of the Popes iurisdiction succeeding the Emperors) hath bene built within old Rome, amidst the Palaces, Walks, Basiliques, Colosses, Amphitheaters, and other ancient buildings.

But aboute all, the credit and authority of the Bishop of Rome (by these new occurrents) crept in by degrees, vntill he aduanced himselfe aboute the Emperours, Kings, and Princes of Christendome: yet he of Constantinople held himselfe the superior, being in the proper seat of the Empire, and in the light of the Imperiall Court. Thus they fall to debate, and the cause of their dissentions was the preeminence of their Seas, and the authority of the vniuersall Bishop. This contention bred infinite confusions in the church, and in an vnseasonable time, which intited men to sacke and spoile. So as Saint Gregory Bishop of Rome (a man of singular piety and learning) hauing courageously opposed himselfe against Iohn Bishop of Constantinople, who affected this title of vniuersall Bishop, and desecting to vnreasonable and vnseasonable ambition, cries, Oh times, oh B manners! the whole world is set on fire with Warre. Christians are euerywhere massacred by Idolaters, Cities and Temples razed by Barbarians, and yet the pastors of the Church (as it were treading vnder foot the common calamity of Gods people) dare vsurpe names of vanity, and braue it with those prophane titles.

The reader (curious to vnderstand the Estates of those times, and to note the degrees and authority of this vniuersall Bishop, established in the Church) may read the Epistles of this good Father, great in name, and in effect, without troubling my selfe to set them downe in particular whose intention was to fiew. That who so taketh vpon him the authority and title of vniuersall Bishop in the Church, and to haue any Soueraigne preeminence, presumes aboute Iesus Christ, the only head of the sacred body of the Church, F and by consequence he doth affirme that hee is the forerunner of Antichrist. And yee after these graue and serious admonitions of Saint Gregory, the great, within ten years after, Boniface the third obtained from Phocas the Emperour the title of vniuersall Bishop, with authority ouer the vniuersall Church, as Plaina the Pope Secretary doth report.

To this quarrell for the supremacy, was added the controuersie for Images, which caused infinite confusions: the Emperours and Bishops were banded one against another, and

Images at the first a politique institution.

A and by their dissentions the people were stirred vp to seditious reuolts, the which after many Tragical events, were a meane to ruine the Empire in the East. It was a popular custome to erect Images to those whom they would honour, as hauing deserved well of the Common-weale. Christians desiring to honour the memory of holy men, began to set vp Images euen for them also, following this custome to Rome, and did erect them in Temples, as places consecrated to deuotion. Some Bishops fauoured this new deuice in the Church, and others did impugn it. Epiphanius did erect a picture in peeces, and Serenus did beate downe an Image, the one in the East, the other in the West. The Christians borne and bred in this ancient doctrine of the Apostles, My children beware of Images, maintained in the Catholike Church, by succession from father to sonne, could not digest this inuention: no more could the Emperours.

Hence grew the dissention, the greater part of the Bishops holding the contrary, That it was a part of the seruice of God, and to abound to retain mens souls in deuotion with reverence. This contention grew in the time of the Emperour Philippus called Dardanes, who by an Edict caused them to be throwne downe, in the year of grace 713, the which continued to 732. vnder Constantine the second, called Copronymus, an enemy to Images, who commanded them to be cast downe, contrary to the liking of his mother Irene, who not onely maintained them with violence, but also caused them to be confirmed by a Councell held at Nicea a City in Bithinia, seeing that at Constantinople (where she had made the Conuocation of this Ecclesiasticall Assembly) the people were resolute to withstand them. Hence grew an execrable Tragedie in the Imperiall Court, Irene seeing her sonne resolute against her defence of Images, was so transported, as (hauing seized on him in his chamber) she caused his eyes to be put out, so as dying with griefe, she flung the Empire. Through this bad gouernment, confusion so increased in the East, as in the end necessity made the way for Charlemagne, to take vpon him the dignity and title of the Emperour of the West, and to preserve the Provinces in those parts from the disorders of the Greeke Emperours, as wee may see in the continuance of this History.

I am bound to obserue these so notable occurrents, in those times, as belonging to the subject of my History, to represent truly both the Estate of the Empire & the Church, when as Charlemagne vnderooke the gouernment of the Empire, and vniited it happily to the French Monarchy. The wise reader may verifie more plainly in the Originalls, (from whence I haue drawne this Inuentory) what I haue briefly set downe here touching the occurrents of those ages, wherein the Oracle of holy antiquity was verified by the end of these strange Tragedies. The truth is left by contending. The first simplicity of the Catholike Church, being rich in her poeury by the abundance of truth, continued since the golden age of the Apostles, and their Disciples, was changed into rich and stately pompe: the Crownes of Martyrdome wherewith the first Bishops of Rome had bene honored, into a triple Crowne, which not onely hath and doth giue lawes to Emperours, Kings and Princes of the earth, but doth tread them vnder foot, dispossessed them of their estates, and declares them incapable of rule when they obey him nor: and for a mark of this foueraigne authority, hee makes them to kisse his feet, in token of the homage of deuotion, and spiritall reuerence, as hauing power ouer our soules, to iudge of all men, and all things foueraignly, and not to be iudged by any, as the circumstances of our History will shew in diuers places.

This was the Estate both of the Empire and of the Church vnto the death of Pepin the Short, the first King of the second Race, in the year 750. or thereabouts.

CHARLES

CHARLES the Great, or CHARLEMAGNE.

The 24. King of France.

From the year 768. unto the year 814.

Pepin children divide the Realme.

PEPIN's Estates of France assemble after the death of Pepin; and by their consents and advice, Charles and Caroloman, his sons, divide the Realme betwixt them by equal portions: Charles was crowned at Wormes, Caroloman at Soissons: Writers agree not in the declaration of their portions, for that by the death of Caroloman, the whole Realme came to Charles, three years after the death of their Father: Brothers of diuers humours, who in the end had ruined each other by this equality of power, which proues often an vnjust and a dangerous ballance in an Estate: But Gods will was to preferre to great a Monarchie in Europe, to be a harbour for his Church, by choosing a great Prince, to vnit in him alone the power which is dismembred by the command of many Masters.

Charles the patron of a great King. His manners.

Charles was endued with singular gifts, both of body and minde, whereunto (by the wife care of his father Pepin) was added (as a scale) the instructions of a virtuous conuerfation, learning, and armes. For the ground of all vertues, he was carefully instructed in Religion, the which hee loued and honoured with great reuerence all his life time; and likewise the Churches and Pastours: Charity, temperance, equiry, care of Iustice, and of order to releue the people, to keepe his faith both to friend and foe, and to vica victory modestly, were the notable effects of this excellent knowledge, as remarkable in him, as in any Prince that euer liued. Hee loued learning by nature, and learned men, Paul of Pisa instructed him in the Greeke and Latine tongues, and Aymen in Philosophy and the Mathematickes. Hee called these humane sciences his pastimes, and the companions of his sword, and sometimes did recreate himselfe therein. Hee tooke a delight in poetry, as some of his writings doe witnesse: but especially in Histories, wherein hee was exceeding well read.

His armes.

The vniuersities of Paris and Pisa, (built or enriched by him) witnesse the loue and honor he bare to learning. In armes he had his father Pepin for his chiefe schoolemaster, and experience doth testifie how much he profited. Before his father left him, hee had great commands, and discharged them with such reputation, as the continuance of his armes, when he was King, shew plainly, that there was neuer a souldier that carried sword with more valour, nor great Captaine that commanded with more obedience, nor performed any thing with greater fortune, nor vied his victories with more mildnesse, and iudgement; neither did euer King or Prince reigne with more authority, nor was more reuerently obeyed then our Charlemagne, wel deferring the name of great for his vertues. He was of a lively disposition, quick, active, and vehement; but modesty and wilddome did season this viuacity, and vehemency, with so good a grace, as if the one could not be without the other: and this moderation of diuers humours, made him as admirable for his Iudgement, as venerable in his countenance and person.

The success of his reign.

There appeared in him a graue sweet Maistey, in a goodly personage, great, strong, and patient of labour, a quick spirit, cleere, and sound, both in apprehension, memory, and iudgement: resolution neuer failed him in difficulties, nor reply in discourses: terrible to some, amiable to others, according to the cause, persons and occurrences: Vertues which purchased him so great credit, as he was beloued, respected, and feared of all men: with such obedience, as the effects of his reigne doe shew: for hauing receiued a great Kingdom from his father, he enlarged it with a wonderfull successe, God hauing raised vp these three great Princes, one after another, Charles Martel, Pepin, and this great Charles, to preferue the Christian name in a great Monarchy, amidst the deluge of barbarous nations and the ruine of the Empire. I haue quoted these his singular vertues in the beginning, to giue a taste to the obseruation of his great and admirable actions, where

A where there wants nothing but order, to relate them fitly in so great a diuersity, the which hath ministred occasion to the obscure writers of those times, to be too briefe, or too tedious, and oft-times to report matters very vnlkely, for the greatnesse of things which they haue handled in a fabulous manner: and indeed the euents are almost incredible, and more miraculous then ordinary. Doubtlesse I could gather out of the most confident Authors, and that according to the order of times, as euery thing hath changed, and answerable to the greatnesse of the subiect, that which cannot well be represented without some direction.

All the deeds of Charlemagne must be referred to that which he hath done either whilest he was King alone of France, or when he was Emperour, and had vnitied the Empire to his Royalty. And in those times, there is first to bee obserued what he did in the life of Caroloman in Guienne, and after his death in Italy, Spaine and Saxony, where hee had great matters to decide. This is the designe of our relation.

CARLOMAN was infinitely iealous of his brothers greatnesse, whom with griefe hee did see beloued, honoured, and obeyed of all the French, for his singular vertues, both of body and minde. This iealousie (too ordinary a Counsellor to Princes) made him to seeke all meanes to countermine and ouerthrow the affaires of Charlemagne, who had his eyes fixed vpon Italy, as the goodly and most beautifull Theatre of his valour, the true subiect to maintaine his authority and power amongst Christians: and Caroloman did all hee could to crosse his designs. And this was the estate of Rome and Italy.

Presently after the decease of Pepin, the Church of Rome fell into great confusions, by the practices of Didier King of Lombardie, a sworne and capital enemy, hauing corrupted some of the Clergie: hee caused Constantine brother to Toton Duke of Nepezo (his vassall and trusty friend) to bee chosen Pope, with such violence, as hee made Philippius (being already Canonically chosen) to bee degraded. This better party, seeing themselves contemned by the Lombard, assemble together, and by one common consent choose Stephen the third, a Sicilian, for Pope: who resolves to call in the King of France, and to oppose him against his enemies designs.

Charles solicited by the Pope, sends twelue Prelates speedily to Rome, to fortifie their party, against the other: meaning at greater need to apply a greater remedy. The matter succeeded according to their desire that had intreated him; for the Councell being assembled at Lateran, they confirme Stephen lawfully chosen, and depose Constantine raised by disorder and violence. But Didier would not bee controlled with this repulse, and seeing that force had not succeeded, hee resolves to try policie, and to undermine Stephen with a good shew. Hee sends to congratulate his election, purgeth himselfe of the Anti-pope Constantine degraded: accuseth both him and his brother of ambition, protesting to liue with him in amity: and for prooffe of this his good meaning, hee desires him to bee pleased with his repair to Rome, there to conferre with him in priuate. The Pope (who neuer flies to the French but in necessity) was easily perswaded by Didier: who came to Rome, conferres with the Pope, and makes great protestations of his obedience. But this good shew continued not long.

There was a gouernor at Rome for the Emperour, called Paul Ephialte. Didier corrupted this Grecian: and as the execution of Iustice was in his hands, hee makes vse of him so cunningly, as in the presence of Pope Stephen, hee causeth him to seize vpon two of his chiefe Secretaries, Christopher, and Sergius, (accused by him of supposed crimes) and to hang them infamously. Their greatest offence, was to haue fauoured the French. This presumption proceeded farther, for hee caused all the principall Citizens to be banished, whom hee noted to be of the French faction: that hauing taken away all others, he might be master of Rome in despite of the Pope. Stephen discouraging the Lombards practice, to his preiudice, flies to Charlemagne, beseeching him to prepare an armie against him.

force that did ruine him by his apparent mildnesse, Charlemagne was fully resolved: but Adier had provided a remedy in France, by the means of Carolan, to stoppe Charles his passage into Italy, making worke for him in Guienne, where there grew a perillous war vpon this occasion.

Rebellion in Guienne by Hunault.

We haue said before, that although the Country of Guienne depended of the Crown of France, yet were there many tumults through the practices of some Noblemen of the Country, who stirred vp the people (being murtherous of themselves) to rebellion. The cause of these reuolts was the abuse of the Kings bounty, who suffered such people as they had conquered, to enjoy their priuiledges, and liberties, intreating them with all fauour. Endon began first vnder Mariel: Jeffroy, and Hunault his children, and heires of his discontent, had continued it vnder Pepin: Jeffroy being dead, Hunault succeeds him with the like hatred, the which Carolan entertained to imploy him against his brother Charles: And as ieaousie, and ambition thrust him on to attempt against him, so did hee make his profit of the covetous ambition of Hunault, feeding him with the hope of the Siegneurie of Guienne, seeing his humour was to be a Duke, supposing to haue credit enough with the people, if he were fauoured by one of the Kings of France against the other. Guienne was a part of Charles his portion: Hunault layes the foundation of his designe, to with-draw himselfe wholly from the Crown of France, and to make open war against Charlemagne, in praesiding the people of Guienne, to be declared Duke by their consent, according to the right which he pretended. The countenance of Carolan could doe much, but the wisdom and courage of Charlemagne prevailed more, for being aduertised of Hunault his practices, and of his brothers secret designs, hee armed with such speed; as hee surprised the townes of Poitiers, Xaintes, and Angouleme: and by that means all the Country adioyning. Hunault (who made his account without Charles) finding himselfe preuented, fled to a Nobleman of the Country named Loup, whom hee not onely held to bee very firme to his faction, but also his trusty and affectionate friend.

Infraction
how Princes should carry themselves in small wars.

Charlemagne sends presently to Loup: hee summons him to deliuer Hunault into his hands, as guilty of high treason: and in the meane time hee builds a Fort in the midst of the Country, whereas the riuers of Dordone and Lisle doe ioyne, the which hee called Fronfac, as it were the front of the Sarazins, whom he had cause to feare, if these designs had succeeded. Thus getting Hunault with all his family, he doth punish him as a rebell: he pardoned Loup, and all that had obeyed him: and so ends a dangerous warre without blowes: but he grants life and liberty to Hunault, and the enioying of all his goods: leaving a memorable example to Princes, how they ought to cary themselves in ciuill wars, preventing a mischief by wisdom and diligence, and not to thrust their vanquished subiects into despair by rigour. Carolan seeing his practices against his brother to succeed ill, vnder takes a voyage to Rome, with an intent to cause some alteration there: yet with a shew of deuotion. His Mother Berthe (who likewise went this voyage) was honorably received in her journey by Didier King of the Lombards, treating a marriage betwixt her sonne Charlemagne and Theodora, Sister, or Daughter to this Didier, one of the greatest enemies of her sonnes good fortune. Yet Charlemagne to please his Mother, received this wife, but soon after he put her away, as unfit for his humors and affaires: and so that which seemed a cause of loue, bred greater hate betwixt these two Princes. Carolan hauing effected nothing at Rome, but onely made shew of his foolish and malicious ieaousie, too apparent in this his fained deuotion, returns into France, and there dies some after, in the yeare of our Lord 770.

Carolan dies
and leaves
Charlemagne
King alone.

Now is Charlemagne alone by his brothers decease: who quietly takes possession of his Estates, and retaineth such of his seruants as hee knew to haue beene most trusty to his brother, during their common ieaousies, expecting the like faithfulness, hauing entertained them when there was least hope.

The deeds of Charlemagne King of France alone, untill he was Emperour.

CHARLEMAGNE hauing put away his wife Theodora for suspect of incontinency, he married with Hildegard or Iddegard, daughter to the Duke of Sueue his vassall, by whom he had Charles, Pepin, Lewis, and three daughters, Rotrude, Berthe, and Gisle, the nurcery

A nurcery of his Noble family. Carolan ieaousie died not with him, but survived in Berthe his wife: who (impatient of her condition) thrust head-long with a spirit of reuenge against her brother in law Charles retires with her two sonnes to Didier King of Lombardy, as to the most bitter and irreconcilable enemy of Charlemagne. Didier entertaines her kindly with her children, hoping to effect his designe: but this was the leuaine of his own ruine. His practice, together with the widowes, was to procure the Pope (Stephen being dead, and Adrian a Romane Gentleman succeeding him) to confirme, and crowne the sonnes of Carolan for Kings of France. The Lombard had two strings to his bow, meaning both to put the Pope in disgrace with Charlemagne (the easier to suppress him being destitute of French succors, whereon he chiefly relied) and likewise to set France on fire, by the setting vp of new Lords. Didier beseecheth the Pope to grant this confirmation, to the children of Carolan for his sake. But Adrian (well acquainted with the Lombards humour) was so resolute in denying his request, as they fell to open hatred. Didier discontented with this repulse, armes and enters the six gouernments, with all his Forces, being a Seigneury vnder the Popes iurisdiction, spoiles the Country, and besiegeth Rauenna, the chiefe City of the Exarchie. The Pope sends his Nuncio vnto him, to expostulate the cause of this so sudden warre against his subiects, desiring him to yield what he had taken, and not to proceed in this hostile manner, without any reasonable cause, vpon paine of excommunication.

By his owne practices.

C At that instant there fell out a great occasion to increase the hatred betwixt Charles and Didier, for that Hunault (who had beene vanquished in Guienne) retired himselfe to Didier, and is not onely courteously received: but honoured with the charge of Generall of the Army, the which he had leauied against the Pope. Didier suffred himselfe to be so abused with the persuasions of Hunault, touching the means to attempt against the Estate of Charlemagne, that holding Italy vndoubtedly his own, he plotted a war, and assured himselfe of a certaine victory in France. Thus pride and wickednesse hastens his ruine. The Pope hauing no other defence but his excommunication, not defensible against Didiers Forces, flies againe to Charlemagne, as to his sacred Ancor or last hope, intreating aide from him in his necessity. Charlemagne had great reason to arme against Didier, who had alwaies crossed his affaires: fed his brothers ieaousies, received his widow and children, laboured to haue them chosen Kings of France, to trouble or ruine his Estate: entertained his rebellious subiects, and with them practised to make war against him.

poseth himselfe against the Lombard.

The sute and summons of the Romane Church, was a great motiue to induce him to arme, against him who professed himselfe an open enemy to Christian religion, whereof the Kings of France had alwaies shewed themselves protectors and gardiens. But not to attempt any thing rashly, he first sends his Ambassadors to the Pope, to assure him of his good will, the which should not be wanting in his necessity: but he thought it best to try mildnesse, before he vsed force against the Lombard. He therefore sends his Ambassadors to Didier, & doth summon him to restore what he had taken from the Pope, and to suffer him to liue in peace. Didier (who relied much vpon his policy,) giues good words to the Ambassadors, promising to performe all that Charles demanded: but in effect hee would haue the Pope accept of conditions of peace from him, and that the children of Carolan should be declared Kings of France. These demands were found very reasonable on either side: the treaty is broken, the French Ambassadors returne, and Didier renews the war more violently then before, against the Church: and hauing spoiled all the territory of Rauenna, he takes Faenza, Ferrara, Comachia, Campagna, & Romandiola, townes of the six gouernments. Charlemagne Ambassadors informe their Master, that the war with the Lombard is ineuitable, and finde all things at their returne ready to invade Italy: for Charlemagne being forced to suppress the rebellious Saxons, who (impatient of the French yoke) revolted daily, had leauied a goodly Army, the which was ready to be imployed against the Lombard.

He makes war by the advice of the Estates

But Charles would not attempt any thing in a matter of so great consequence without aduice of his Estates. Yet loath to lose time, he causeth his army to march, and makes his Rendezvous at Geneva (a towne vnder his obedience vpon the way to Italy) and hauing diuided his army into two, hee seizeth vpon the passages of Mont Cenis and Saint Bernard, which are the two entrees from France to Italy. The Estates hauing found the causes of warre against Didier King of Lombardy to be iust, Charlemagne causeth his Army army to aduance with all speed, and ioynes neere vnto Verceil. Didier attends him there, A and giues him battell: but at the first encounter, he is vanquished by Charlemagne. The Lombard hauing rallied and fortified his troopes, receiues a new defeat, and so great a one, as he is enforced to suffer his enemy to be master of the field. An infallible entrance to his ruine. Thus hauing tumultuously trusted vp what he could, he sends his sonne Adalgis to Verona, with the widow and children of Caroloman, casting himselfe into Paia, the which he had carefully fortified, as the dungeon and forresse of his last fortune.

Charlemagne pursues him at his heeles, besiegeth him with all his Forces in Paia, and resolues to haue it at what price soeuer. And to shew his resolution, he sends for his wife and children into France, to the end the Italians (who were doubtfull) might know his minde, and without attending any new occurrences, resolues to obey the victor. Hauing coopt vp Didier in Paia, and seized vpon all the approaches, he resolues to take Verona, which they held the strongest place of all the Lombards estate. So leauing his vncle Bernard to continue the siege at Paia, he marcheth with part of his army to Verona.

His resolution was successfull in the beginning, and this checke given to Didier (but vs as it were in prison) gaue a great alteration to the affaires of either party, amidst these people of diuers humours. The Spoletins, the Reatins, those of Ancona, of Perno, and of Ossino (as it were in sight one of another) yeeld to Charlemagne, and detest the wretched state of Didier, as a worthy reward of his trecherous iniultice, and violence. The Venetians (being neutrals and spectators of this tragedy, who neuer had dealt in any C fort with Didier) offer amity and succors to Charlemagne, who was desirous they should keepe the Sea quiet, lest the Emperour should be an actor in this quarrell for Didier.

Charlemagne stayed not long at Verona, before the City began to yeeld: Berthe the widow of Caroloman, being the chiefe instrument to draw them to composition, his Forces being (as she said) very fearefull. Adalgis the sonne of Didier finding himselfe vnable to resist so resolute a consent of the Citizens, nor to releue his fathers misery, flies secretly to the Emperour of Constantinople. Thus Verona yeeldes to Charlemagne by composition, who receiues both Berthe and the inhabitants to mercy, to whom hee performs his promise: he inflicts no other punishment vpon Berthe and her children, but a gentle admonition of their vnciuill rashnesse, and inioynes them to returne into France, D there to do better, & to liue more honorably. This was about Easter, which drew Charles to Rome, where he remained onely eight daies, to visit the holy places, and to conferre with Pope Adrian. They write wonders of the great entertainment the Pope gaue him, and of the shewes of amity of Charlemagne. He confirmed all that his father Pepin had giuen vnto the Pope, and greatly augmented it. The Pope made Charles a Patriarch of Rome, a degree to mount vnto the Empire: from thence Charles came to Paia the which being for the space of ten moneths pressed without by warre, and within by pestilence and famine, in the end yeelds by composition: and Didier (who had hated Charles without cause, and attempted warre rashly) falls into his hands, who shewes himselfe wife and modest, both to vndertake a war, and to vfe the victory. E

Thus Charlemagne hauing wisely vnderaken a iust war, and ended it happily, he ruined the Kingdom of the Lombards, carying Didier prisoner to Lions, or to Legee, for writers speake diuersly of the place of his imprisonment. This was in the year of our Lord 776. A notable date to represent the tragical end of so great a Kingdom, the which continued in Italy onely two hundred and foure years, vnder Princes of diuers humors. But iniustice, tyranny, and pride, prouoked the wrath of God against them, so as thinking to take from another, they lost their owne: to vsurpe the liberties of others, they fell into an ingominous slavery, and their subtilty was the cause of their owne misery.

A mirror for Princes and great States, neuer to attempt an vniult and vancessary war, to vsurpe another mans right, and neuer to thinke to preuaile ouer a good cause by craft and policie. Charlemagne vfed his victorie with great moderation towards the conquered nation, to the great content of all the Italians, who held it a great gaine to haue lost their old Master, and to be rightly free, being subiect to so wise a Lord: for he left them their ancient liberties, and to particular Princes (such as were vassals to Didier) their Seigneuries: to Arasise, sonne in law to Didier, he left the Marquise of Beneuent. He placeth French Gouvernours, in conquered Lombardy, meaning to haue them intreated with the like mildnesse, as the ancient patrimony receiued from his Predecessors. During

A ring the siege of Paia a Councell was held at Rome by Pope Adrian, in fauor of Charlemagne, to giue him honours anfwable to his merits of the Church; and namely the right to giue all Benefices throughout all Christendome, was said to belong vnto him: Charlemagne being returned into France, Adalgis (the son of Didier) sought to disquiet Italy, ayded by the Emperour Constantine, and the practices of Rogand to whom Charlemagne had giuen Frank, who revolted from his obedience: but all these rebellions were soone suppressed, by the faithfull care of the French gouernours, whom Charlemagne had left in the Country newly conquered: and Rogand being taken, suffered the paines of his trecherous rashnesse, being beheaded by the Kings commandement. Thus Italy re-

B maining quiet to him and his (as conquered by a iust war) it shall be hereafter incorporate to the French Monarchy in this second Race, being giuen in partage to the children of France, whilest that the good government of our Kings maintaines the dignity of the Crowne. But the end of this war, was the beginning of another in Germany, whereof the Saxons were the chiefe, drawing vnto them (according to diuersity of occasions) other people of Germany their neighbours. This war continued thirty three years, not all successfull, but at diuers brunts and seasons: the Saxons hauing still a desire to crosse Charlemagne in his designe, especially being buised in many other affaires of great consequence. I will briefly relate this war of Saxony, reporting with one breath, what hath bene feuerally dispersed in the whole History, without confusion of times or matter, following a style fit for this History. In those times Germany was subiect to the Crowne of France, although it had particular Estates, vassals to our Kings, whatsoeuer the Germans say, who confesse but a part thereof.

The Saxons were subiect to our Crowne, as appears by that aboue written, and namely vnder Martel and Pepin his sonne. The motives of this warre were diuers, the impatience of a people desiring their ancient liberty, not able to beare anothers command, and (as the Germans say) the hatred and ialousie of a mighty neighbour, threatening them with seruitude, and a controuersie of the limits of their Lands: but the greatest and most important cause of these warres, was the diuersity of Religion, for that the Saxons would obstinately hold the Pagan superstition, which they had receiued from their Ancestors; D and Charlemagne urged them to forsake their Paganisme, and to make open profession of the Christian faith: moued with zeale to the generall aduancement of the truth, and the priuate duty of a Prince to his subiects, to prouide for their soules health. A thing very worthy of obseruation. Belial did then fight against Christ; Pagan superstition against Christian verity. But alas, by whom, and wherefore are these vacuill warres at this day? Christians fight against Christians, the most sacred signe of Christianity appears on either side in Christian and French armies: Christians blood is spilt by Christians, through a blind fury, and want of vnderstanding in the fundamentall accord of the sauing truth. These are not onely different, but contrary warres to those of Charlemagne: and our iraged tumults are begun, and nourished without reason, both against the good of the Estate

E and Church. Vpon this controuersie of Religion, the Saxons made warre eight times against Charlemagne: especially when they found him buised elsewhere, watching their opportunity, either to crosse him in his designe, or to frustrate his attempts. At such time as he was in Italy they paid the wyld Colts, not onely in reiecting the French command, but also making open war against those Cities of Germany which obeyed Charlemagne: they had taken Eresbourg from the Crowne of France, euen vpon his returne, and besieged Sigisbourg, robbing and spoiling all the Country about. Charlemagne assembling a Parliament at Wormes, leaues a great Army, to charge the Saxons in diuers places. This Councell succeeded happily: for hauing vanquished the Saxons twice in one moneth in a pitched field, he reduced them to their ancient obedience, vning his

F story with much modesty and wisdom, desiring rather to shew them the power of his authority, then the rigour of his force. The chiefe among them was Widichind, and as Religion was the chiefe motiue of these ordinary rebellions, so Charlemagne seeking the establishment of Christian Religion in Saxony with great zeale, happily effected it: hauing vanquished this Widichind, by reason and humanity, & brought him to the knowledge of the truth, by his graue and wise conuersation, whom he persecuted without any violence, to leaue the Pagan superstition, which force of Armes could not effect in him, nor in the Saxons: for Saxons soules are not gained by force of Armes, but by reason. By this means meanes of this Widichind, the greatest part of the Saxons were drawne to the knowledge A of the true God, and the obedience of the French Monarchy: the most obstinate were forced either to obey, or to abandon the country: as indeed great numbers of the Saxons retired themselves into diuers strange Countries.

Care of Religion most worthy of Princes.

Thus the war of Saxony ended (being both long and dangerous) and those which were conquered by the truth, were the true conquerors, in knowing the true God. Charlemagne hauing caused the Saxons to leave their false opinions, was careful to haue them instructed in the truth: to this end he appointed holy and learned men in all places, and gaue meanes to maintaine them: as the Germane Historiours report: more particularly. It sufficeth me (in declaring this briefly) to shew his piety, compatible with his valour and B happinesse, and for a president to Princes, to make Religion the soueraine end of their Armes and authoritics. This Widichind was a great personage both in wisdom, valour, and authority, and by consequence very notable in the order of our subiect. From him are descended very famous Races: the two Hermies, the one called Oisfleur or the Fowler, and the other of Bamberg; and the two Osbis, all Emperours: and likewise the Dukes of Saxony, the Marquess of Misnia: the Dukes of Sauoy, and also the most famous Race of Hugh Capet, is drawne from this spring, by the common consent of learned writers, the which ought to be well obserued in the continuance of this History.

The off-spring of Widichind.

From this war of Saxony sprung many other in the Northerne parts, whereof I will inserre, hauing discoursed briefly of the war of Spaine, both for that it chanced during that of Saxony, as also (being very memorable) for the ouerthrow of the Sarazins, who threatened Christendome like a Deluge. Histories differ much touching this warre, but I will report what is most likely, by the consent of most approved writers, whereof the studious Reader may iudge by conference: I being but a faithfull reporter.

Warre in Spaine.

The motive of this Spanish war, was more vpon pleasure then necessity; but the zeale of Religion gaue a colour and shew of necessity, for the heroical desire of Charlemagne, seeking to enlarge the limits of the French Monarchy by Armes. So this warre of Spaine was more painfull, more dangerous, and of lesse successe then that of Italy, whereunto necessity and duty had drawne Charlemagne: but his wife proceeding in the action, did warrant him from all blame. The occasion which made him bend his Forces against the Sarazins in Spaine, was the assurance of his good fortune, the quiet peace of his Realme, the meanes to employ his souldiers, the Spaniards hate against the Sarazins, and the general feare of all Christians, lest these Caterpillers should creepe farther into Europe.

Estate of Spaine.

This was the estate of Spaine: the Sarazins had conquered a great part thereof, and were diuided into diuers commands, vnder the title of Kingdomes: yet these diuers Kings resolved to oppose their vnited Forces against Charles their common enemy: foreseeing then the tempest, they seeked to prevent it, and to crosse the designs of Charlemagne, which being discovered, they caused King Idnabala, a Sarazin, to inuade into his friendship, being a man full of subtil mildnesse. This stratagem prevailed more then all their Forces. Charlemagne was thrust forwards by Alphonso, sumamed the Chaste, King of Nauarre, and by the Asturiens and Galliciens, (Christian people of Spaine) to vndertake this war, being easie, profitable, and honourable, and by consequence most worthy the valiant happines of Charlemagne. Moreouer, this Idnabala (making a shew of friendship) labored to hasten him to the execution of this Enterprise, from the which he knew well he should not diuert him: but in effect it was to betray him, by the discouering of his intentions: flatter his desire to get the more credit by pleasing him.

Warre against the Sarazins of Spaine.

Charlemagne then well affected of himselfe, and perswaded by others, calls a Parliament at Noyon, and there concludes a war against the Sarazins of Spaine. The army he employed in that action was great, both for the number of men, and valour of great warriors, being the choice of the most worthy Captains in Christendome. Amongst the which, they number Milon Earle of Angers, Rowland the son of Milon & Berthe sister to Charlemagne, Renald of Montauban, the four sons of Aymon, Oger the Dane, Oliver Earle of Genoue, Brabin, Arnold of Belland, and others: the great valour of which persons hath bene fabulously reported by the writers of those obscure times, with a thousand ridiculous tales, vnrworthy the valour of those heroic spirits: proofs of the ignorance of that age, being barren of learned wits. They say, that Charlemagne, to make this voyage more honorable in shew, did then institute the order of the twelue Peers of France. Being entred into Spaine, hee

The treachery of Idnabala the Sarazin.

A he found no Sarazin Forces in field, but their Cities well fortified, hauing resolved to make a defence, rather then an offensive war. The most renowned Sarazin Kings were Aigoland, Bellingan, Denises, Marfile, and Idnabala, which be the subiect of our fabulous tales: but the last, as I haue said, made shew of friendship with Charlemagne, and open hatred against the other Sarazin Kings: with whom notwithstanding he had most strict correspondency to betray Charles. The first City he attempted, was Pampelune, in the kingdom of Nauarre, the which he took by force, but with much paine, losse, and danger. Hauing sacked it, and slaine all the Sarazins he found, Saragoce yeelds to him by composition, with many other small townes, terrified by the example of Pampelune. This beginning encouraged him to march on, relying on his wonted fortune: but as he passed through the Prouinces of Spaine, like a victorious Prince without any difficulty, hauing giuen a part of his army to leade to Milon of Angiers his brother in law, it chanced neare vnto Bayonne, that Aigoland a Sarazin King, (hauing in this common despair, thrust an army to field, encountered Milon with his troops, little dreading any enemy) took him at such an aduantage, as he defeated him. The losse was very great, for they report it was of forty thousand men: where Milon was slaine for a confirmation of the Sarazins victory. Charlemagne was far off, and not able by any diligence to prevent the losse: he pacifies this amazement, lest it should daunt the whole army. He hastens thither, and gathers together the reliques of these discomfited troops, keeping the conquered Cities, and such as were friends in their obedience. But after this follows a second accident. Aigoland putt vp with the pride of this victory, passeth into Gascoine, and besiegeth Agen, to diuert Charlemagne from his pursuit, and to draw him home to defend his owne Country.

The Sarazins victory.

The Sarazins enter into Gascoine.

So as Charlemagne fearing lest his absence, and the Sarazins late victory, should alter the minds of them of Guienne, being then subiects of small assurance, he returns into France. Aigoland hauing continued some moneths at the siege of Agen, and prevailed little, but in ouer-running the country, the which he did freely (without any great resistance) even vnto Xaintonge: the countrymen being retired into the townes, expected the returne of Charlemagne their King. *Aigoland*s army was great and proud with the remembrance of their late victory: so as Charlemagne returning with his troops from Spaine well tired, D he maintained his countries more through his authority, then by present force, yet he fortified the courage of his subiects with his presence, and bridled the Sarazin, who could not be ignorant with whom he had to deale, nor where he was, being enuioured with enemies on all sides, and in an enemies Country. The Sarazin seeming to incline to a peace, gaue Charlemagne to vnderstand, that he had first inuaded, and that his passage into France was onely to draw him out of Spaine, and to leaue to the Sarazins their conquered countries free, and therefore the treaty of an accord was easie, seeing there was no question, but to yeeld euery man his owne, and to suffer him to enioy it quietly, the world being wide enough for them all. But to the end this treaty might take effect, after many messages on either part, they resolved to parlee. So vpon *Charlemagne*s faith, Aigoland comes to the campe. Charlemagne either moued with zeale of Religion, or making it the colour of his actions, he gaue the Sarazin to vnderstand, that hee should haue his friendship, if he would leaue his Pagan superstition, be baptized, and make open profession of Christianity. The Sarazin, although he had a goodly army, yet not willing to hazard any thing, content with this reuenge of Charlemagne, desired nothing more then to returne quietly into Spaine. Being now in *Charlemagne*s campe, to maintaine his reputation, he makes no shew of feare, but talking to his own aduantage (as if no force but only reason should moue him) he enters into a serious cunning & discourse with Charlemagne, shewing, That vnecessary wars were the ruine of mankind, and that he was grieved to see so much blood spilt: That he had not begun, but followed, being vrged by necessity

Charlemagne and Aigoland parlee.

Conditions proposed by Aigoland.

Accepted by Charlemagne.

F to defend himselfe against the Forces of Charlemagne: That he was not yet so abiect, nor his Forces so weak, as to refuse the battell, but for that it were an infinite losse to hazard so many men, he desired to make triall of the right by some troops, and he that vanquished should haue the right and true Religion on his side; protesting to yeeld to that Religion which should appeare the best by that triall. The condition was accepted by Charlemagne: the proofe of this priuate combat was made: and the Christian troope vanquished the Sarazin.

This Aigoland protests openly to be a Christian, but in heart he had no such meaning, and and takes this occasion to breake the treaty. He finds Charlemagne, at table, well accompanied with his chiefe followers, (for then was the custome of our Kings not to eat alone) and sees twelue poore men ill apperled sitting by vpon the ground, neare to the table of the Noblemen. He demanded what those poore miserable creatures were which did feed apart. One answered, they were the messengers of God. He then said, their God was of small account, seeing his messengers were so miserable and contemptible: and thereupon takes occasion to retire himselfe, hauing lost no labour by this treaty, but qualified the force of Charlemagne, viewed his traine, and made shew of his courage and dexterity, euen without an Ambassador. Charlemagne on the other side was resolute to haue his reuenge for so notable a losse of men, and so bold an affront of the Sarazin, so as with all speed he raiseth an army of an hundred and thirty thousand men. A notable number for this Realme, and so (fraught with choller and indignation) hee returns into Spaine. His entry was prosperous: for at the first encounter he defeated Agolands army neare to Pampelune, and for a scale of his victory he caried away the head of his enemy Agoland, slaine by the hand of Arnold of Belange, a noble and valiant Knight: but the sequell was not answerable to the beginning: for notwithstanding the ouerthrow of these Sarazin troops, all the rest in Spaine were not vanquished, where there were more Kings and more men of war, who had great correspondency with Amurathe King of Babylon, which was their nursery and store-houfe. Marfile and Bellingand brethren, were the chiefe of the remainder of the Sarazin army, wherein there was a great Babylonian Giant, called Ferragut, of an exceeding greatnesse, who was slaine by Rowland, Nephew to Charlemagne: and this act is famous in our Histories, and is sung by our Romanes with a great fabulous shew. After the death of their brother, they gather together the reliques of their defeated troops: they make shew of resolute men, and vow to sell this victory dearly to Charlemagne, being fauoured by many good townes within the country. Charlemagne stayes suddenly, and pursues not this victory. But God referres to himselfe a soueraine power ouer mens designes, yea ouer the greatest, and in matters of greatest consequence: to the end that all may learne to aske counsell and successe from him. It was his will that the French Forces should not possesse Spaine, the which he allotted as a portion for another nation.

A treaty of peace with the Sarazins which they accept.

Thus Charles, who should haue bene all fire after his victory, tempered his heat, which caused Idnabala the Sarazin (hauing free access into his Campe) to make some motion of peace. He was a good Secretary of his companions minds, what they soeuer he made to speake of himselfe. Charlemagne (considering by late experience, that the successe of armes was variable, and that this war was to his lubricous losse, employing both liues and goods for the purchase of an vncertaine victory, and seeing himselfe charged with infinite great affaires in his Estates, to the preferuation whereof reason did summon him, rather then to seeke for new) he seems not vnwilling to hearken to the motion of Idnabala, who told him plainly, that he found the Sarazins affaires to be so desperate, as they would gladly embrace his friendship, at what rate soeuer. The Sarazins answer (reioycing at this new accord) was soone made. The Treaty being begunne, the fundamentall Article of Religion was propounded, the which Charlemagne makes shew to maintaine with great vehemencie: but the Sarazins being obstinate, Charles is content to grant them peace paying some great summes of money, as a token they had bene vanquished.

The treason of Ganelon.

Treachery of the Sarazins.

He sends a Nobleman of his Court named Ganes, to treat with them: (the people haue since called him Ganelon, as an odious name) who (being corrupted by Marfile and Bellingand) promitteth them meanes to send Charlemagne into France, and to make him receive a notable disgrace. They agree to make a composition, being in shew very honourable for Charles: to whom they promise to pay (as an homage and an acknowledgement of the peace he should grant them) what summes he should appoint, and so should retire with his army into France, leaving such troops in Spaine as he pleased, to maintaine the conditions agreed vpon. Ganes discovered vnto them the necessity of his returne, and Charlemagne's great desire to leaue the smallest Forces he could in Spaine. The composition made, Charlemagne departs with his army, attending a better opportunity to end what he had begun, leaving Rowland onely with twenty thousand men, for the execution of this Treaty. But to make his passage the more easie, hee commands him

Rowland defeated at Roncevaux.

A him to lodge in a place of aduantage, in the Pyrenean mountaines, called Roncevaux. The French army passed, marching towards France, under the conduct of Charlemagne, who dreamt not of the affront he receiued by this meanes.

Whilest the French army removed, Marfile and Bellingand slept not, but gathering together all the Forces they could, they lodge their troops secretly in the hollow caues of the Mountaines, being places inaccessible and vknowne but to them of the Country. They had intelligence from Ganes what Forces Charlemagne had left in Spaine, vnder the command of Rowland, to whom the authority of his Vncle, and the credit of the people of Spaine in the chiefe towne, was of more esteeme then his twenty thousand men. B though they were the chiefe of all the army, Rowland had no feare of any enemy, when as returning to his garison, he is suddenly charged by the Sarazins, far more in number then the French. Seeing himselfe thus assailed and compass in, they defend themselves valiantly against these miscreants: but still fresh troops issue forth on all sides, in so great numbers, as in the end the French (tired with so long and painful a combat) are oppressed by the great multitude of Sarazins.

Rowland performed both the duty of a good Captaine, in so extreame a danger, (gathering together the pieces of his shipwracke) and of a resolute Souldier, in fighting valiantly, for hauing beat down a great number in the presse, in the end he slew Marfile with his owne hand. But Bellingand holding this victory absolutely by his owne, pursues the French, so as Rowland (not able to stand) retires himselfe apart, where he dies for thirst, through the long and painfull combat he had endured: and altogether tyred, he strives to break his good sword Durandall but his strength failing him, he dies; and with him Oliuer, and Oger the Dane, Renold of Montauban, Arnaut of Belange, and other great personages, whose names remaine in fabuloustales: and the fame of their singular vertues, not onely in the Originals of true Histories, but the honor of their heroicall deeds, is ingrauen in the common beliefes of all Frenchmen.

Rowland dyes for thirst.

Charlemagne aduertised of this unexpected and strange losse, returns suddenly, and takes reuenge vpon the Sarazins, killing an infinite number vpon the places, he caught the traitor Ganelon to be drawne in pieces with foure horses. (found to haue bene the D author of this miserable defeat) and transported with a iust disdain for this preiudicial affront, he resolved to passe farther into Spaine for his reuenge. But the great affaires of other Estates, called him into France, and so the war of Spaine ended, with small successe, hauing troubled Charlemagne at diuers times, for the space of fourteene yeares. But God had appointed the limits of his designes, as he referres to himselfe a Soueraine power ouer all mens enterprises, yea of the greatest.

Charlemagne takes reuenge of this treacherous defeat.

End of the Spanish war.

Charles made a Tombe for his Nephew Rowland, and honored the memory of these worthy warriors, (dying in the bed of honor) with monuments. I haue reported this in one discourse, to represent as in a table, what hath chanced most memorable, the which can hardly be gathered without some direction in the confusion of so long and obscure E reports, wherewith this History of Charlemagne is fraught. At his returne from Spaine, necessity bred diuers wars, to exercise the valour and diligence of Charlemagne, both in Italy and Germany, God fauouring him in all places. Italy (during these troubles of Spaine) had rebelled by Adalgise the Duke of Beneuents meanes, to repossesse the Race of Didier, but it was soone suppressed by Charlemagne, to the cost of the Lombardes, bels: but in the end behold another war in Germany.

The like occasion bred a war in Bauaria, for that King Tasillon some in law to Didier King of Lombardy (pressed by his wife, being wonderfull discontented with Charlemagne) shakes off the yoke; and flies to armes, but Charles surpriseth him with such celerity, as Tasillon was forced to sue for peace. Charlemagne grants it, imposing the yoke of the French Monarchy, but Tasillon not able to containe himselfe, raiseth a new war in another place, as when we stop one breach, it opens by another vent. He stirs up the Huns and Auars, (a neighbour people of Austrasia, one of the Estates of our Monarchy) against Charlemagne, who suppressed them with such happy successe, as Tasillon vanquished by Charlemagne, and found guilty of rebellion and treason, was condemned to lose his Estate according to the Salique Law: and so the Kingdom of Bauaria ended, the which was wholly incorporate to the Crowne of France.

The Huns and Auars (of whose names ioyned together, the word of Hungary hath bene Bauaria incorporated to the Crowne for rebellion.

been deriued, and the Hungarians be issued from these united nations) were likewise pu- A nished by Charlemagne, and brought under the yoke of the French Monarchy. They had begun a war in disquieting the Country of Austrasia: Charlemagne opposed his Forces, but at diuers times: so as the warre continued eight yeares, and the successe was, that all their country obeyed him: and the Danes, the Sorabes, the Abrodites, the Westphalians, (all vnited in this warre of Hungary) were likewise brought vnder the same obedience of Charlemagne. The limits of the Northern Region called Austrasia were so extended, as it was distinguished into two kingdoms, noted in the German tongue, to shew that the Originall of our Ancestors is out of Germany, and that our ancient Kings haue com- B manded there: seeing their possession is manifested, and that they haue not onely giuen a Germane name to the country that is beyond the Rhine, but also to that on this side. I am not ignorant how much this discourse is diuersified with sundry probabilities, euery one preferring what likes him best. But, not transforming of coniectures into Oracles (as without doubt the plainest is the best) behold a true diuision of the Seignories which Charlemagne had in Germany, as the traces of names yeeld an assured testimony. The Realme of Austrasia, which ioynes vpon France, was called Westreich, that is to say, the Realme of the West: and that which is towards Danubie, Ostreich, that is, the kingdom of the East, whence the name of Austrich is properly deriued, being then of a greater command then at this day, for it contained Hungary, Valachia, Bohemia, Transilvania, Denmarke, and Poland. Then was our Monarchy great: but all these nations haue either returned to their first beginnings, or were seized on by new Lords. It was very needfull to shew the Estate, that we might observe the declining thereof, with the motives and seasons of these diuers changes. Thus the French Monarchy grew great by the happy valour of Charlemagne, and his children grew Image and knowledge by the wise care of their father, who framed them to affaires, meaning first to make them succeed him in his vertues, and then after in his Dominions: But man purpoſeth, and God disposeth. France, Italy, Germany, Spaine, and Hungary, made the Romane Empire in the West. Charles being master of these goodly Prouinces, was in effect Emperour thereof. There wanted nothing but the solemne declaration of this dignity, to haue the title as he enjoyed the thing, and to be authentically inuested by a free and publicke declaration of his possession. D
The prouidence of God, who gaue him the thing, procured him the title by this means.
Leo was then Pope of Rome, against whom was raised a strange sedition, by Silaster and Campul, men of great credit in the Court of Rome. Vpon a solemne day of Procession they seize vpon Leo, before Saint Laurence Church, they strip him of his pontificall robes, cast him to the ground, tread him vnder their feet, bruise his face with their fists, and hauing drawne him ignominiously through the dirt, they cast him into prison, but he stayed not there, being freed by a groomme of his chamber called Albin: and hauing re-couered Saint Peters Church, he entreated Vingise Duke of Spoletto, to deliuer him from this miserable captivity. Vingise failed him not: he came to Rome, and carried him to Spoletto. Being arrived there, he presently went into France to Charlemagne, whom he E found full of troubles: yet Charles neglected all other affaires to assist Leo in his necessity.
So as he came to Rome with a goodly army, to succour the Pope: where he did speedily pacifie the confusions wherewith Rome was afflicted, punishing Leo's enemies according to Law. They demanded audience, the which Charles granted them, assembling the Clergy and people, to heare, and decide this scandalous controuersie. But when as he demanded their opinions, the Prelates told him plainly, that the Church of Rome could not be iudged by any other then by its selfe, and that the Pope ought not to undergoe the censure of any man liuing, and that he himselfe ought to be iudge in his owne cause.
Charlemagne willingly leaues the iudgement feat: and then Pope Leo mounted vp his throne, where (after he had protested by oath to be innocent of those crimes, wherewith his enemies had charged him) he absoules himselfe, and condemnes his enemies according to his Canon, The pope is iudge of all men, and all things, and not to be iudged by any. Charlemagne being drawne to Rome vpon this occasion, finds all disposed to declare him Emperour of the West, seeing that with the price of his blood (opposing himselfe against the furies and incurſions of barbarous nations) he had valiantly gotten possession of the Empire.

The

The beginning of the Empire of Charlemagne,

Acknowledged and installed Emperour, by a free consens of the Romane people, in the yeare of Grace 800.

The Pope by this possession (acknowledging Charles for true Emperour) crownes him Emperour of Rome, with a full consent of all the Romane people, which as-isted at his Coronation, crying with one generall voice, Happinesse, long life, and victory to Charles Augustus, crowned the great and peaceable Emperour of the Romanes, alwayes happy and victorious. This was in the yeare 800. on Christmas day, the thirtieth yeare of the reigne of Charles, Italy hauing suffered a horrible confusion during the space of thirty three yeares, without Emperour, without Lawes, and without order.

The seat of the Romane Empire, since Constantine the Great, remained at Constantinople, a City of Thrace, situate in a conuenient place for the guard of the Eastern Prouinces, all the West being full of new guests, who hauing expelled the Romanes, the name, authority, and force of the Empire remained in the East, where the State was in a strange confusion, the mother being banded against her sonne, and the people within themselves.

Constantine sonne to Leo the fourth, was Emperour, being gouerned from his infancie (with the Empire) by his mother Irene: being come to the age of twenty yeares, he took vpon him the government. There was then a great diuision in the East, continued from father to sonne for 80. yeares touching Images. The Bishops would needs bring them into the Christian Church. The Emperours (with the greatest part of the people) opposed themselves. This contention had her beginning vnder Philip Bardanes, (as wee haue said) continued vnder Leo Isaurus, and from him to his sonne Constantine, surnamed Copronimus: and of Leo the fourth sonne to the said Constantine. This disquieted all the East with infinite scandals.

The same fire continued in the minority of Constantine, gouerned by his mother: a woman of a violent spirit, who hauing undertaken the protection of Images, held a Councill of many Bishops for the defence thereof: but the people growing into a muriny, expelled them from Constantinople by force, where their Assembly was held. But this woman (reluctant to proceed) assembled the same Councell at Nicea, a City of Bithinia, honoured to haue harboured the first generall Councell vnder Constantine the Great, the first of that name: where it was decreed, that the Images of Saints should be planted in Christian Churches for deuotion. Charlemagne did not allow of this decree, and either himselfe, or some other by his command, did write a small Treatise against this Councell: the which we see at this day with this title, A Treatise of Charlemagne, touching Images, against the Greeke Synode.

This cunning woman had made choice of the City of Nicea, that the name of this ancient first Councell might honour this new introduction with the pretext of antiquity, for there are some that confound the first Councell of Nicea with the second, and Constantine the fourth with the first. Constantine continued in the hereditary hatred of his father and grand-father against Images, so as being of age and in absolute possession of the Estate, he disannulled all these new decrees, and caused the Images to be beaten downe in all places: yet he made all shewes of respect vnto his mother, yeelding vnto her a good part of his authority and command. This respect was the cause of a horrible Tragedy: for this woman transported for two causes (both by reason of her new opinion, and for despite that she had not the whole government in her selfe) grows so vnkind as she resolues to dispossesse her sonne of the Empire, and to seize on it her selfe. Thus F the authority her sonne had left her, and the free access she had vnto his person, made way to the execution of her designe: for hauing corrupted such as had the chiefe forces at their command, and wonne them with her Iouanes treasure, she seized on him, put out his eyes, sends him into exile (where soone after he died for griefe) and took possession of the Empire. These vnaturall and tragick furies, were practised in the East, whilst that Charlemagne by his great valour built an Empire in the West. Irene in her Iouanes life would haue married him with the eldest daughter of Charlemagne: but this accident crossed that designe.

magne* was pro-

806

After the death of Constantine he sent to Charlemagne, to excuse her selfe of the murder, disavowing it, and laying the blame vpon such as had done it without her command. And to win the good liking of Charles, she caused him to be dealt withall touching marriage (for at that time Fefrude was dead) with promise to consent that he should be declared Emperour of the West, and to resigne vnto him the power of the East. But Charlemagne would not accept thereof: the Nobility and people of the Greeke Empire did so hate her, as hauing suffered her the space of three years, in the end they refused to dispossesse her.

Irene banished.

Diuidion of the empire.

In this publike detestation of this woman, the murthereffe of her owne child, Nicephorus a great Nobleman of Greece, assisted by the greatest in the Court, and with the consent of the people, seizeth on the Empire, in taking of Irene: whom he onely banished, to giue her meanes to liue better then she had done. He afterwards treats and compounds with Charlemagne, that the Empire of the East continuing vnder his command, that of the West should remaine to Charlemagne.

By this transacion of Nicephorus, and the consent of the Greekes, the possession of the Empire was ratified and confirmed to Charlemagne, and then began the diuidion of the two Empires, East and West. That of the West began with Charlemagne, and continued in his Race whilst his vertues did protect it: afterwards it was transported to the Princes of Germany, who likewise acknowledged the Germane stem of Charlemagne, borne at Wormes, crowned at Spire, and interred at Aix, all Cities of Germany: and the truth sheweth, that as the Original, so the first command of the French was wholly in Germany. Hitherto we haue represented, briefly as we could (considering the greatnesse and richnesse of the subiect) what Charles did whilst hee was King of France onely: now we must relate with the like style, what hath happened worthy of memory vnder his Empire.

War in Italy.

In Saxony.

At Venice, where Charlemagne had the repulse.

Charles diuides his possessions to his children.

An order for their lawes.

CHARLES liued fifteene years, after he had vnitd the Romane Empire to the French Monarchy. Grimoald Duke of Beneuent fought to disturbe Italy for the Lombard: but Charles preuented it in time, by the meanes of Pepin his son; a worthy and valiant Prince. Grimoald was thus vanquished, yet entreated with all mildnesse, so as being restored to his Estate, he became afterwards an affectionate and obedient seruant to Charlemagne, who was a wife Conquerour, both in his happy valour, and the wise vsing of his victorie. About the same time the war in Saxony was rentued, being alwaies prone to rebellion: with the war against the Huns, Bohemians, Sclauonians: and the second against the Sarazins. The which I haue briefly reported in their proper places: here I note them onely to shew the course of things according to the order of times, the goodly light of truth.

He had likewise a great and dangerous warre against the Venetians, wherein he employed his son Pepin. Obeliers and Becur, great personages, were the chiefe Commanders for the Venetians. The Emperour and his Frenchmen receiued a great checke by the Venetians, who had this onely fruit of their victory, that (among all the people of Italy subdued by Charlemagne) they alone were not vanquished, but had happily made head against great Charlemagne. They did greatly encrease their name and reputation, but nothing enlarged their territories by this conquest, glad to haue defended themselves against so noble and valiant an enemy. By reason of this Venetian war, Charles stayed sometime in Italy, to assure his Estate. He would haue the Country conquered from the Lombards, to be called Lombardy, with a new name, to moderate their seruile condition, by the continuance of their name, in the ruine of their Estate.

Seeing himselfe old and broken, his children great, wife, and obedient, he refused to giue them portions, and to assigne to euery one his Estate. To Pepin he gaue Italy, to Charles Germany and the neighbour countries, keeping Lewis his eldest son neare about him, whom he appointed for the Empire and Realme of France: He fought to reduce all his Estates vnder one law, making choice of the Romane, both for the dignity of the Empire, and being more ciuill: but the French loth to alter any thing of their customary lawes, he suffered them as they desired: and those which had longer serued the Romanes, and loued best the Romane lawes, he gaue them libertie. So as Gaule Narbonnoise (which

A (which comprehends Dauphine, Languedoc and Proquence) doe vse the written law, (as the ancient Prouince of the Romanes) and the rest of France obserue their customary lawes.

Denmarke (a dependance of the Realme of Germany and part of Charles his portion, as we haue said) was reuolted from the obedience of the French. Charles by his fathers command, prepares to subdue them: but God had otherwise decreed, for hereupon he dies, to the great griefe of his father, and of all the French, who loued the lovely qualities of this Prince, the true heyre of his father name and vertues. Charlemagne mourned for his youngest son, when as suddenly newes came of the vntimely death of Pepin his second sonne, King of Italy, a Prince of admirable hope, a true patterne of his fathers greatnesse. Thus man purpoeth, and God disposeth: thus the sonnes die before the father: thus the greatest cannot free themselves from the comon calamity of mankind: thus great Kings and great Kingdomes haue their periods. Charlemagne lost his children, and the Realme her best support: for these two Princes caried with them the fathers valour, leaving Lewis his brother with large territories and few vertues, to gouerne so great an Estate. After the death of these two great Princes, many enemies did rise against Charles seeming (as it were) deprived of his two armes, the Sarazins in Spaine, the Sclauons, and the Normans, in the Northerne regions: but he vanquished them all, and brought them to obedience, old and broken as he was. We haue shewed how that Nicephorus had beene made Emperour by the death of Irene. In chanced, that as he fought against the Bulgarians (a people which had possessed a part of Thrace, neare vnto Constantinople) he was slaine in the conflict.

He had one son named Stanrat, who by reason should succcede him: but Michel his brother in law seizeth on this poore young man, and makes him away, and hauing corrupted the chiefe men with gifts, he viurpes the Empire: and lest that Charlemagne should crosse his designs, he seeks to insinuate with him, not onely ratifying what Nicephorus had done for the diuidion of the Empire, but by a new contract doth acknowledge him Emperour of the West. Thusthe affaires of our Charles were daily confirmed, but his mind (toiled with these new losses, and the painfull difficulties he had suffered throughout the whole course of his life) required nothing but rest. All his life time he held the Church in great reuerence, and had employed his authority to beautifie it, and bountifully bestowed his treasure to enrich it: but this great plenty in so happy a peace, made the Churchmen to liue loosely. Charles well instructed in religion (knowing how much it did import, to haue doctrine and good manners to shine in them that should instruct others:) he doth call five Councils in diuers places of his dominions, for the government of the Church. At Mentz, at Rheims, at Tours, at Chaacons, and at Arles: and by the aduice of these Ecclesiasticall Assemblies, he sets downe orders for the reformation of the Church, in a Booke intituled Capitula Caroli Magni, which they read at this day, for a venerable prooffe of the pietie of this great Prince. A worthy precedent for Princes, which seeke true honour by vertue, whereof the care of pietie is the chiefe foundation.

He held likewise a great Councell in the City of Franckford, (These are the very words of the History) of the Bishops of France, Germanie, and Italy, the which he himselfe would honour with his presence, where by a generall consent, The false Synode of the Greekes (I quote the very words of the Originall) vntuly called the seventh, was condemned and rejected by all the Bishops, who subscribed to the condemnation. But there fell out a new accident, which drew Charles again to armes. Alphonso King of Nauarre, stirred the Chaste, by reason of his singular temperance, did carefully aduertise him, that there was now meanes vnto subdue the Sarazins in Spaine. Charlemagne (who desired infinitely to finish this worke, so oft attempted without any great successe) giues care to this aduice, leaves an Army, & marcheth into Spaine, relying on the Spaniards fauor, being Christians. Alphonso meant plainly, but so did not the chiefe of his Court, nor associates, who feared his Forces no lesse then the Sarazins, & euen the most confident seruants of Alphonso doubted to be dispossessed of their governments by a new Master. So they crosse Alphonso in countermanding of Charles: but the lots were cast, his Armie is in field, & he resolute to passe on. He enters into Spaine, where he finds so many difficulties, as he returns into France: and so concludes all his enterprises, embracing againe the care of Religion, and of the Church, as a subiect fit for the remainder of his dayes. He was threecore and eight yeares old when he left the wars: so he spent three whole yeares in his study, reading the Bible, and the bookes of Saint Augustine, whom he loved above all the Doctors of the Church. He resided at Paris, to haue conference with the learned: where he had erected a goodly Vniuersity, furnished with learned men, such as that time could afford, and enriched with goodly priuiledges. He had an extraordinary care to haue the seruice of the Church supplied, as a Nurcery of the holy Ministry. Thence grew so many Colledges of Chanoins, with such sufficient reuenues.

Thus Charles spent three yeares happily in the onely care of his soule, leauing a goodly example to Princes, to moderate their greatnesse with piety, their enioying of temporall goods, with the hope of eternall, and to thinke of their departure out of this life in time. Thus foretelling his death (whereunto he prepared himselfe by this exercise) he made his will, leauing Lewis his son sole heyre of his great Kingdome, and bequeathes to the Church great treasure, as more at large is contained in his Will, set downe in the History. His Testament was the messenger of his death, for soone after he fell sicke, and continued so but eight dayes: dying happily vnto the Lord, in the year of Grace 814. of his age 71. and of his reigne the 47. including 15. yeares of his Empire. He was interred at Aix la Chapelle, where he was borne, and his memory honored with a goodly Epitaph, set downe in the History.

He was one of the greatest Princes that euer liued. His vertue is the patterne of Princes, C his good hap the subiect of their wishes. The greatnesse of his Monarchy is admirable, for he quietly enioyed all France, Germany, the greatest part of Hungary, all Italy, and a part of Spaine. But his vertues were greater then his Monarchy: his clemency, wilddome, and valour: his learning (yea in the holy Scripture) his vigilancy, magnanimity, and singular force, be the Theater of his immortal praises. And yet his vertues were not without some blemish (as the greatest are not commonly without some notable vice) for he was giuen to women, adding concubines to his lawful wiues, by whom he had bastards. I haue noted elsewhere the number of his wiues and children. Lewis the weakest of them all, remained alone the sole heyre of this great Monarchy of France, and the Romane Empire, but not of his noble vertues. We are now come to the top of this great building, D we shall see it decline: and therein note the admirable prouidence of God, who amidst the confusions of this Estate, hath alwaies preferred the Maiesty of this Crowne.

LEVVIS THE GENTLE,

The fine and twentieth King,

And Emperour of the West.

As the vertues of Charlemagne had raised this Estate to an admirable greatnesse, so the small valour, or rather the vices of his posterity, caused the declining, and (if God had not prevented) had bene the ruine thereof. His intent was onely to change the Race vnworthy to reigne, but not the Realme, the which he hath preferred vnto this day by his prouidence, in the bosome of one Country, and in it his Church: for the which hee maintains both the Estates where it remains, and the whole world, which cannot subsist, but in regard of it.

Thus the French Monarchy being come to the height of her greatnesse, the law imposed vpon all humane things, would haue it decline, that of her pieces other Estates might be built. Not long after the death of Charlemagne, it began to decline. The foolish lenity of Lewis his son, was the beginning, the which was continued by the disordered confusions of his successors, who (in spite of one another) hastned the ruine of their house, making the way by their vices and misfortune. This is the substance of all the Kings remaining in this second Race: the which we cannot represent, but in noting faithfully the order of those confused times, during the which this Barke hath bene in a manner guided

The declining of this Race.

A ded without a Pilot, and without helme, by the wisedome of God, who hath miraculously preferred it, amidst so many tempests. And therefore without any tedious discourse, being intricate enough of it selfe, I will labour to shew (as in a table) both the continuance of this Race, and the diuers motives of euents to bring Hugh Capet vpon the stage, and carefully to shew the estate of his posterity, as the chiefe end of my designe.

Lewis was surnamed the Meeke, or Gentle, as well for his deuotion (whereunto he was more giuen, then to gouerne his Estate) as also for his great facility: which was the cause of many mileries both to himselfe and his subiects. He began to reigne the year 815, and ruled 26. yeares Emperour of the West, and King of France. His father had not greatly B enioyed him in affaires, obseruing his disposition, and had married him with Irmenegarde the daughter of Ingram Duke of Angers, an officer of the Crowne of France, hauing giuen him the Duchy of Guienne for his maintenance. By this wife Lewis had three sons Lothaire, Pepin, and Lewis, who acted strange tragedies against their father.

To his second wife he married Judith the daughter of Guelphe Duke of Sueue, by whom he had Charles, surnamed the Bald, who succeeded him in the Crowne of France. Bernard the son of Pepin, was King of Italy, as Charlemagne had decreed. Lewis (more fit to be a Monke then a King) was so giuen to deuotion, and of so soft a spirit, as he made his authority contemptible, both within and without the Realme. This disposition (vnfit for a great command) made the Nations subiect to the Crowne, to fall from their obedience, the Saxons, Normans, Danes, and Brittons: and although Lewis did his best to prevent it, yet could he not preuaile, but made himselfe wholly contemptible, in attempting that which he could not effect, and (after his vaine struing) compounding of great controuersies with vnreasonable conditions. Bernard a young man, and ambitious, was persuaded by the Bishops of Orleans and Milan, to attempt against his Vncle Lewis, and to seize vpon the Realme of France which belonged not vnto him. So his ambition cost him deare, and that suddenly: for being in field to goe into France against his vncle, with an imaginary fauour of the French, to be proclaimed King, it fell out contrary; for both he and all his Councillers were taken by Lewis his subiects.

Lewis wonderfully moued with the presumption of this springall (as we oft see milde D natures fall into extremities of choller when they are moued) hauing both his Nephew and his Councillors in his power: he spoiles him of his Realme of Italy, declares him and his vnworthy, confines him to a perpetual prison, and puts out his eyes: the like he doth to all the Bishops and Noblemen he could get: and after some few dayes patience, he chops off their heads. This act was held very strange, proceeding from Lewis, and committed against such persons: it began to breed a generall dislike, the which was aggravated by a domestical dissention: all which together caused a horrible Tragedy.

Lewis had indiscreetly giuen portions to his children, making them companions of his regall authority. After the deceale of Bernard, he gaue Italy to Lothaire, and did associate him in the Empire; to Pepin he gaue Aquitaine; to Lewis Bavaria; and would haue E them all beare the name of Kings. Lewis good to all, was too good to his second wife Judith, an ambitious woman: who hauing one son by him, called Charles, had no other care but to make this son great, to the preiudice of the rest: not foreseeing that they were of power, and could not patiently endure the ialousies of a mother in law, nor the words of an old man, being too much affected to one of his children against the rest, at the suggestion of a mother in law: an ordinary leuaine of bitter dissention in families of the second bed.

Moreover, this imperious Germane, abusing the facility of her good husband, played the Emperesse and Queene ouer all, to the discontent of the greatch, who had no fauour with Lewis, but by the fauour of his wife: they did hate and contemne him, as being unworthy to reigne, suffering himselfe so slavishly to be gouerned by a woman. This was the general motive of their discontent: but there were many other particularities, which grew dayly vpon diuers and sundry occasions. The Bishops were most of all incensed against Lewis, by reason of the death of those men of the Church, whom he had so cruelly caused to be slaine with Bernard. So Lothaire, Pepin, and Lewis, (by the aduice of these malecontents) resolved to seize vpon their Father, Mother, and young Brother, to dispossesse them of all authority, and then to gouerne the State after their owne appetites, wherein they must vse force and a publicke consent. Lothaire (as ring-leader of this designe) designe) leaues a great army, and calls a Nationall Councell of the French Church at Lyons, supposing sooner to suppress Lewis by this means, then by a Parliament. Lewis appears: he receiues all complaints against himselfe, and yeelds to the censure of the Prelates, which was to retire himselfe into a Monastery, there to attend his deuotion, and to resigne the Empire and the Realme to his children. This was put in execution. Lewis was conueied to Soissons, to the Monastery of Saint Medard: his wife and son were confined to other places, and the whole government committed to Lothaire and his brethren. Thus Lewis, so much addicted to Church-men, as he purchased the name of deuout, was illintreated by them, and receiued a poore recompence for his so humble submission. The name of a Councell, (venerable of it selfe) did at the first retaine men, supposing that this Ecclesiasticall iurisdiction did not extend but to admonition: but seeing this tragical attempt of the children against the father, there was no good man but stood amazed at this presumption, and pitied their poore King, being brought to such calamity. But all power remained in the hands of the rebellious children, and the greatest of the Church were guilty of this outrage, seeking to maintaine their decree. Thus this poore Prince (to the generall griefe of his subjects) continued in prison five yeares: for he entered in the yeare 829, and came forth in the yeare 834. But this deliuey was the beginning of a new confusion. For Lothaire hauing bene forced to yeeld vnto his father, goes to field, takes him prisoner againe, and leads him to the Couent at Soissons, where he stayed not long, for the French did bandy openly against Lothaire, and his brethren did abandon him, so as he was forced to yeeld vnto his father, and to craue pardon. This miserable King, thus led for a long time, giues portions to his children. To Lothaire he leaues the Realme of Austrasia, from the riuer of Meuse vnto Hungary, with the title of Emperour; to Lewis, Bauaria; and to Charles, France; Pepin enioyed Guienne without contradiction.

Lewis (not content with Bauaria) quarrels againe with his father, and (to force him to giue him a better portion) he leaues an army and passeth the Rhine. The miserable father, although tired with so many indignities, yet transported with choller against his son, goes to field with an army: but age and griefe deprived him of meanes to chastise him: for he fell deadly sicke, which made him leaue this world, to finde rest in heauen. D This was in the yeare of Grace, 840. of his age sixty foure, and of his Empire the twenty seauenth. He left three sons, Lothaire and Lewis of the first bed, and Charles of the second, these two first children did much afflicte the father and themselves, and all were plunged in bloody diffentions, the which, order doth now command vs to represent particularly.

LOTHAIRE as the eldest, and Emperour by his fathers testament, would prescribe Lawes to his brethren, and force them to a new diuision. As he had exceeded against his father in taking him twice prisoner, and stripping him before he went to bed, so he sought to frustrate his will, as made against the right of the elder and the Imperiall dignity, the Realme of France belonging to the eldest, and the goodliest territories of the Empire to the Emperour. Thus he quarrelled with Charles King of France, and with Lewis, who had his part in the inheritances of the Empire, in Bauaria the dependances of the Realme of Bourgondy, (that is to say, Prouence and Dauphine) and in Italy. This was the leuaine of these tragical diffentions amongst the brethren (as Nitard a writer of approved credit, learned, and a Prince, (for he was sonne to Angilbert, the son of Berthe, daughter to Charlemagne, and employed to compound these quarrels) doth particularly describe.) Behold the direction to a longer discourse, whereof I owe but an abridgment, noted with the principall circumstances. Lothaire then armed with authority, force, F licie, policy, and boldnesse, thinks to giue his brethren their portions: and there were great presumptions he should preuaile, ioyning his force with the intelligences he had in the dominions of Charles and Lewis.

This common interest to defend themselves against a common enemy, made them to ioyne together, resolute for their generall preservation. Lothaire seeks by secret treaties to diuide them, but not able to make any breach in their vnion, he prepares force and policie. Lewis was in Bauaria, of whom he kept good guard that he should not passe the

A the Rhine, to ioyne with his brother: he likewise leaues an army to surpris Charles in France. This preparation of warre did awake the vnited brethren, who assembe their Forces, and ioyne notwithstanding all Lothaires oppositions. Lothaires Army was at Auxerre, meaning to passe into the heart of France. The vnited brethren (hauing assembled their forces neere vnto Paris, Saint Denis and Saint Germaine) approach, to haue a better meanes either to treat with him, or to encounter him. First with great humility, they offer to performe what should bee held reasonable, beseeching him to remember the condition of brethren, the holy peace of the Church, and the quiet of Gods people: suffering them to inioy what their father had bequeathed, or else they would diuide B France equally, and he should choose what part hee pleased. Lothaire refusing nothing flatly, fed them with delays, expecting Forces out of Guienne, led by Pepin, and in the meane time he diuided the Cities by his practices, meaning to assaile his brethren both within and without, and to surpris them by authority and force, as he had done hitherto fore his poore father, presuming of the like meanes.

But the subtilly was taken in his owne snare, for as Lothaire (finding himselfe the stronger) refused these conditions of peace, saying openly this, his brethren would neuer be wife vntill he had corrected them: behold the Armies lying neere to Fontenay (after these vaine parles, of peace) Lewis and Charles charge Lothaires Army (already a Conquerour in conceit) with such aduantage, as hee was not onely put to rout, but also overthrowed with a notable slaughter, noted vnto this day, by the place where the battell was fought, the which for this occasion is called Chaplay, and the straight is called by the victors name, the valley of Charles, to continue the memory of so bloody a victory; where euen the conquerours had cause to weepe, hauing shed their owne blood, although forced to fight.

It is not now that France begins to be indiscreet, banding against it selfe, and digging in her owne bowels, by these domestike and vnciuill diffentions. Lothaire after this defeat changed his humor with his estate, for hardly could he retire with his shame to saue his dominions. He enioyed the titulary maske of the Empire with Austrasia, yet very much curtailed and diuided to his three sonnes, Lewis, Charles, and Lothaire. Of these D great inheritances, there remains nothing cleere but Lorraine, of the name of Lothaire. And so the great discourses of him whom the whole earth could not satisfie, without raking from father, and brethren, were buried in a Cloister: for Lothaire (hauing remorse of conscience for attempting against his father and brethren, and to beare rule) lost the honor he had fought with such eagernes, and (to suffer the paines he had inflicted vpon his father) hee professeth himselfe a Monke in the Abbie of Pluuiers, and dies a Monke in the yeare 855, taking on him the frocke, and being shauen, as the ciuill death of a King or Prince of the blood Royall, according to the French opinion, which continues vnto this day, for note of the greatest paine they could suffer that were borne in this authority, to be shauen and made Monkes, and to change the crowne of France into a Monkes E crowne, dead to the world.

This was the Catastrophe and end of this turbulent Prince, by the iust iudgement of God, published then in the greatest assemblies, and made knowne vnto vs by open and publike writings, for a notable testimony and witnesse to all men, That whosoer disobeyes father and mother, deceiues his brethren, troubles the peace of the Church and State, in breaking the sacred lawes of God and Nature, he dismembers himselfe by peccemeale, losing his goods, honour, and quiet, for assured gages of the horrible torments which attend him in the euerslasting prisons, appointed to tame the vntamed, and to make them suffer the infinite paines of their infinit wickednesse.

Charles and Lewis were well satisfied to haue preuented their brothers designs, without any further pursuit of their victory. They seek to confirme true concord by the settling of their Estates. Hauing stayed sometime vpon the place where the battell was fought; buried the dead; released prisoners, and proclaimed a generall pardon to all that would follow their armes: they call the Bishops, to take their aduice vpon occurrences, who being solemnly assembled they exhorte them vnto concord, laying plainly before them the iust iudgement of God against their brother Lothaire, lest they should draw the people againe into these extremities by their diffentions. The brethren (beseeching their good aduice) part good friends: but when as Lothaire sought to renew the quarrell, they met met againe: yet this striving was in vaine: they assemble in the City of Strasbourg A (then belonging to this Crowne) and there make a solemne alliance for them and their subjects, to live together in peace and concord. The forme is double, one in the Romane tongue, the other in Dutch, that is to say, in the Germane. As for the Romane, it seemes to be that of Languedoc and Prouence, by the language; although there be some words which are not at this day in vfe with vs, as the reader (curious of this antiquity) may see in their proper places, excusing my style which suffers me not to dilate any further, but only to note what may be found in the originals, touching this subiect.

This alliance made, they come to the diuiding of their parts: and to this end they appoint twelue deputies, (whereof Nitard sayes he was one) who without respect of fertility B or quantity, regard that onely which was most conuenient, for the needfull and commodity of their States. I know this partition is diuersly set downe by many: and who sees not in fo obscure antiquity, that it is impossible to make a true designation, seeing that in small successions there is so great diuersity? But in all this variety of opinions, it remains for certain, that Charles the onely sonne of the second bed, (who had bene so much persecuted by the children of the first wife,) remained sole King of France: that the territories of the Empire were much decayed, nothing remaining in effect, but the name of those which lie on this side the Rhine, especially in the dependances of the Realme of Bourgongne, as Dauphine and Prouence. Dauphine doth yet cary the ancient name of the Empire, in respect of the riuer of Roisne which doth separate it from Viuzretz, a Country opposite, called by an expresse name the Realme, as also for this cause Charles was called by expresse words in the designation of his portion, King of France, it confines at the one end with Lionnois, at the other with Vzege, which extends frō Pont Saint Elpirt, to Ville-neuve of Aignion, along the Roisne, all the said limits (being of his portion) bee called by a particular name the Realme, vnto this day, especially in their leafes, which retainne more plainly the traces of the ancient tongue.

An obseruation which I ought vnto my Country, for the which I keepe a rank in the Theater whereon I meane to represent the Estate of our goodly Prouinces of Gaule Nar- bonnoise, in old time honored with the name of a second Italy, and at this day so grossly vnkowne to strangers, as in the Theater of the world they leaue a blank for it, like to the deserts of Africke, although it yeelds not to any Prouince of this great and goodly Kingdome whereof it is one of the chiefe parts, and worthiest members. So Dauphine and Prouence were left to Lewis in his partage, for the commodity of Italy, the which was given him, notwithstanding the pretensions of Bernards children.

But Lewis enioyed not long these great possessions, for the which hee had so much troubled his poore father, his miserable subjects and himselfe: for hee died soone after, without any issue male, leaving one onely daughter called Hermingrade, heire of all his great Estates.

Behold the last rebellious sonne of the father, and one of his scourges, dead without any great memory, the which was likewise extinguished in his daughter and in the diuers changes happened in these Estates. Thus the children impatient to see their poore father lue, died after many fruitlesse toiles, the one in a Monastery, the other without heire to cary his name, although the imagination of a famous Race, and of an extraordinary reigne, had made them forget the holy lawes of Nature against their father. Charles and Lewis had made profession of more then brotherly loue, as their familiarities carefully obserued by Nitard, in eating, lying, and playing together, doe testifie, leaving to the wife reader to iudge, how vncertaine the loue of brethren is, when as couetousnesse and ambition creeps into their counsels. Charles married his Neece Hermingrade, daughter to his brother Lewis, to Boson Earle of Ardennes, brother to his wife Richilde. His colour was to match his Neece with a Prince of a good house, and of more vertue, and thereby to bind Boson vnto him, but his intent was other, as we shall hereafter see, Boson rooke possession of the Countries belonging to his wife as her dowry, and calls himselfe King of Arles. A point very remarkable, to vnfold many difficulties that shall follow in the foresaid Countries, and especially in Prouence, where many changes haue happened, the which we will endeavour to represent in their proper places. This was the Estate of the heires of great Charlemagne, but his posterity did worke: where the most famous memory of our Kings shall be noted by their vices, either of body or minde,

A minde, one being called the Stuttering, another the Bald, the Simple, the Cruell, the Barren, with other noyes of disgrace, to shew as it were, in a goodly table, that all the greatnes of this world, is but meere vanity.

CHARLES surnamed the Bald, Sonne to L E V V I S the Gentle,

The 26. King, and Emperour.

CHARLES called the Bald, King of France, began to reigne in the years 841. and reigned thirty yeares. He caused himselfe to be proclaimed Emperour after the death of Lewis, who suruiued Lothaire, without contradiction. The greatest part of his reigne passed in the confusions before mentioned; or in the hatred and dissensions of brethren, or in combusions, and open warre. But why should I encrease mine owne trouble and the readers griefe with the report of these particularities, vnworthy of brethren, and worthy of eternal forgetfulness?

A reigne of small fame, but only to note the confusion from whence sprang the first occasion of the fall of this Race: a King of small merit, hauing performed nothing praiseworthy, for in that wherein he desired to win the reputation of doing well, he did exceeding ill. His greatest ambition was to seeme a good vncle to the only daughter of his brother Lewis, with whom he had made so strict a league of loue. Hee married her to Boson, as I haue said: but the euents shew that he married her with an intent to gouerne her inheritance at his pleasure. Being proclaimed Emperour, he leauies a great and mighty Army, and goes in person into Italy. His pretext was to suppress the Dukes of Spolterum and Beneuent, who sought to free themselves from the subiection of the Empire, and to become Souereignes: but his intent was to seize vpon the strong places in Italy, and so by consequence, of that which belonged to his Neece Hermingrade. But Boson her husband discovering her vnles intent, preuented him, ioyning with the Dukes, and fortifying the Cities of Italy with all expedition, as his wifes inheritance: & then he aduertised Charles entring into the Country, that it was needlesse for him to passe any farther, and to put Italy to vnnecessary charges, seeing that he himselfe could guard it sufficiently, and the foresaid Dukes did submit themselves to reason. But being easie to iudge that Charles hauing an army in field, and a resolute designe, would not retire without constraint, Boson makes factions in France, in the heart of his Estate, to diuert him. An easie matter, both for their discontent against him, and the misery of that age, nourished in the liberty of vacuill warres. This occasion drew Charles from this vnusd designe, for at the first brute of rebellion, he turnes head towards France, but there chanced more to him then he expected, for he not onely left his Necesses patrimony, but his owne life in Italy, with a notable instruction, not to lose this life for the desire of another mans goods: Thus died Charles the Bald at Mantua, the year 879 leaving the Realme to his sonne Lewis, the which he fought to augment with anothers right.

LEVVIS the Second, called the Stuttering,

The 27. King, and Emperour.

Lewis reigned only two yeares, and succeeded his father likewise in the Empire, but not without opposition, for the Princes of Italy fought to be Soderaignes, and the Germanes (bearing impatiently the forepassed confusions) desired to restore the beaury of the Imperiall dignity, being greatly decayed in Italy, by such as held the lands of the Empire. They spared not the Pope himselfe, who by little and little, vsurped the Imperiall rights in Italy. These complaints being made to Lewis the Emperour, John the third Pope of Rome came into France to redresse that which concerned the Sea of Rome. He was courteously receiued by the King, stayed in France a whole yeare, and there held a Councell at Troies in Campagne.

The reigne of Lewis was very short. The Pope was scarce gone, but he was lodged in the bed of death. He had no lawfull children but two bastards, Lewis and Caroleman both men growne, whereof the one was already married to the daughter of Boson King of Arles. His wife was with child. In the doubtfullnesse of the fruit which should be borne, he must provide a Regent to gouerne the Realme, if it were a sonne. And although Lewis loued his two bastards dearly, yet would he not haue them Regents, but made choise of Eudes or Odon Duke (that is to say, gouernour) of Angers, the sonne of Robert of the race of Wichind of Saxony (of whom we haue before made mention) to be Regent of the Realme, and experience taught, that his iudgement was good. Thus Lewis died, hauing left nothing memorable but a sonne: wherein I obserue three notable thing, The efficacy of the Law of State, preferring the right of the lawfull heire nor yet borne: The minority of a King, subiect to many confusions & miseries: and the liberty of great men in the weaknesse of a young Prince, who shew boldly in a troubled streame. In this reigne happened the Eclipse of the Empire. The first checke giuen to this second Race, was by a league, which dying in shew, made the King to die in effect, and in the end caried away the Crowne, burying both the King and all his Race in one tombe. This History is very obscure, by reason of the Regents which are numbred among the Kings, during the minority of the lawfull heire: and therefore good directions are needfull in so confused a labyrinth of diuers reignes. Behold therefore the simple and plaine truth.

Lewis the Stuttering being dead, the Parliament assembled to resolue for the gouernment of the Realme, vntill that God should send the Queene a happy deliuey: and if it were a sonne, appoint who should be Gouernour to the King and Regent of the Realme vntill he came to the age of gouernment. There was no Prince that made any question to the Infants title that was to be borne: or that sought to take the aduantage of the time to aduance himselfe vnder colour of proximity of blood: but it was concluded by common consent, they should carefully preferre the Queenes wombe, vntill her deliuey. The Kings will was plaine, for he called Eudes (as we haue said) to be Gouernour to his child vnborne, and Regent of the Realme: but Lewis and Caroleman, bastards of France, had so laboured for voyces, as they preuailed against this Testamentary decree, and were chosen Regents by the Estates, who for confirmation of this authority, decreed they should be crowned, yet with a profitable exception for the pupils interest, the lawfull heire of the Crowne.

A dangerous proceeding, making seruants taste the sweetnesse of Souereign command, which made the way to horrible confusion, and multiplying the authority of many masters, did greatly preiudice the lawfull heire, the which may not (without extreme danger) be imparted but to one only. The Queene was happily deliuered of a sonne, the which was saluted King, and was called Charles, of whom we shall speake hereafter. The day of his birth was the 12. of December, in the yeare 881: But wee must now passe two and twenty yeares full of troubles, before our pupil come to age, so to march safely in so obscure a labyrinth, we must distinctly note the diuers parcels of this interregne.

The Minoritie of CHARLES, called the Simple,

Lewis and Caroleman, Brothers, the Bastards of Lewis the Stuttering, choosen by the States, reigned two yeares or thereabouts, to whom they adde Lewis the Idle, the sonne of Caroleman, but he is not numbred among the Kings.

B Charles the Grosse reigned nine yeares. Eudes or Odon, cleuen yeares.

Behold the 22. yeares of this minority.

The 28. Reigne vnder LEVVIS and CAROLOMAN.

They talke diuersly of these Kings, who indeed were no lawfull Kings, but guides to a lawfull King. A confused and obscure age, which hath left such famous persons in doubt. But we may lay in their excuse, that men being weary of these confusions, haue willingly left them doubtfull, to hide the infamy of their times, or else no man durst let Pen to Paper, to represent the shameful courses of those miseries.

Lewis and Caroleman tooke either of them a part to gouerne: Lewis the Country on the other side of Loire; and Caroleman that on this side. They had the Normans, and Boson King of Arles for common enemies, and as continuall thornes on their sides, in diuers places and vpon diuers occurrents: for the ending whereof, they besiege Boson in Vienne, and resolute to take it: but presently the Normans, come to his succour. Caroleman continues the siege, and Lewis goes to encounter the Normans. But oh the vanity of humane conceptions! The Regents are frustrate of their hopes, for Lewis loseth his Army, and afterwards his life, through grieve of his defeat. Caroleman on the other side takes Vienne, but not Boson: who saues himselfe in the Mountaines of Viuauez. And contrariwise, he that hoped to haue his greatest enemy in his power, was surprised by death vnlooked for, and extraordinary, hauing ended his siege and become sole Regent by the death of his brother. But the manner of his death is diuersly obserued: some write, that running in left after a gentlewoman, he was cruelt vnder a gate, which his horse had violently caried him. Others say, that he was slaine by a boare, going a hunting: or that being at the chase, he fell downe and brake his necke. But all this notes, that the manner of his death was violent and extraordinary. So the Regency of these two bastards, gotten by sute against the law, was both short and vnfortunate.

Lewis succeeded to these two brethren. Men dispute with much vncertainty what he was to Caroleman, either brother or sonne, but all agree he was an idle person. It is likely he was the nearest kinsman. Hauing seized on the authority after the death of these two Regents, but in effect the French had the power in their owne hands; it changed as they were ready to free themselves of this Lewis, that he died, and so they called Charles the Grosse, King of Bauaria, first Prince of the blood, to this great dignity.

Lewis defeated by the Normans, and dies for grieve.

Caroleman dies of a violent death.

CHARLES, called the Grösse, or Great, The 29. King, and Emperour.

An example from a tragick change to a worthy person.

CHARLES called the Grösse, began to reigne the year 885. and reigned nine yeares. His entrance was goodly, but his end tragically foule. Hee was installed in the Regency with the same ceremonies that the other two forenamed, for hee was crowned King, with promise to restore the Crowne to the lawfull Heire, and to gouerne according to the will of the States. He was sonne to Lewis called Germanicus, sonne to Lewis the Gentle, as wee haue said. This needesse of blood gaue him an interest, and the Imperiall dignity, power, and meanes to gouerne the Realme well. So the eyes of the French were fixed on him, as the man which should restore their decayed Estate, after so many disorders and confusions. His entrance was reasonable happy (as at the first euery thing seemes goodly) being respected of all his subiects. He went into Italy, and expelled the Sarazins which threatened Rome, but being returned into France, he found a new maske, for the Normans (a Northern people, gathered together not onely from Denmarke, but also from Sweden and other neighbour Countries, as the word of Norman doth shew, signifying men of the North) were dispersed in diuers parts vpon the sea coast of the Realme of France: and had chiefly set footing in the Countries of Arthois, Therouenne, and other, Countries, and in Neustria one of his greatest and neerest Prouinces, taking their opportunity by the troubles so long continued among the brethren.

Charles marcheth with his Army against them, but at the first encounter hee was beaten. This checke (although the losse were small) stricke a great terror, and in the end caused an apparent impossibility, to recouer that Prouince from so great Forces: so as hee was aduised to enter into treaty with them, and to make them of enemies friends, leauing them that which he could not take from them. The which hee did absolutely of his owne authority, (being very great, vnited in these two dignities) without the priuity of his Estates. So Charles yeelded Neustria to the Normans, vpon condition they should doe homage to the Crowne of France. Then gaue they their name to the Country which they had conquered, ratified by this solemne title, and called it Normandy. He likewise lost Friseland, and gaue Gisela in mariage (being the daughter of Lothaire his cousin) to Sigefrid or Ieffroy one of the chiefe of the Normans, thinking thereby to stop this storme. But thereby hee wrought his owne ruine, for this grant was found so exceeding strange, as the French, not only grieved that the Regent had done it without their aduice, but also that (in yeelding this goodly Country to the Normans) he had dismembred the inheritance of the Crowne, which is inalienable by the law of State. And although necessity might inferre some consideration for Charles his excuse, yet the French for this respect conceiued to great a hatred against him, as they could not rest vntill they had degraded him. And as one mischiefe neuer comes alone, Charles finding himselfe thus disdained, fell sicke. This corporall sicknesse was accompanied with a disemperature of the minde, farre more dangerous, by an extreme ielousie he had conceiued against his Queene Richarda, daughter to the King of Scots, suspecting her to haue beene too prodigall of her honour. These two infirmities of body and minde, made Charles altogether vnfit for his charge, which consilts more in action then in contemplatiue authority, and in a season when as occasions were ministred of all sides. This difficulty and disability to serue effectually in the Regencie of the Realme and Empire vnited in one person, of whom all men expected much, and the discontent of the ill gouernment which the French & Germanes (depending of this Crowne) pretended, in quitting Normandy, made both the one and the other, to enter into strange alterations against Charles. At the first his great authority kept the boldest in awe, and his sicknesse did excuse him: but after some yeares patience, the French & Germanes by a common consent resolved to dispossesse Charles, and to call a more sufficient to the place, euery one according to the limits of his Country.

Great hopes of Charles his good gouernment.

mandy.
Charles defeated by the iudiciall peace.

Charles extremely hated.

A try. The Germanes made choise for their Emperour, of Arnoul sonne to Caroleman, the sonne of Lewis the Gentle, retaining the respect they bare to the blood and memory of Charlemagne. Thus the Eclipse of the Empire chanced not altogether, but this change was the first motiue to alter the Imperiall dignity, whereof afterwards was framed an Estate in Germany, vnder the title of an Emperour, as we shall see. The French likewise reiect this miserable Charles, from the regency of the Realme, and call Eudes or Odon Duke of Angers named by the will of Lewis the Stuttering.

So this poore Prince is dispossessed of all his Estates, and abandoned by euery man, reiected both from Realme and Empire, hauing so ill provided for himselfe in time of prosperity, as he remained naked without an house, where to shroud himselfe from the disgrace of this shipwracke: being banished from his Court, and driuen into a poore Village of Sueuia, where he liued some daies in extreme want, without any meanes of his owne, or reliefe from any man, in the end he died, neither pitied nor lamented of any, in a corner, vnknown, but to haue been the Theater of so extraordinary a Tragedy. That one of the greatest Monarches of the world, should die without house, without bread, without honor, without mourning, and without memory, but the note of this end, so prodigiously memorabile. A notable patterne of the vanity of this world, in diuers circumstances: In Charles, in the people, and in the Chastisement. In Charles, to learne by this example, to cary themselves wisely, both in prosperity and aduersity. He wanted no iudgement, and had abundance of wealth: but he was neither temperate nor wise in his abundance, in the which the actions of his life shew him to haue beene Impertious and indifferet, purchasing enemies, in contemning those that had raised him to those dignities, hauing been too confident in himselfe, and carelesse of the condition of mans life: and from this extremity he fell into another, in the time of his greatest afflictions, suffering himselfe to be caried away in the current of melancholy, and his soule to be swallowed vp in despair. In the people, who worship him in the beginning, whom they deuoure in the end, and with an inexcusable malice, tread vnder foot the afflicted: and without due consideration of the true cause of affliction, they esteeme no crime greater then affliction it selfe, whereon they should haue pity, and detest the vice, the which they couer with the cloake of prosperity.

D But from Charles, the People, and the Rodde, let vs ascend to him that holds it, which is God, and learne to depend on him, both in wealth & woe, not trusting in our felues when we abound, nor distrust in him, when we are in greatest extreames: the which he can easily releue. Doubtlesse greatnesse commeth neither from the East, nor from the West. God raiseth one, and pulleth downe another, that weighing duely the vncertainty of this life, and profiting by the example of others, we may learne not to be wise vnto our felues, but to stop our mouthes, and open our eares and eyes, to see what God doth, and heare what he saith, seeking the true remedies of consolation, in him that neuer failes the afflicted which flee vnto him. So, that great King and Prophet banished from him house, said, I haue held my peace, for thou hast done it, and The Lord is iust in all his waies. A most reasonable warrant of Iustice, and excellent fruits of afflictions. Such was the entry and end of Charles the Grösse, at the first a King and Emperour, and in the end lesse then his most miserable subiect. After him Eudes came in place, thrust forward by them that had reiecte Charles the Grösse.

EYDES, or O DON, named Regent by LEVVIS the Second, called the Stuttering, and receiued by the Estates: The 30. King of France.

Behold Eudes at last, who should haue beene in the beginning. He began to reigne, or rather to be Regent; the year 894. and reigned eight yeares and some months, but not without difficulties. For the order of the history, we must carefully observe his race, which in the end shall game the highest place. We haue made mention of Wid-child of Saxony, one of the most famous personages of his time. Being greatly fauoured by Charlemagne, hee sent a sonne of his into France, the sonne of Wid-child the Race of Eudes, from whence sprung Hugh Capet.

902

Duke & Earle, buriedes of Officers.

France, named Robert or Rupert, who had great dignities. This Robert had two sonnes, A Eudes and Robert, who shall soone minister matter to talke of his life. This last Robert was father to Hugh the great, and he father to Hugh Capet, who in the end shall fit in the Royall throne: wee shall see by what degrees and meanes. But to vnfold many difficulti which appeare in the reading of this History, and in the diuersity of titles giuen those that are descended of Eudes Race, wee must obserue, that the name of Earle and Duke, were titles of government, and not of inheritance, and that their governments were temporary, so as one and the same man (being possessed of diuers governments at diuers times) doth cary in diuers respects the title of Duke, and Earle of those Prouinces, whereof he hath bene gouernour: the which was usually for a yeare, or for three. So as wee finde in this house, Dukes of Angers, Paris, Guienne, and Bourgongne, according to their commands.

Eudes malignent
in his Regency.

Eudes undertooke the government of the Realme, according to the decree of the Estates, when it had most need of a good Pilot. He was held to bee a good and a wise man, yet could he not please all the French that had called him to the Regency. They complained that Eudes was well pleased to rule and to keepe the King in awe, being no more a childe: and after so bad government of the former Regents, such as sought to be partakers of the authority vnder the yong King, did vehemently insit against Eudes, to haue him leaue the government of the Realme: but necessity did contradict it, not permitting him to abandon the helme in these tempests. In the end (after many clamors) Eudes authority is limited to the government.

France full of seditions.

Eight yeares passed in these contentions, but now the seed of inuolution was in the heart of the State, the liberty of priuate men hauing cast away all respect: all the members of the body were sicke, and the souereigne authority shaken by a generall disorder, which in the end changed by degrees: Italy wauered, Germany was quite fallen away, as I haue said: and France was greatly troubled with diuers factions, amongst the which the Kings part was reckoned the greater: but experience shewed, it was the weakest, for Eudes kept them in awe. The King who had the greatest interest, thought least thereon, being ill aduised by them who sought to abuse his simple and tractable disposition, and to aduance themselves by his ruine. Hee solicited: Eudes in such sort as in the end hee strips himselfe of all authority, and resignes it into the Kings hands, who knows neither how to manage it, nor how to auoid his owne misfortune, the which Eudes prevented whilst hee liued. It was not long before his death, that hee resigned all his authority of Regent vnto Charles as the lawfull heire, the which hee could not long keepe when he was in possession thereof, according to his souereigne desire.

CHARLES the third, called the Simple, The 31. King of France.

A memorable league of King
Charles the 3.

He was crowned in the yeare 902. Eudes gouerning with him eight yeares from his coronation, Charles remaining alone after the death of his Regent in the yeare 902. reigned seuen & twenty yeares. His reigne was miserable both in the beginning, midit and ending. He ratified the accord made with the Normans, by Charles the Grosse, and sealed it with the marriage of his Sister Giler with Raoul Raoul (he is also called Rhoulon) their chiefe Commander, who haue left the Pagan superstition, and embraced Christian Religion, purchased a great priuilege in that Country, whereof he was first called Duke. But the Normans first causing a more violent fire is kindled by confusion. All brookes forth: A league made against the King, disaues it selfe, and takes Armes without shame or respect, but being the breeding of the change of this second Race, wee must obserue it very distinctly, and take note of the motives thereof.

906

A The League of ROBERT brother to Eudes, Against King Charles the Simple: the first stepping the change of this second Race.

The which lay smothered fifty and three yeare before it was fully discovered, vnder Hugh Capet, from the yeare 923. to 976.

ROBERT Duke of Aniou, that is to say, Gouernor by the death of his brother Eudes, becomes the head of this league, accompanied by many great men of France. The euent shewes that their intent was to reiect Charles the Simple, as vnworthy to reigne, and to choise a new King: I doubt not but Robert affected the Crowne for himselfe: but it is very likely that hee couered this his designe with some goodly pretext. The writers of that obscure age haue concealed the motives, but as by the effects wee know the cause, so by the euent of this league when it was strongest, wee may iudge of the intent.

this League.

They aduanced a Prince of the blood for King, causing Charles to quit the Crowne, disgracing him with the name of simple or foolish, and declaring him incapable of so great a charge. Who seeth not then the reason, that during the minority of Charles the simple, the diuersity of matters had bred infinit confusions in the State, and that since his coronation, things were nothing repaired, although Eudes had resigned him the Regency. They pretend it was necessary to furnish the Realme with a more worthy Prince, who might giue an end to these miseries. But that which chiefly moued the vnderakers, was their priuate interest, the which they cloaked with the good of the Common-weale. The humors of this insufficient king offended many, too milde to some, too seuer to others, and ingratefull to such as had best serued him.

the crowne.

The commentary which hath bene added to the text of the Original is not likely, that Robert as brother to Eudes pretended the Crowne, as heire vnto his brother, being lawfully chozen by the States. But whereunto tends all this? Eudes had left no suspicion to pretend any interest vnto the crowne, hauing bene Regent after others, and inioying it but by sufferance, resigning it willingly, or by constraint, vnto the lawfull heire. Truly the French mens careful keeping of their Queens wombe: their acknowledging the child borne after the fathers death for king: their choosing of Regents: their placing and displacing of one and the same Regent, doe plainly shew both the efficacy of the law, and the resolute possession of the French, the which they yielded not easily to a man with so weake a title. What then? I should rather thinke that the peoples complaint, tyred with so long calamities, was their colour to furnish the Realme with a more wise and profitable guide, & that they sought a Prince, (as in the end they tooke Raoul King of Bourgongne, the first Prince of that blood) of which league Robert was the ring-leader, as the first in dignity and most valiant in resolution, or the most rash in so dangerous an enterprise. The memory of his brothers wife and peaceable gouernment, and his owne valour, opposit to the foolish and base disposition of Charles, blest with this name of simple, (for his folly and contemptible humors) gaue a great lustre to this enterprise, with those great intelligences he had within the Realme, and namely with the Normans his confident friends.

Robert the head of the league and in manner of a king.

With this assurance he armes boldly against Charles, promising himselfe an vndoubted victory, by the valour of his men, and the baseness of his enemy. Charles the Simple awakes at this strange reuolt, and (distrusting his own subiects, whom hee sees risen in armes, to dispossesse him of his Estate) hee flies to Henry the third Emperour, and prepares all he can to calme so great a storme. As their armes approach, Robert (to haue some title to make warre) causeth himselfe to be crowned King at Rheims, by Henry the Archbishop, who died three daies after this vnlawfull Coronation. The opinions are diuers: but for my part, I do not hold that Robert caused himselfe to be crowned, with a better title than his brother Eudes, who was neither crowned, nor reigned as King, but as Regent. But all the French complained, that they needed a better King then Charles the Simple, who would lose the crowne, if it were not foreseene.

himselfe to be crowned King.

He had already ratified the folly of Charles the Grosse, in continuing the vsurpation of 923

of Neustria to the Normans, who with the Kings consent were seized thereon, with the title of lawful possession: and moreover they were much incensed, that he had put himself into the protection of the Emperor Henry, to give him a cause to invade himselfe King of France, as of late dayes the Germanes had enfranchised themselves from the French Monarchy, by the division of brethren which had reigned, and the minority of Charles who then commanded. This ielousie inflamed the hearts both of the one, and the other, and seued Robert for a hew, meaning to fill in a troubled water.

Now they are in Armes. Reason and respect of the common good fights for Robert. The same reason ioynd with the royall authority, armes for Charles against these new designs. But God, (who guides the least moment of our liues, watcheth mightily for the preservation of mankind, and disposeth of Kingdomes by his wisdom) had limited this audacious attempt, reseruing the change to another season, and yet for the same Race of Robert. Even so, the death of him that had crowned Robert, was a foretelling of his owne. The armies lodge in the heart of France, neere vnto the great City of Paris, the seizing whereof was a maine point of State: but see what happens, he that thought to vanquish, is vanquished. As the armies approach neer to Soissons, striuing in the view of Paris) who should do best, they ioyne. The combat is very cruell: but Robert fighting in the front is slaine, leaving for that time the victory to Charles the Simple: and a son in his house that shal reuiue his designe in his posterity, that is Hughes the Great, father to Hugh Capet.

Robert defeated and slaine by Charles.

The death of Robert did not daunt his Army, but it continued firme vnder the command of Hebert, Earle of Vermandois, son in law to Robert. And Charles did so ill manage his victory, as it became a trap for his owne ruine: for seeing these Forces to stand firme, he seeks a treaty of peace with an vnseasonable feare. Hebert embraceth this occasion, beseecheth Charles to come to Saint Quintens, to confer together. Charles (simple indeed) comes thither without hostages. Hebert hauing him in his power, takes him prisoner: and letting him vnderstand the will of the French, to haue the Realme gouerned by a more sufficient man then himselfe, he resolues to assemble the Estates of the Realme to that end, conueyes him to Chateau-Thierry, and from thence to Soissons, where he had assembled the chiefe of the Realme, chosen after his owne humour: where he makes him to resigne the Crowne to Raoul his god-sonne, the first Prince of the blood, by his mother Hermingrade, daughter to Lewis, and wife of Boson, King of Bourgongne.

Charles taken prisoner by Hebert.

So this poore Prince is led from prison to prison, (for the space of five yeares, yet numbred in his reign) and after he had renounced his right, he payed Nature her due, oppressed with griefe, and dying of a languishing melancholy, to see himselfe so ignominiously intreated by that audacious affront, done by the trecherie of his owne vassall.

Charles dies.

He had to wife Ogins the daughter of Edward King of England, a wife and courageous Princeesse: by her he had a son named Lewis. This poore Princeesse (seeing her husband prisoner, and foreseeing the end of this Tragedie, by the strange beginning) takes her son Lewis, and flies speedily into England, to her brother Adelstan, who then reigned, yecding the time, and the violent force of her enemies. Thus Raoul was seated in the place of Charles the Simple, a Prince of apparent vertue, and so they account him.

Queen Ogina flies into England with her son Lewis.

RAOVL the 32. King, but in effect an vsurper of the Realme.

Raoul on victory, his reign was victorious.

R was proclaimed and crowned King of France at Soissons, in the yeare 923, and reigned about 13. yeares, during Charles his imprisonment, and after his death. This reign was painfull and vnfortunate: Normandie, Guienne, Loraine, Italy, were the cause of much fruitlesse labour. He fought to suppress the Normans, and to repaire the errors of Charles the Groffe, and Charles the Simple, (who were blamed to haue suffered them to take footing in that Country, to the preiudice of the Crowne:) but he prevailed not, nor yet in Loraine, nor Guienne, whither he made voyages, with

A with much brute, and small fruite. From thence he turned his Forces toward Italy, where the State was much troubled, by the decease of Boson, and boldnesse of the Commanders: who held the strongest places, playing the Kings, in refusing to acknowledge the Empire, but in name; and in effect, they commanded as Soueraignes, imagining their gouernments to be hereditary for their children. He performed some things worthy of commendation, in suppressing Berenger Duke of Friul, who hauing freed himselfe from the Empire, had vanquished Lewis the sonne of Boson, who enioyed Italy: (as wee haue said) as husband to the daughter of Lewis the Gentle. Raoul made a quiet end with Hughes Earle of Arles, who had gotten possession of that goodly City as Gouernour, seated in a fertile Country, and very conuenient: he suffered him quietly to enioy the City and territories about it, holding it of the Crowne of France.

Thus passed the reign of Raoul, without any great profit after so much toyle, and trouble, vnder a colour to do better then the lawful heire, wrongfully dispossessed by him; Leaving no memory but his ambition and iniustice, in a deluge of troubles & confusions, wherein the Realme was plunged after his departure, to the great discontent of all the French. He dyed after all these broyles, in the yeare 936. at Compaigne. An age wonderfull disordered, wherein we may profitably observe by what accidents and meanes great Estates are ruined. Ciuill warres bred the first Symptomes. As order is the health of an Estate, so is disorder the ruine. The seruant hauing tasted the sweetnesse of command, imagines himselfe to be Master, being loth to leave the authority he had in hand, holding it as his owne by testament. In this resolution there is nothing holy, all is violated for rule, all respect is laid aside, every one plays the King within himselfe: For one King there are many, and where there are many Masters, there is none at all. The which we must well observe, to vnfold many difficulties in the History of this confused age, wherein we reade of many Kings, Dukes, Earles, although these titles were but temporary, hauing no other title but the sword, and the confusion of times.

Necessary ob. servations for great Estates

Thus was France altered after the death of Charles the Simple, by the practices of Robert's League. There was no gouernour of any Province throughout the Realme, which held not proper to himselfe and his heires that which was given vnto him but as an office.

Confusions of those times.

D From hence sprang so many Dukedomes, Earledomes, Baronies, and Seigneuries, the which for the most part are returned to their first beginnings. Italy (given to an Infant of France) was possessed by diuers Princes. Germany (withdrawne from the Crowne) was banded into diuer factions, so as the Empire of the West, confirmed in the person of Charlemagne, continued scarce a hundred yeares in his Race: for Lewis the fourth, the son of Arnoul (of whom we haue spoken) was the last Emperour of this blood. In his place the Germanes elected Conrade Duke of East Franchonia, the yeare of grace 920. the Empire being then very weak. After Conrade, was chosen Henry the Foulle, Duke of Saxony, and after him his son Otho, Princes adorned with great and singular vertues, fit for the time to pursue the West: for the East did run head-long to her ruine, so as since Nicéphorus (who liued in the time of Charlemagne) they did not esteeme them, but held them as abjects in regard of those great Emperours which liued before them, named Julius, Caprotalus, Leo Armenien, Michel the Stammering, the two Theophiles, Iader, Andron, Basil the Macedonian, Leo the Philosopher, Alexander, and Constantine a Roman, all which had nothing of the Romance but the name. Thus this poore feeble body languished, being torne in peeces by the infamies of these men, either of no valour, or altogether wicked, attending the last blow by the hand of the Mohemetans, whose power they fortified by their vicious liues, vntill they had lodged them upon their owne heads.

In France, In Italy and Germany.

Confusion in the East.

E phorus (who liued in the time of Charlemagne) they did not esteeme them, but held them as abjects in regard of those great Emperours which liued before them, named Julius, Caprotalus, Leo Armenien, Michel the Stammering, the two Theophiles, Iader, Andron, Basil the Macedonian, Leo the Philosopher, Alexander, and Constantine a Roman, all which had nothing of the Romance but the name. A notable spectacle of Gods iust judgement, who dishonours them that dishonour him, and expell them from their houses that banish him from their hearts. In these confusions of State, the authority of the Pope increased daily, by the ruines of the Emperours, who thrust himself into credit among Christians by many occurrences. There desired was to build a Monarchy in the Church, by authority, power, Seignuries, ciuill iurisdiction, armies, revenues, & treasure, being growne to the greatest, as afterwards they sought to prescribe lawes to Emperours & Kings, who relating it (and disposing vpon this many) many differences grew among them, and so were dispersed among the poples. The summe of all that shall be discoursed in the future ages in Christendome, wherein we shall view the Ruine of Rome, the Empire & the Kingdoms. The bur of matters of State, which vnto the subiect and the order of our designe doth mee, to report by degrees so long A and so obscure a discourse of those ages plunged in darknesse.

Platina the Popes Secretary, reports a very notable accident, happened at Rome in those times, A yong maid loued by a learned man (these are his words) came with him to Athens, arrayed like a boy, and there profited so well in knowledge and learning, as being come to Rome, there were few equall vnto her in the Scriptures, neither did any one exceed her in knowledge: so as she had gotten so great reputation, as after the death of Pope Leo, she was created Pope, by a generall consert, and was called Iohn the eight.
But it chanced, that hauing crept too neere to one of her groomes, she grew with childe, the which she did carefully coneeale. But as shee went to the Baslique of Saint Iohn de B Lateran, betwixt the Colosses and Saint Clement, shee fell in labour, and was deliuered of this stolne birth, in a solemne procession in view of all the people. And in detestation of so foule a fact a pillar was erected where this prophane person died.

So without flattering the truth, not the Empire alone went to wracke, but also the Realme and the Church, being in those daies full of confusions, in which they fell from one mischiefe to another by the barbarous ignorance of all good things, both in the State and Church, as the wife and vnpassionate reader may obserue in the continuance of the History plainly described. But let vs returne from the Empire and Sea of Rome to France. We haue said, that when Charles the Simple was first imprisoned, Queene Ogina his wife had caried her sonne Lewis into England to Adelstan the King her brother. Shee C had patiently endured all, during the furious reigne of Raoul, the vsurper, while the experience of diuers masters did ripen the French mens discontents, to make them wish for their lawfull Lord. After this death of Raoul, Adelstan King of England, (hauing drawne vnto him William Duke of Normandy, the son of Rhon) sends a very honorable Ambasage to the States of France, intreating them to restore his Nephew Lewis to his lawfull and hereditary dignity. The French will it, so as without any difficulty, Lewis the son of Charles was called home, by the Estates of France, whither he was accompanied with a great troope of Englishmen and Normans, as the shew of a goodly Army, which might seeme to force them to that which they willingly yielded vnto.

LEVVIS: the 4. furnamed from beyond the Seas,

The three and thirtieth King.

Lewis a disloy-all Prince.

LEVVIS returns into France, hauing remained nine yeares or thereabouts in England, furnamed D'outremer or from beyond the Seas, by reason of his stay there. He began to reigne in the yeare 935. and reigned E 935 yeares. A disloyall and vnfortunate Prince, hauing made no vse of his afflictions, vnworthy the blood of Charlemagne. And thus was their name aduanced by the default of men, which God held back by his pience. He found the Estate of his Realme like vnto one that returnes to his house after a long and dangerous nauigation. Hee was receiued with great ioy of all men. Those which had been most opposit vnto him, made greatest shewes of faithfull and affectionate service, to insinuate into his fauour. Amongst the rest William D.
of Normandy, and especially Hugues the great, Mayr of the Palace, whom we haue already noted as the sonne of Raoul, the chiefe of the said League. Hee had employed all his meanes for the calling home of Lewis into France, and at his returne, hee spared nothing to confirme his authority. This was the meanes to lay the foundation of a greater authority for his successors.

Lewis married one of the Em-perors sisters.

They must begin the new government of this Prince with a wife, to haue lawfull issue. The Emperors alliance was very needfull. Hee held the Imperiall dignity, being the sonne of a very the Fowler Duke of Saxony. Hee had two sisters Herberge and Amoy.
King Lewis married the eldest, and in signe of brotherly loue, hee bestowed the marriage of the youngest with Hugues the great. Lewis had two sonnes by Herberge, Lithaire, (who Hugues, father to Hugh Capet, marries another.

A (who succeeded him to the Crowne of France) and Charles, who shall be Duke of Lo-raigne, and contend for the Crowne, but shall lose it. Hugues the great was more happy, then Lewis, for of the youngest he had Hugh Capet, who shall take their place, and ascend the royall Throne, to settle the French Monarchy, shaken much in the confusions of these Kings unworthy to reigne, or beare any rule. And of the same marriage Hugues had Orbe and Henry, both Dukes of Bourgoigne, one after another. Behold now vpon the Stage two great and wise personages, the King and his Maire, whom we may call a second king:
they strive to circumvent each other, the which their actions will discover: but man cannot prevent that on earth, which is decreed in heauen. At this time William Duke of Normandy, the sonne of Rhon (who had shewed himselfe so affectionate in the restoring of the King to his dignity) was traiterously murdered by the meanes of Arnoul Earle of Flanders his Capitall enemy: leaving one sonne named Richard, a yong man vnder go-uernment. This vnexpected and extraordinary death needs breed great troubles in Normandy, an Estate which was but now beginning. It did greatly import for the good of France, to haue this Prouince quiet. Lewis was likewise particularly bound, for the good entertainment he had receiued of William in his greatest necessity, the which tied him to his sonne,

Troubles in Normandy.

These were goodly shewes to make him embrace this cause: so as hauing intelligence of this accident, he sends expressly to Richard and his Councell, to assure him of his loue and succour, and followes himselfe presently to Rouan, with a traine fit for his Royall greatnesse, being loth to be the weakest after so strange an alteration, where the most audacious doe commonly fish in a troubled stream. The colour of his coming was to comfort Richard with his counsell and fauourable assistance: but in effect, it was to seize vpon his person and Estate. He sends for this yong child to his lodging, conducted by his gouernour, a Knight called Osmond: he doth assure him with sweet words of his fatherly loue: but when night came, he would not suffer him to depart, detaining him three dayes with a carefull guard. The people incensed by them that had then charge of the yong Duke, mutine, and besiege the Kings lodging.

Hauing pacified this popular fury, in deliuering them their Prince, he protests to haue no other intent, but to preferre his Estate. And so in an open assembly of the Citizens, receiuing him to homage, hauing giuen him a discharge of his Lands and Seigneuries, he doth solemnly promise to reuenge the death of William against Arnoul Earle of Flanders, and gets the consent of the Normans, to lead their Duke with him to be instructed with his sonne Lothaire, a yong child of the same age. He brings him to Laon, whither Arnoul the murderer of William repaires, in shew to purge himselfe of the murder: but in effect, to perswade him, so to seize on Richards person, as he might enioy his Estate.

Lewis deales treacherously with the Duke of Normandy.

Lewis being resolute in this determination (a man disloyall by nature, and louing nothing but himselfe) he caused this poore yong Prince to be straitly guarded: but his gouernour Osmond, retires him cunningly out of Laon, conducting him to Senlis, to Hebert his fathers confidenc friend. This is he which imprisoned Charles the Simple, contrary to his faith: and now he detests Lewis his Soueraigne Lord, who seeks to doe the like vnto one of his vassalls. But we shall soon see the iustice of God aboue all, who will punish one by another, and shew himselfe an enemy and reuenger of all disloyalty and mi-deemeanour: Both in servant and master, and in all other, as all are naturally subiect to this fouraighe law of integrity and truthfulness to all men.

Hugues the great Earle of Paris, and Maire of the Palace, had wonne great credit with the Cities and men of warre: but he was more feared then loued of Lewis, a treacherous and reuenging Prince, whom he distrusted, and opposed his authority against him. Hebert was his confidenc friend: so in this accident of the yong Prince, he comes to Paris, and winces him to promise fauour vnto Richard, or at the least makes him promise not to be his enemy.

The King the while, knowing how much his friendship did import in these affaires, be-bouts to winne him (he was the strangeness of that age, as the master must seek to the seruant) the which he obtained, vpon condition to giue him a good part of Normandy.
Hereupon the match was made, that Hugues should accompany Lewis to the war of Normandy, and should enter on the one side, while the King came on the other, promising to diuide their conquests according to their agreement. But this succeeded not according to their

their meanings, the two deceivers were deceived: but the greatest bare the greatest burden. This complot of Lewis and Hugues could not be so secret, but it came to the knowledge of Hebert, who gave intelligence to Richard and his governors, Osmond and Bernard the Dane: so as they assembled at Senlis, and refused to crosse this double dealing of Hugues, with the like policy. To this end Hebert (according to the familiarity he had with Hugues) goes to conferre with him, to put him in mind of his promise, of the right of a young Prince violently pursued by Lewis, and of his trecherous and disloyall disposition, who having employed him to worke his will, would in the end deceive him, beseeching him to stand firme in a good cause, for his ancient and faithfull friends, and not to fortifie their common enemy by the afflictions of another, but in defending the right violently set vpon, prouide for his safety and profit: Hugues (who thought it best to haue two strings to his bow) distrusts Lewis in his heart more then any man liuing, doth easily grant Hebert to assault Richard against Lewis, and doth confirme his promise by oath.

The deceiver is deceived.

Hebert hauing thus ingaged Hugues, and yet distrusting him greatly, whom he sees to play on both sides; returns to Senlis, to Richard and his Gouvernours, where they conclude, that if Hugues ioynd with the King against Richard, they would compound with the King to his cost: and so it happened. The King goes to field with his army on one side, and Hugues on the other to invade Normandy in diuers parts, when as Bernard the Dane, chiefe gouernor of the State for Richard, and Osmond of his person, came boldly vnto Lewis and said vnto him, that he had no need to attempt Normandy by force, when as he might enioy it by a voluntary obedience: for prooffe whereof, if it pleased him to come to Rouen, he should be obeyed. But withall he aduised him to take heed of Hugues his ancient enemy, shewing him treacherously the countenance of a friend and seruant, lest he were circumvented, but rather to accept of all Normandy with Rouen, the which offered it selfe vnto him to receiue peace from him, and yeeld him obedience as their so- ueraigne Lord.

Lewis willingly giues ear to this aduice: he comes presently to Rouen, and is honourably receiued, sending word to Hugues, that seeing the Prouince obeyed, there was no need of further proceeding, and hauing not employed him in this voluntary conquest, it was not reasonable he should participate in another mans Estate: that the publike good and reason required him to leave Richard as hee was, vnder the obedience of the Crowne, without dismembred of his Estate, Hugues (who pretended a good part of this rich Country) was greatly discontented with Lewis. Hauing dismissed his Army, he retires to Paris, detesting his infidelity. Hebert embracing this occasion, comes to Hugues, and according to the familiarity of their ancient friendship, he laughs at him, in suffering himselfe to be abused by his approved enemy, abandoning his trusty friends against all right. The shame to haue failed of his word, and despite to haue beene deceived, made Hugues soone resolute, not onely to leave Lewis, but to embrace Richards party against him, with all his power. It was a notable stratagem, to diuide Hugues, and leave him discontented with Lewis: but being assured of his friendship, they send into Denmarke (from whence the Normans were defended) to King Aigrold, kinsman and friend to Richard, for succours, the which succeeded more happily then they expected.

Lewis oppresseth the Normans.

Lewis is at Rouen, who doth not onely command there as Soueraigne, but doth seize on their goods, whom he doth any way suspect of deuising occasions, and holding it for a capitall crime to be any way affected vnto Richard, fauouring his followers with the best marches in the Country, and giuing them credit and authoritie in the Prouince by marriages: he impposeth extraordinary charges vpon the people, already, surcharged with the feeding of so many horsemen. To conclude, he doth all a man may do, that hath no other Councillor but his grauenesse, and that seeks his owne ruine by his blinde counsell.

The King of Denmarke comes to succour the Duke of Normandy.

In the meane time Aigrold armes in Denmarke, and in the end comes into Normandy with a goodly army: the King likewise brings his Forces to field: Richard who had the chiefe interest, is at Senlis in safety, and Hugues at Paris, a looker on. Aigrold before he enters into open hostility, sends his Ambassadors to Lewis, to let him vnderstand, that the reason which had drawne him into Normandy with his Army, was to maintain the right of his cousin Richard, who had not deserved to be spoiled of his Estate, vpon no other cause but his minority, who (although he had no father) yet should be not be de-

A rute of kinsmen and friends. And therefore he entreated Lewis (rather then to come to the doubtfull euent of armes) to suffer Richard to enioy Normandy, as his father and grandfather had done. And this he did to haue the right on his side.

Lewis bold in deceiuing, and a coward in danger, charged with the wrong he had done vnto a pupill, seeing himselfe abandoned by Hugues, whom he had discontented out of season, and not trusting much the other Noblemen that followed him, he makes a very milde answer to Aigrold: and after some negotiations, he yeelds to a parlee with him, as the chiefe mediator of Richards rights. Being in field, and conferring together vpon this occasion, behold an vnexpected accident falls out. He which had bene the cause of the Earle of Flanders quarrell, and by consequence of the murdering of William, the father of Richard, was there present with the King. Our Historics say, it was Ellain Earle of Montreuil. A Dane (an old friend of Williams) knows him, he chargeth him therewith: and as they grow to choller, he kills him. Then both parties fell to armes: the French charge the Danes, but they find themselves too weak: all are disperled, and with this vprore the Kings brake off their parlee. Lewis goes to horse, the which being strong headed carries him among the thickest of the Danes. Behold hee is now prisoner in the hands of some souldiers: but as in this tumult the guard was neglected, he escapes: yet in the end he is taken againe, and led in triumph to Rouen. Thus the murder supported by Lewis, was the cause of his imprisonment: and hee seeking to wrong a pupill, did releue him C with his owne person, in exchange that he had restrained him against all right.

Lewis taken prisoner as a partaker.

Queene Gerberge greatly troubled for her husbands imprisonment, flies to Otho the Emperour her brother, who (preuented by Hugues his other brother in law, and seeing the wrong Lewis did, to disquiet a young Prince in the possession of his Estate) refused to succour him: so as necessity enforceth Gerberge to vfe Hugues (to her great grieve) to be a mediator for the deliuey of the King her husband. Hugues entreated by the Queene his sister in law, deales at length in this accord, but vpon good tearmes; That the King should yeeld to Duke Richard all the Duchy of Normandy, and for a surplussage that of Britany, to hold them freely without retention of soueraignty or homage: the which was much more then the pupill required, who would willingly haue done homage to the D King, as to his soueraigne Lord, and haue yeelded him faithfull obedience. Behold the issue of Lewis his deceit, being deceived by a poore young man, whom he thought to circumuent: verifying by a notable example, that whosoeuer seeks to take away another mans right, loseth his owne.

Enlarged vpon conditions.

Behold Richard restored to his Estate, where he carrieth himselfe with such equity and moderation, by the wise aduice of Bernard and Osmond his gouernours, as he winnes the loue of his subiects, and by their counsell he takes to wife Agnis or Emacet, the daughter of Hugues the great, for a requital of the good office he had receiued from him in his necessity. This alliance of Hugues with Richard, encreased Lewis his ieaously against him, so as he resolved to employ all his forces to suppress him. He goes to the Emperour Otho his brother in law, enforcing him, that Hugues practised to deprive him of the Realme: and that he would speedily attempt it, if he were not preuented: with whom he so preuailed, through this common ieaously of Princes (who impatiently doe see any other to grow great by them) as he leauied a great Army, the which ioynd with that of France, and besieged Rouen: but with such unhappy successe, as the Emperour (having lost both his Nephew and a great number of his men) aduised the King to compound with Hugues his brother in law, and to leave Richard Normandy in peace, according to their former Treaties.

Richard marries the daughter of Hugues the great.

Lewis seeks to ruine Hugues his brother in law.

So hauing laboured to reconcile these brothers in law, he returned into Germany. This counterfeit reconciliation; was but a breathing of the peoples miseries, which they suffered by the diffention of Princes: but there was no firme friendship, for Hugues trusted not Lewis, but kept aloofe in his great City of Paris, leaving the King at Laon, being then the chiefe seat of his Royall abode.

Hugues, by this cunning proceeding, kept himselfe out of Lewis his hands, who on the otherwise diffembled: and seeing that force could not preuaile, he watched all opportunities to surpris his enemies: amongst the which he hated none so much as Hebert Earle of Vermandois, both for that which he had done against his father, and his late proceedings against himselfe. He gouerned this dislike so wisely, as in the end Hebert was hanged,

ged, and this was the means: Lewis pretending to loue Hugues, shewed a good countenance to all such as were affected vnto him, especially to this Cont Hebert, whom he favoured extraordinarily, protesting to trust him in all things: the successe was answerable to his plot. He calls an Assembly of his Vassals at Laon, and fortifies himselfe to bee the strongest: thither he calls Cont Hebert, of whose counsell (in shew) he made great esteem, and writes his Letters vnto him, that he would vse him. Hebert growne familiar with Lewis, and sent for by him, comes to the Assembly, fearing no enemy. Lewis being master of the City, reading a Letter after dinner in the great hall he cried out: It is truly said, that Englishmen are not very wise. The Noblemen about him desirous to know the cause of this speech: he faigned, that the King of England had demanded his aduice by this Letter: What he should doe to a subiect that had called his Lord into his house, vnder colour of good cheere, had seized on him, and caused him to dye shamefully: Hebert answereth with the rest; That he must dye infamously. The King replies vnto him presently: Thou hast condemned thy selfe by thine owne mouth, thou wicked seruant, thou didst inuite my father to thy house, with a shew of loue: being there, thou didst detain him, and cause him to die cruelly. The company stood in shew amazed, but in effect ready to execute the Kings pleasure, not able to contradiet so manifest a truth: for the information of the death of King Charles the simple, was notorious to the world, so as presently, by Lewis absolute command, Hebert was taken away, delivered to the executioner, and hanged in view of all the world, the place being neere vnto Laon, (noted by so memorable an execution) is called Mont Hebert vnto this day. And thus the treachery of Hebert (after a long delay, when he least suspected) was punished by the treachery of Lewis: and he himselfe after all these exploits died at Rheims, in the year 955. hated and detested of the French, leaving to Lothaire his sonne a Crowne neare the ruine, and to Charles his youngest, the fauour of his elder brother, for a poore portion, as we shall declare hereafter.

LOTHAIRE, The 34. King of France.

Lothaire a treacherous King.He attempts warre against Richard of Normandy, but in vaine.

LE began to reigne in the year 956. and reigned thirty one yeares, performing nothing that was memorable, but that he was heyre to his fathers treachery and misfortune, and the last but one of his Race. He was a forerunner of the change, which happened to his posterity. He renewed a league with the Emperour Otho the 2. who had succeeded his father Otho the first, with an intent to reuiue the enterprize of his father Lewis, against Richard Duke of Normandy, either by policy, or else by open force. He sought twice to surpriſe Richard, a good and wise Prince, with a shew of good meaning: but hauing attempted all in vaine, in the end he vied open force, and was shamefully repulſed and beaten. Thus he spent some yeares vnprofitably in this wilfull passion against the Normans, bringing infinite confusions into France, both by his owne Forces, and by theirs, against whom he vndertook this voluntary warre.

These miseries are set forth at large by those Writers which liued in that age. This briefe will serue for the matter, according to our style, to shew, that these calamities bred onely by the passion of an ill aduised King, thrust the Subiects into fury and despair, and then into hatred against him, being vnworthy to be respected, hauing so little regard of publike peace. The generall Estates assemblen for the redresse thereof. The Normans suffering as well as the French, demand nothing more then peace, and Duke Richard, notwithstanding his treaty with Lewis the fourth, offered to hold of the Crowne of France, so as his subiects might liue in quiet.

These honest, profitable, and necessary offers, augmented their hate against Lothaire, who sought warre without any cause, although he were vnfortunate, alwayes mutinous, and alwayes beaten. To this phreneticall passion of his fruitlesse quarrels against the Normans, a new fantasie possessed Lothaire, to breake the league with the Emperour, and to make warre with the Germans, for the possession of Loraine (anciently called Austrasia)

A Austrasia) the which he said belonged vnto him by right, time out of minde. He sought by ill gouernment to repossesse that which lay farre off, being vnable to keepe that which he had in his possession. He engaged Regnier and Lambert, the sonnes of the Earle of Mons in this action, promising to diuide the conquest: and did so contemne his brother Charles, (whom his father had recommended vnto him) leaving him no portion but his fauour, hoping this liberty should breed more loue in him, and also the reuerence of a brother tyed to his eldest, should make him respectiue to the publike authority, as he fled to the Emperour Otho for helpe. Otho (embracing this occasion) determines the sure which Lothaire would commence against him, in respect of Loraine: inuesting Charles therein, B who sought releefe of him for his brothers discontent: but Otho restoring Loraine vnto him, tooke from it great Signeuries giuen to the Bishops of Cologne and Liege, with condition also that he should depend of the Empire. Hereof grew great iarres betwixt the French and the Germans, with so violent a rage, and passion, as they were rather furious robberies, then iust and well gouerned warres: Charles the brother of Lothaire, carried himselfe very indifferently, as if he had bene no Frenchman but a Germane, and was wedded to the Emperours passions with such vehemency, as if all his good fortune had depended thereon, and had vterly renounced France as a capitall enemy. Moreouer, the ordinary traffick from France to Germany, was a daily cause of discontent to the French: to whom Loraine was an ordinary passage for their commerce: so as diuers persons receiving daily, and vpon diuers occasions, discourtesies from Charles Duke of Loraine, the French conceived a hatred in their hearts against him, which burst out in a seasonable time, for the vtter ouerthrow of all the good hap whereunto God had called him, the which he could not gouerne by his indifferention and cruelty.

964
Lothaire makes warre against the Emperour.Lorraine giuen to Charles of France by the Emperour.

But the prouidence of God, making way for his decrees, would expell them from the Crowne, which had banished all faith, valour, humanity, Iustice, and other royall virtues, and disposed the people to these changes, by their default, who had the principall interest to entertaine their loues by equity and good vsage. Lothaire hated of all men, died in the year 964. leaving behind him an execrable memory of his actions, and Lewis his sonne for a final conclusion of his Race, as an outcast of great Charlemagne.

Lothaire dyed detested of all men.LEWIS THE FIFTH,
The 35. King of France,

And the last of this second Race.

E reigned one yeare onely, and dyed without heyre, without friends, and without memory, leaving his place void, in time of need, in troubles of State, and confusion of times horribly corrupted. He was likewise called idle, hauing done nothing worthy of memory, but in leaving the place to a better Prince, and more worthy then himselfe, whom God, the protector of the Crowne of France, had referred for this Estate, in so great necessity: for as God had decreed, that out of the house of Hugues the great, should issue a great King, which should repaire the errors of this bastard Race of Charlemagne, so likewise he had prepared the meanes, both for the father to lay the foundation, and for his sonne Hugh Capet (appointed for this dignity) to finish this goodly building, as it appears in the following Discourse.

The last King of the race of Charlemagne.

HUGUES, OR HUGH CADET, 987 The 36. King of France, and the first of the third Race:

which reigned in this day vnder Lewis 13.

He royall Throne of France (remaining void by the death of Lewis the first) did vntill call Charles Duke of Loraine to this Crowne (of whom we haue before mentioned as the first Prince of the blood Royall) to whom by the fundamental Law did adudge the Crowne for want of heyres males, hispall sonnes of Kings, Charles was sonne to Lewis the fourth brother to Lothaire, and to Lewis the fifth, the last King Barthelemy, otherwise called Hugh Capet, John de Hagen the great Maire of the Palace, Bishop of Paris, and also Prince of the French, carried in froth Charles being aduanced to the Crowne by the free election of the French, assembled in Parliament, according to the ancient and inuoluble customes of France. In Iuly 987.

We haue said in the second Race, that Lewis the first, sonne to Lothaire, dying without heyres males, had buried the Royalty with him: for Charles Duke of Loraine had by his actions made himselfe vaworthy of this great honour. He had recourse to the Emperor Otto, and had taken the oath of fealty and allegiance to be inserted in the Duchy of Loraine: So by this homage hee had renounced all the interest hee could pretend to the Crowne of France. Moreover, he had aggravated this error by an irreconcilable hatred for (being Duke of Loraine) he had shewed himselfe a passionate enemy to the French, in maintaining the German faction against them, who had not long before withstanding themselves from the obedience of our Monarchy. It is also likely, that many private men were moued with the interest of this general quarrell, by reason of the situation of Loraine, the ordinary passage from France into Germany, Princes of mutual commerce.

These private injuries, bred in the end a general discontent, the which was increased by such as had a private interest in the wrongs they pretended to haue received. The feeling of these bad practices, acted to lately by Charles against France, both an general and particular, did incense the French against him. But the example and cries of them of Loraine added to their experience, confirmed their resolution to stop his enuances to the Crowne: for Charles did infinitely oppress his subjects of Loraine, for the supplying of his prodigall expences.

This was the preparative of Charles his downfall, wrought by himselfe, to deprive him of that authority whereunto God had called him. These were the causes which made the French resolute to withstand Charles of Loraine with all their force, in his pretention to the Crowne of France. But how then? Charles being rejected, the Realme had need of a King, vnto to submit without one, no more then a body can without a head. They could not live equall. The equall command is a plague to the French.

In this Estate they could haue recourse but to Hugh Capet, being accompanied with all the commendable vertues that might make a man worthy of a great command, with authority, power, vnderstanding, courage, wisdom, equity, mildness, dexterity, valour, and credit, both within and without the Realme.

We haue before spoken of his father Hugues the Great, the sonne of a Duke of Angers, who was the head of the League against Charles the Simple. To the expectations and dignities he held vnder Lewis 4. and Lothaire, he added the friendship of the chief Noblemen of the Realme. Richard Duke of Normandy was one of his most constant friends, whom he had gratified, maintaining him in the possession of his Estate. He receiued requital of this good office with interest; in the person of Hugh his sonne, to place him in the Royall Throne, as our History shall declare. But all these advantages, were not only crowned with a goodly and great offspring, but also with a sonne, endued with singular graces both of bodie and mind. He had fixe sonnes; and two daughters, but the eldest was the chiefest heyre of his name and vertue, perfecting what his father had begun.

He was named Hugues, and by surname Capet, either for that he had respect to his father that being young he was accustomed to, catch at his companions caps, as a pretigious Chapin.

that he should doe to Kings: of the and Henry two other sonnes of Hugues, were Dukes of Bourgoigne and after landing this overjoyne they advanced to Ecclesiastical dignities, the one Archbishop of Tholouse, the other of Rouan and the third died young. One of his daughters was married to the Duke of Normandy, the other to Frederick Duke of Metz. He had taken his second wife from England the daughter of King Edward, & sister to Queen Ogiva, the wife of Charles the Simple, mother to Lewis the fourth: and although he had no children by her, yet did he carefully preserve the friends of this alliance and before his death he choise a wife out of this great house, for Hugh his eldest daughter, the which was Adele the daughter of King Edward the first.

This he fortified his greatness by all means, the which raised his authority to the top of all Tholouse purchasing credit both within and without the Realme by all means, first to establish a great Family: These were the ordinary proceedings, his custom and policy, being the gift of God, and a branch of his jurisdiction in those things which he loved, leaving the wretched plunged in their wretchedness by their own indiscretion: so that fully prepared to wild and carefull men. But Hugues the great had another advantage, which furnished all these his great means, or the force of his friendships and alliances, having a sonne capable of judgement for great attempts, fit for the times, brought up, and instructed by himselfe. To conclude, all things were so disposed in France, as they must necessarily receive him for King: Necessity, the general consent both of great and small, and a means to preserve the Covenant from ruine, the which he alone could effect. But if the French were forward in seeking to him, Hugues was so much the more encouraged to embrace so great and famous a dignity. And in the execution of this generous designe, he carried himselfe with so great wisdom, moderation, and dexterity, as we may well say, than God called him, as it were from heaven. There remained nothing but an orderly proceeding to that which reason presented unto them.

Hugues began with the greatest, who had a speciall interest to preserve what they held. He treated mildly with them for the common necessity. The condition was, To leave them all that by inheritance, which they held of the Coronne; by title of office, and they to doe homage, and acknowledge him for their lawfull King. Thus was the accord made betwixt the Nobility of France, and Hugh Capet, profitable for gratitude, necessary for the people, honourable for Hugues, and beneficial for the Realme: for by this means the Realme was maintained in one body under the authority of one absolute Commander. Hugues was well furnished, having a sonne capable of the Realme which was hereditary. The better sort had what they could desire for them or theirs, and the people remained in peace after so many miseries. Things being thus disposed of all sides, the Parliament assembled at Noyon, whether they runne from all parts: and both necessity and desire to winne his favour (to whom reason should assigne the Realme) brought all the Cities, and made such haste thither as they fought to finish their private Estates by this publike authority. Hugh failes not likewise to call all his friends, to reape the fruit so long sought for, with so great paine and traile, both by himselfe and his father, and now to employ them as in a day of battell.

The Assemblies were great, by the concourse of all the Prouinces and Cities of the Realme, which repaired thither. It was the more famous, for that in shew the French of fued the Realme to Capet, as if he had not affected it. As things passe in this sort, Charles Duke of Loraine, well advertised of the Frenchmens intent, and the designs of Hugh, he bound up himselfe: and being resolved to employ all his Forces, he begins first by admonitions, but so ill seasoned, as it made the way more easie for Capet: for hee sends his Ambassadors to the Assembly of the States, not to intreat them to receive him into their hands, and fore the Crowne, according to his hereditary right; but to threaten them, that if they did not speedily obey, he would reduce them to subjection by force. The French men were incensed against Charles, and having placed their hopes in Hugh (being present and following for himselfe assisted with his best friends) fell into to great a rage against Charles, by his rough and importune speeches, as hardly could the law of Nations restrain them from doing him face affront unto his Ambassadors, for their indiscretion.

Then the Estates enact by a solemn decree, That for as much as Charles had invited himselfe a friend to the enemy of France, and a sworn enemy to the French, so likewise did the French pronounce his friendship, declaring him incapable of any benefit of the law, both

A both for that he gaue the first cause, as also not being bound to acknowledge him for King that is an enemy to the State, (their oath binding them to a King which is a father, iust, wife, milde, and temperate.) And therefore, betweene God and their consciences, without any alteration of the Fundamentall law, they renounce him; and declare that their intention is to choose a King which should prouide for the quiet of France.

They deliuer this declaration to Charles his Ambassadors, commanding them to auoid the Realme presently. Thus Charles his reiection, was the raising of Hugh Capet; for presently the generall Estates (assembled in one body, and representing all the Prouinces of the Realme) declare by an authentick and solemne decree, That being necessary to choose a King for the preservation of the Crowne of France, destitute as well by the death of Lewis the fifth, as by the apparent treachery of Charles Duke of Loraine, That in equity, according to God and their consciences, the Estates did choose Hugh Capet for King, promising to obey him, and his, as their lawfull King, according to the law of State. This is the ground of Hugh Capets royaltie. There was no need of any Preachers to perswade the people, nor to send to Rome for the Popes dispensation, as Pepin did. The people were fully perswaded in their mindes, and a fit occasion was offered, that without any iniurious change (as that was in the person of Chilperic) they might supply the place (being void) with a better King, and more profitable for the Common weale. This A& was made at Noyon, in the Month of May, in the year 987. And to giue more authority to this famous decree, the same Assembly goes to assist at the Coronation of Hugh, who was anointed and crowned King the third of Iuly, after his election.

Hugh Capet being thus chosen and crowned King, hee studied by all means to let the French vnderstand by the effects, that they had made a good choice, as the successe of his reigne, and of his posterities, will shew in the following discourses. From Rheims he went to Paris, well accompanied, where he makes his entry, to the great applause of all the people. He employs his first endeouours, to send them all home well satisfied, who had giuen him so notable a proofe of their affection. But euery one being returned to his house; behold Charles of Loraine reiecteth, assembles Forces, and with part of them begins to ouer-runne Champagne, doing all acts of hostility: and within few Moneths after, he himselfe comes to field with a great Army of Germanes, Loraines, and Bourguignons: and having taken Rheims at his first approach, he passed on towards Paris, as to the head or heart of the Estate, and enters into Picardy, where he seizeth on the townes of Soissons and Laon, all by the practices of Arnulph the bastard son of King Lothaire, and Archbishop of Rheims: a man both cunning and head-strong: from thence hee runnes euen to the Gates of Paris, filling all the Countrey with fire and feare.

Hugh sleeps not, but knowing how much it did import to possesse the people with a good conceit of him, and to stop the courses and spoiles of Charles, (who of purpose tormented the Parisiens, to breed some inuouation) hee gathereth together what troops he can, attending the rest which he had sent for, and with them hee goes presently to field: but it chanced that Charles (being farre stronger then Capet) did easily defeat him: so as hauing cut his troopes in pieces, he had almost surprised Hugh in the sight of Paris, where hee faued himselfe with much paine and danger. These beginnings did as much amaze the people (who had so cheerfully chosen Hugh) as it putt vp Charles, already a Conqueror, and a peacefull King in his owne conceit: who being retired to Laon in great triumph, sends new Letters to all the Prouinces of France, perswading them to acknowledge him for their lawfull King, vaunting of this happy beginning, as a gage of the felicity which did attend him in his reigne. But hee had not cast vp his accounts with him who holds the events of things in his hand, for the contrarie fell out to that hee had conceived.

Hugh is nothing dismayd at this first repulse, these summonings of Charles make him to vse all haste, and pricketh them forward with whom he had diuided the Realme, having a particular interest in his reigne, according to their election: All men fle vnto him: Charles (supposing that Hugh meant to yeeld, and that these Assemblies were made to haue the better conditions) had dispersed his Army about Laon, and retained the least part within the City: and with this assurance, that all necessities should abound, he had no care to make vse of his victory, when as suddenly Hugh appears with his army before Laon: and (hauing stoppt all the passages) he besiegeth it: all the Lorains small troops which were found dispersed in the villages thereabouts, were easily taken and disarmed, and the Citie was presently summoned to yeeld in the Kings name, and to deliuer vp Charles of Loraine, guilty of high treason, and enemy to the French, vpon paine of fire and sword.

Charles flies to entreaties and teares. The inhabitants complaining of him, as the cause of their misery, resolute (with the aduice of Anselme their Bishop) to obey Hugh Capet as their lawful King, and to deliuer Charles into his hands. The which they did with his wife and children. This happened in the year 991. and so the controuersie betwixt Hugh and Charles of Loraine for the Crowne, was decided in lesse then four years. Hugh being a Conqueror goes to Orleans, and leads Charles with him, where he past the remainder of his miserable daies, inflicting no greater punishment on him, then perpetual imprisonment, where he was well kept with his wife, vnto his dying day, in the which he had both sonnes and daughters. There are diuers opinions vpon this point. Some say they died all there: others say, that they reaped the State of Loraine, and transplanted their Race vnto the Princes that rule there at this present.

But howsoever, as the Romans had expelled the Gaules, and they themselves were afterwards driven out by diuers Nations: and the Race of Pharamond (which had dispossessed them) was displaced by Pepin: so Hugh Capet expelled that of Pepin, with a better title then Pepin, being lawfully called by them which had the right: and the presumptiue heyre was iustly degraded for his fault: so as no man can with reason say, That Hugh Capet was an usurper, seeing he had so solemn and lawfull a calling, by a decree of the generall Estates of the Realme, to whom the application of the foueraigne law belongs, as Nangius an ancient writer doth testifie. For what auails it the legitimacion of his Royalty, to say, that Hugh Capet came of the Race of Charlemagne by his mother Auoye, daughter to Osbo Duke of Saxony and Emperour. In this regard he could not be of Charlemagnes Race, (the which without doubt, failed in Lewis the fourth, the some of Arnould) neither would it auale him any thing to bee the sonne of a daughter of France, seeing the Distaffe may not lawfully succeed. This victory added an incredible reputation to Hugh Capets vertue, the which was without doubt in great extremity, and made him an easie way to purchase obedience in his new kingdom. He began by homage, as the seale of authority: to that end he calls all Dukes, Earles, Barons, Noblemen, and Gentlemen, to come and take the oath of allegiance. They runne of all hands, onely the Earle of Flanders (that Arnould which had bene the firebrand of those warres in Normandy) plays the mutine. Hugh hauing called him to doe homage, and nored his contumacy, goes to field with his Forces, to compell him thereunto. Hauing seized on the greatest part of his country, the Earle flies to humility, and by the mediation of Richard Duke of Normandy (whom he had so much wronged in his youth) makes his peace with Hugh, yeelding him the homage which he had denied, with promise to obey him.

Hauing thus fortified the authority of his Soueraigne command, he passed vnto the gouernment of the Realme, and to make this voluntary obedience (so well begun) more pleasing to his new subiects, he calls an Assembly of the chiefe of the Realme, and giues them all to vnderstand, that his desire was to haue their aduice, for the well gouerning of the State. Necessity spake, and his proceeding did winne the most violent. Hauing renewed their homages, he sets downe the order of the twelve Peeres of France, and protests vnto them all, that he will not doe any thing of importance either in peace or warre without their aduice. So as in yeelding he did aduance himselfe with a wife and victorious modesty. By the most ancient institution, the chiefe charge ouer armes belonged to the Maire of the Palace, to the which Martel added the authority of Duke of France. But these two great charges, gave a sufficient testimony, how much this great authority did import, to counter-balance and checke the foueraigne authority of Kings: and Hughes himselfe was both a witness and iudge of that which he had done in the execution of this charge, being in a manner royall. He therefore resolves to suppress it: and to bury it in an honourable tombe. He sees many competitors, and takes thereby an occasion to discouer his intent, declaring to the greatest of his Nobility, how happy hee was in his reigne, hauing the choice of so many persons worthy of this great dignity: but finding himselfe bound to all, he knew not to whom he was most indebted: and was so affected vnto them all, as he could not say to whom he wished best. And therefore to satisfie all his good friends, he had bethought himselfe of an expedient: That his sonne (whom nature ature had giuen him, and France had nourished and brought vp for her seruice) should bee the person, to content all his friends in the execution of this charge, which should bee with the title of a Royalty.

All the Noblemen (which would haue endured it of an other impatiently) embraced this speech willingly, the which presented all ieaousie, and cured the chiefe fore. So with one consent it was decreed, that Robert (sonne to Huge Capet, should bee his Lieutenant Generall, and to that end should be anointed, and crowned King: as he was at Rheims in the year 990. three yeares after his fathers election. A wise Prince, and of a tempered disposition, a well reasond plant for the fruitfull continuance of this latter reigne, of whom it is said, that he was a sonne without forwardnesse, a companion without ieaousie, and a King without ambition. So Hughes effected three things by this wife proceeding. Hee tooke away the breeding of future dangers, by restraining of so great a power: hee suppressed all ieaousie, and assured his owne estate in the person of his sonne.

But in burying thus honorably the name and apparent shew of this dignity, hee confirmed another, to reape the same fruit: it is a resolute maxime, that in a Royalty, the first mouer of an Estate, must be fortified with some neere instruments, with whom hee may communicate some beames of his authority, to impart them to other inferior motions, according to their order. The Constable in old time, had no command but ouer the horse, either as great Master, or as Generall vnder the charge of the Maior, as the name doth signifie: Hugh amplified this dignity, and in suppressing the name of Mayre, he gaue that authority to the other, for the which the Mayrality had bene in old time instituted, refering the fruit, and preferuing France both from danger and feare of so great power, which might aduance the seruant aboue the Master: yet this authority of Constable is very great, foueraigne ouer Armes, vnder the Kings good pleasure, to command the men of warre, to take knowledge of their faults, and either to punish, or to pardon offences at his pleasure, to order batells, to dispose of all things that concerne the souldier: and finally he keepes the Kings sword, for which the Constable doth him homage. Moreover vnder this dignity Hugh appointed Marshalls to execute the Constables commands, as chiefe hands, and so by these two goodly institutions, the charge ouer armes continued in great credit, vnder the great light of the Royall Maiesty. Hee likewise fortified by new decrees the Royall homages of Ban and Arrierban, instituted by Charlemagne: and to conclude, he made all those military orders, wherein France surpasseth all other nations, to be reduced to their ancient institution and right vse. And as good lawes spring from bad manners, so Hugh (hauing carefully observed the errors of former Reignes) endeuoured to redresse them, and to prevent the like inconueniences. The most dangerous errour had bene the multiplicity of many foueraigne Masters, one King being sufficient for a whole Realme, as one Sunne is for all the world. Hee therefore decrees, that hereafter the title of King should not be giuen but to the eldest, who should haue soueraign power, and command ouer his brethren, and they should respect him as their Lord and father, hauing no portions but his good fauour, as for the lands which their elder should assigne vnto them for their portions, they should hold them of the Crowne, to doe homage, and to be augmented and diminished as the Kings good pleasure. The aduancements of Kings bastards had much interested the State, hauing bene allowed and apportioned with the lawfull children, yea euén raised the Royall throne, as wee haue seene. Therefore Hugh decreed, That hereafter bastards should not onely be reiectied from the Crowne, but also from the same name of France, the which was before allowed them. To him likewise are due the goodly ordinance of Iustice, and of the treasure, wherein without doubt France excels, so as they be well executed, according to the institutions of that golden age. Thus by these wife decrees, he prevailed more then all the Armies of his Predecessors, in preferring a great Monarchy vnto this day: supported with these goodly lawes and ordinances, whereto (without flattering the truth) we may see by the effects that which the most learned Academie doth represent but in discourse, touching the true and perfect pattern of a well gouerned State, vnder the fatherly authority of a King, reuerenced by the hereditary Law of his Race, with the free consent of the people, confirmed by the Estates, counter-balanced by the authority Royall, determined by the liberty of those which owe him voluntary obedience. The continuance of ciuill warres had bred such disorders in all parts of the Realme, as it was not without cause, if men (which liued in these miseries)

993 said that God hath sent Hugh to restore the French Monarchy, and they aouoh predictions, and Prophecies of this reign, as Oracles. Doubtlesse this maske of building, was too huge to continue long against so great a Storme. God made vse of it for a time, as he had willy decreed, that is to say, to deliuer the West from the blasphemies and furies of Mahomet, and there to preferre his Church. But it was necessary this power should be limited within his bounds, to the end it might be well gouerned, and in the end, giue some rest vnto Christendome. This happened in his reign, as if the building had then taken a firme and sure foundation.

Warre had reigned so long, and ruined the poore subiects to enrich men of warre, who being seized of the strongest places, had without doubt deuoured one another, and ruined the Realme, if a greater authority had not shewed it selfe to maintaine euery one in peace vnder the reuerence of the Lawes, in the bosome of one common Country. This confused warlike season, had more need of a wife man to saue what was gotten, then of a valiant man and active to make new conquests. Such was Hugh Capet, a wife Prince, aduised, experienced, resolute, neither dull, nor a coward, (as hee made proofe in the beginning of his reigne against the rebels.) And whereas he parted with the Crowne-lands so casily, to such as were seized thereon, seeming thereby to haue blemished the greatnesse of his State, it was like vnto one which had much land lying waste, and had let it to farmers at an easie rent, yet remaining alwaies master thereof, with power to leaze it againe at his pleasure: else all had bene lost for want of good husbandry, in so great and confused an abundance: for Hugh Capet leauing to the possessors that which hee could not take from them, assured the Crowne-lands by certaine homages, and preserved the Royall authority throughout the Realme. And that which was profitable and necessary for the State, proued the most easie, for the gouernours of the Prouinces and strong places, hoping to hold that which they had in hand, desired rather to obey a King with any title available to them and theirs, then to play the petty Kings at their pleasures, and command absolutely alone for a while, and ouer few, and be in danger to lose all as vsurpers. A notable proofe of the Frenchmens humors, borne to obey a King, and not able to subsist but vnder a Royalty. The French had no lesse power then the Germans, to make an electiue Common-weale, as they had done, but their humour sorted with an hereditary Royalty, without the which they could not subsist. Thus Hugh Capet had sedled his reigne with so great wisdom & authority, and was so fortunate in the successe, as we may iustly say, he restored the Realme of France, when it was almost ruined: he reigned 9. yeares, 4. alone, and 5. with his son Robert, in great peace, beloved and honored of all men. France (as after a long and tedious winter) puts on the new face of a pleasant spring. All men honoured him, as the meanes of their assured rest. His most viual re- treat was to Paris, the which was greatly augmented and beautified in his reigne, whereas other Kings before him remained in diuers places, at Aix la Chapelle, Campaigne, Laon, Soissons and elsewhere, according to occurrents and their humors.

We haue said, that Arnulphe, bastard to Lothaire, was the onely man which had fauoured the Cities of Loraine against Hugh Capet. The History notes this man to be peruerse, and disloyall, hauing deceiued both Charles of Loraine, and Hugh Capet, who had giuen him the Archbishopspeake of Rouan, in recompence of the seruice he promised him against Charles, to whom notwithstanding (contrary to his faith) hee gaue means to seize vpon the Cities of Rheims, Laon, and Soissons. Hugh taking this presumption for a preiudice to come, learning by what had passed, how much the name of a bastard of France might import, for a colour to diquie the State, and what danger there was of trouble, in the beginning of his new reigne, not yet well seled, he therefore resolues to suppress Arnulphe: but respecting his quality, he assembled a nationall Councell of the French Church, in the City of Rheims. This Assembly deposeth Arnulphe, as guilty of treason, and a trouble of the publique quiet, and they substitute Gilbert in his place, who had bene Schoolemaister vnto Robert.

Afterwards Hugh confines him to Orleans with Charles, there to end his daies in rest. Pope Iohn the 12. very ill satisfied with Hugh, for that hee had not appealed to him for his confirmation in this new Royalty, disanuls this decree of the Councel at Rheims, excommunicates the Bishops which had assisted Arnulphe, and deprives Gibbert from the Archbishopricke of Rouan : and to temper this sharpe and rough proceeding,

Here began the great iarrs and contentions betwix the Emperours and the Pope: The ancient custom of the Catholike Church, gaue the Pope Consecration thereof, and the first Christian Emperour, was, That the Emperour should be crowned by the Pope, and the Pope even of the Bishop of Rome. The Popes would not allow the Emperours should beight this, and rogative, but therein the time that Boniface the 8. took upon him the same, he shewes minence of Vniuersall Bishop: & he was chosen without licence from the Emperours & held the Pontificall See by vniuersall multitude, and did lead a different life, and of dilect of many: for the redre whereof, the Emperours did come to Rome, and upon complaints, (having laboured to reclaime this right to his duty, which hee found corrigible) in the end he calls a Councell within Rome, whereby a decree of this kind ably 1086 the 12. was depofed, and Les. 8. substituted in his place. But the Emperours scarce going out of Rome, when as he had a new fustion: & Les. 8. being chosen by force, is expelled by disorder, and Benedict the 4. restored in his place. & he becomes and reuoketh Les. who upon this occasion made a decree. That in executing the rule of discipline, which giues the election to the people and Clergie, the Pope is to Hee was brought in after so strange a manner, as I haue horror to reade Platina, who saies, it was by diuellish arts. But the wise reader may view the rest of this troubleome report in the author himselfe, altogether vnreprocheable, being a confident seruant to the Popes: and so may ease vs of this tedious toyle. Such was the Empire and the Sea of Rome, amidst these horrible confusions, whilest that our Cape laboured to repaire the breaches of this new Kingdome. Hauiug reigned peaceably nine yeares, he died the 22. of November in the yeare 996. Leaving his sonne Robert, not onely succellor to the Crowne, but also of his vertues, his happinesse, and his credit, in the deuour loue of the French. He had him by Adela, the daughter of Edward King of England, in whom hee was so happy, as not onely to see him of age, but also crowned King, and well married. He reigned both alone and accompanied with his son beloued and honoured of him and his subjects, it ouer father and Prince were. A patterne of a great States-man, comming to the last fit of a desperate disease, whereunto he applied such seasonable remedies, as hee might well bee called the Restorer of the French Monarchie. But from him we must ascend vnto God, the true Guardian of this Estate, meaning to preferre it by his care & wisdom, who governs changes by his wise prouidence, and giues vertues and successe at his pleasure.

ned unto. If it were, that the bounds of this Monarchy should not be so large, as under Charlesagne, you were limited: and although it seems that Hugh Capet (in yielding the property of the Crowne to the Governours of places) did diminish it: yet in effect he did augment it, in assuring the Crowne by his good husbandry, being extraordinary, yet very common in such extreme necessity, and since all that which seemed to be dismembered, is returned whence it came. Wee must therefore set before our eyes, all this great Monarchy, imparted to diuers Lords, and the Royall authority ouer all, as the head ouer the whole body, which hath diuers members, giuing life and force to every part, to exercise his proper function: we shall see in order (as things have fallen out) the greatest part of those Provinces which were made hereditarie by this contention of Capets, returne to the Crowne againe. The which I will labour to effect, so long as the light shall guide me in the diuersity of these changes.

Wee shall now enter into a more temperate reigne then the two former. Wee shall not see so many Armies in field, so many victories, nor so many conquests; neither shall we see so many audacious and infamous outrages, so many murders and parricides, so many unnatural cruelties of children against the father, of brethren against brethren, of husbands against their wives, and of wives against their husbands: we may well note and observe diseases, but neither so dangerous nor so tedious, as haue bene played on the theatres of horrible tragedies in former reignes. Doubtlesse as the body and minde haue their proper diseases, so hath the estate of mankind: Man cannot bee alwaies found, both waies pleasant: his body and minde haue their passions in their seasons, according to the degrees which God hath preferred them by the course of Nature. Likewise the changes are remarkable in all this Monarchy: but this reigne iudiciously considered, we may admire the notable proofes of Gods providence, who would fortifie this Estate, for the preferation of his Church in Europe, whereof France is a notable member, and doth import much to all other Nations. The History therefore of this third reigne is most worthy of memory: for the vie whereof we may observe three famous parts, to helpe the iudgement and memory. The first from Hugh Capet to Philip of Valois: where began the controuersie of the English against the French, long and lamentable for the pretension to the Crowne of France. The second from that reigne, to Henry the third, and last King of that branch of Valois. The third begins at Henry the 4. the first of the most noble Race of Bourbon. This Inventory shall faithfully and briefly quote the particularities of these last reignes, to send the Reader to the whole History, to the which we leave him.

ROBERT alone of that name, The 37. King of France.

The Reigne of Robert long and happy.

Hugh, a Bastard Son of Robert, by Bertha, Robert's 2<sup>d</sup> wife, was the issue of the King's 3<sup>d</sup> marriage, with Constance, who suffered her own son against Henry.

Robert prefers Henry his yonger son to the Crown before the elder.
Robert dies.
His disposition.

ROBERT began to reigne alone in the year 996 and reigned 37 years. He had three sonnes, Hugh, Robert, and Henry, by his wife Constance, the daughter of William Earle of Aides. Following the example of his father Hugh, he desired to assure the Crowne in his house, installing his heire in the right purchased to him and his, by a decree of the States. So he crowned Hugh his eldest sonne at Compaigne, in the year 1028. But after the death of Robert, he continued in the same designe, to assure his estate in his house: and observing a more Royall disposition in the younger, then in the elder, he preferred verue before the prerogative of elderhip: causing Henry the younger to be crowned in his life time: decreeing by his will, that Robert should content himselfe with the Duchy of Bourgonne, doing homage for it to the Crowne of France.

So having happily disposed of his affaires, and reigned with the generall content of his subjects, he dyed in the year 1031. being threescore yeares old. A Prince very fit for the time, being wise, resolute, peaceable, and continent. But Piety was the Crowne of all his vertues, and the knowledge of Diuinity seasoned with learning, one of the flowers of this goodly Crowne: for hee is commended to haue bene very deuout, and to haue loued both Diuinity and Humanity. They sing hymnes of his inuention, and namely, that which is to the honour of holy Martyrs, which begins, O constantia Martyrum mirabili, the which bearing resemblance with the name of his wife Constance, he was wonderfully pleased with the humor she had to be honoured with his writings, being then greatly esteemed throughout the world.

Wife Kings and of long life happy for an Estate.

There is nothing more dangerous in an Estate then the change of diuers Masters: as experience hath taught in former reignes. So God, who meant to confirme the Monarchy in this Race, gaue a long and a happy life to their first Kings, issued from Capet, without any sudden change from reigne to reigne. For Robert reigned 37 yeares: Henry his sonne as much, Philip his sonne 49 yeares, Lewis the seuenth 44. Lewis the ninth called Saint Lewis as much. All wife Princes, moderate, valiant, peaceable and happy. As good houses are settled, euen so Kingdomes are confirmed. As when one good husband succeeds another, adding wealth to wealth, new, vpon old, houses then grow great: euen so the long life of these good and wife Princes, was continued with much happy successe, as we shall see in euery reigne.

Robert main-taines his Key-all authority.

This in particular is remarkable in the reigne of Robert. We haue said, the Realme was diuided, as it were to many Masters. As there is small respect amongst equals, who seeth not what should haue succeeded betwixt so many great Lords being equals, and especial- ly in France. But Robert did so firmly gouerne the tickne of this great bark in the midst of the tempestuous Seas of French humors, as he controuled all such as sought to free themselves from the Crowne: whose authority by this meanes was great, by the obedience which he forced all them to yeld that would play the mutines. Hee entertained the amity his father had with Richard D. of Normandy, confirmed by alliance, and for that there was it house betwixt him & Otho Earle of Chartres, he could wisely make his profit of them both. In the beginning of his reigne one Gautier Gouernour of Melun sold the place to the Earle of Chartres about named, according to the manner of confused times. At the complaint of Bouchard (to whom the Towne belonged,) the King commanded Otho to restore it vnto him, who refused to obey. Robert lets the Normand against him, who handles him in such sort, as in the end the Earle humbles himselfe vnto the King, and deliuer vp both the place, and merchant, who was hanged.

He suppresseth
the seditious.

Henry brother to Hugh Capet was Duke of Bourgonne, by the decease of his brother Otho. Henry then died, and so Bourgonne returned to the Crowne. But passion perswading Landry Earle of Neuers to make a benefit of his right of neighbour-hood, and time inuiting him to embrace this occasion to fish in a troubled water, hee seized on Auxerre by intelligence. But he was deceived, to thinke this a time wherein all things were law- full:

A full: for Robert goes presently to field with his army, and besiegeth Auxerre; wherth this ill-advised Landry was: but the Inhabitants open their gates to the King, and deliuer Landry into his hands. All the Auxerrois obey, except Aaulon, which after a few daies yeelds, and in the end all Bourgonne. Landry guilty of treason, suffers an easie punishment for his rashnesse. Confessing his fault, he obtains pardon of Robert, promising obedience.

Thus Robert being Master of Bourgonne, he giues it to Robert his eldest sonne. But Robert doubly interessed (his yonger being preferred, and he hauing a very small part in the State) was not pleased with this portion. Bourgonne was then distinguished into a Duchie and County, whereof the County belonged to the Empire, and the Duchie to the Realme, according to the diuision made by the Children of Lewis the Gentle. At that time Henry the second Duke of Bauaria, furnished the holy, held the Empire. Lorraine was the ordinary cause of debate betwixt France and Germany. Robert (to end this controuersie) meets with Henry at a place called Enol, vpon the riuer of Cher, and made an accord with him, the which continues to this day. At that time Giselbert brother to the Earle of Ardenne held Lorraine.

Agreement

perour for Robert reconciles the Duke of Normandy and the Earle of Chartres.

Hereupon the hatred betwixt the Duke of Normandy and the Earle of Chartres kindled in such fort (by the yeelding vp of Melun) as they assembled their friends on all sides. The Normand calls his farthest friends to his succors, Logman King of Sueden & Olave King of Norway his kinsmen. But Robert pacified this quarrell in time, by his wisdom, shewing by the effect, how much authority employed in time may preuaile, and that wee must speedily quench a small fire, the which neglected burnes a whole forest. There were great personages in all provinces with hereditary power, according to the grant made by Hugh Capet. In Normandy Richard the third, in Aniou Ieffrey Grise-gondie, in Guicenne William, of the race of Pepin sonne of Lewis the Gentle, in Languedoc Cont Mahen, in Champagne and Touraine Odo, all great and valiant men, with other worthy personages throughout the Realme: all which were rash men and of high attempts, but the name and Royall authority of Robert, contained all these great and courageous spirits within the bounds of their duty and publike respect. And so this reigne passed quietly without any great tumults. Leaving a lesson for Princes, to ioyne widome with authority, and valour with mildnesse: it being as great a conquest to perserue his owne, as to get another mans, and to vanquish mens minds by reason as by force. A pattern in these two reignes, of the meanes to restore an Estate, dismembred by the disorders of ciuill warres.

reigne.

HENRY THE FIRST; The 38. King of France.

HENRY being in possession of the Realme during the life of his father, succeeded him in the year 1031, and reigned 37 yeares. He had two sons, Philip and Hugh, by Anne the daughter of Georgius or Gautier the Sclaun King of the Russians, and one daughter, the which was married to Robert Duke of Normandy, son to the Richard of whom we haue discoursed.

The beginning of his reigne was rough and vnquiet, and the end more mild and successful. But Henry in the perseruation of this Estate, did nothing degenerate from the wisdom and dexterity of his fathers. The cause of this hard entry was the brothers portion, apparently vnquell and preiudicial, although a wild father had so decreed it. Queen Constance, mother to these two Princes, was brought up in the house of Robert, and was very much affected to him, and so she nourished this dislike, supporting Robert against Henry, that is to say, the elder against the yonger, as oftentimes mothers haue the like humors, to ioyne one more then another. The cause was plausible, that it was against the law, vnto and customs of France, that the yonger should be preferred before the elder in Royalty. The parties were great, for Robert was the mother to the King, William Earle of Flanders and Odo Earle of Champagne were bulwarks for the King, the Royall Majesty, the will of his father, the Forest of the Realme, and amongst all, the power of Robert D. of Normandy. The armies approached to fight, when as behold Robert (for whose interest the question was) being a Prince of mild milde and quiet disposition, giues his mother and friends (who had brought Forces to his aide) to understand, that he would not be the cause to shed Frenchmens blood: and that Bourgongne should suffice him, seeing his father had so decreed. Vpon this declaration of Robert, Queene Constance changeth her minde, and sends backe her troopes, embracing peace with her children. The armies were dismissed, and an agreement ratified betwixt Henry and Robert, who liued like bretheren and good friends: That Bourgongne should remaine to Robert and his successors, with the title of a fealty to France, (which they call Peere) and to bee Deane among the Peeres. Thus Robert of France enioyed Bourgongne, and left it hereditary to his heires successiue, vntill the reigne of Iohn, in the year 1360.

But the Countries of Bourgongne and Normandy were the cause of much trouble in those times, during the which he kept the stakes, not onely as a spectator, but as an usurper. This Odo Earle of Champagne (who had incensed his brother against him) lookt for a good part in Bourgongne, and had already won Robert to promise him the towne of Sens, who euen vpon the accord making had seized thereon: but being easily expelled by the Kings authority, he runnes another course, to lose both himselfe and what hee had, supposing to vsurpe another mans estate.

He held vnder the Crowne, Champagne, Touraine and the County of Chartres. He had two sons, Stephen and Thibault: yet he sought to ioyne Bourgongne to his other Estates, which was the cause of great trouble. We haue before made mention of Besou the husband of Hermingrade, daughter to Lewis the sonne of Lewis the Gentle, who had the Realme of Bourgongne and Italy. He had two sonnes, Ralph and Lewis. Lewis was overthrowne by Beranger Duke of Friul, who easily seized on that which remaine in Italy, and of Prouence, as lying nere, and of easie access. Ralph had the rest of Bourgongne, the County, Sauiy, & Dauphine for the Duchy of Bourgongne remained to the Crown of France. From this Ralph, sprung Lewis, and from Lewis another Ralph, who liued during the reigne of Henry, being old, without children, and disobeyed his subiects.

He had two sisters, the one married to Conrade furnished the Salique, Duke of Francoyny, who was Emperor: and another to the Earle of Champagne, father to this Odo, who seeks to perswade Ralph his vncl to make him his heire, as sonne to his eldest sister: and employes the fauour of many subiects, who desired rather a neighbor then a stranger to be their Princes. But Ralph preferred Conrade before Odo, and leaues him his testament, his Crowne, and Scepter, instituting Henry his son, and his Nephew, his heire Generall. Conrade made war in Hungary. Odo imbraceth this occasion, and (seeing him thus busied) he enters into Bourgongne, where he takes certaine Cities: the rest hold at Conrades deuotion, being called to the inheritance: but these designs were soone cut off. For behold the Emperour Conrade returnes with a goodly and victorious army, who not onely recouers againe the Cities of Bourgongne that were lost, but also takes some in Champagne, so as Odo doth with great difficulty hold Troies: he is forced to seek for humble protection to his vncl, who giues him his owne, and forbids him to take from another. Thus Odo being thus suppressed, Conrade parles with King Henry, and ratifies the former accords, for the stilling of Bourgongne, whereof we haue spoken.

From that time, the German Emperours challenged the right and aide of the Realme of Arles, which the Emperour Charles the 1. shall alienate, and shall be soe divided into sundry principalities, as we shall shew in their places. Thus the Realme of Bourgongne had an end in the posterity of Besou, the Emperour Conrade being forced to goe into Italy, after these treaties, to redresse the confusions which grew daily. Behold, Odo returns the war more furiously then before, and enters Lorraine with a strong army, but his enterprize fall vpon his owne head. For Gothelon D. of Loraine (confirmed by the Emperour) defeat him, burying his ambition and life in one graue, and thus much for Bourgongne: since on Normandy haue no lesse cause of imbecillity. Robert Duke of Normandy had maintained the hereditary ioye of his father with the King, as well as vpon his friend. After having reioined a long & dangerous voyage to the Holy Land, he instructed him to affect the protection of William his bastard son, whom he had made his heire, excluding his lawful children. This testament seemed vnto Odo to be all in vain, but Robert had sealed his Estate before his departure, applying him good Generall, and putting the strong castles, and treasure into their hands: so as William remained Duke after his death,

A which happened in this long voyage beyond the Seas. But this was not without great difficulties, in which Henry kept the stakes, ballancing both parties with his authority. William remaining the stronger, Normandy had some rest, being freed from men of war by this occurrent. A gallant toope of warriors, weary to liue at home, and desirous to see the world, led by Robert and Guischard valiant Gentlemen, seeking their fortunes, came into Italy: where they are employed in priuate quarrels, and there get so great reputation, as by their example, they drew many to the same voyage: and another notable swarme of braue souldiers are led thither by Tancred, a man very famous for this attempt, the partialities of Italy giue them occasions and means to seize vpon Pouille, Calabria, B and Sicilia, as the History describes at large. This briefly may suffice to note the Estate of this reigne. Thus Henry passeth his reigne amidst these troubles, being too light to shake the body of an Estate, following the example of his Grandfather and Father, hee caught Philip his sonne to bee crowned King, being but seuen yeares old: and gaue him Baldwin Earle of Flanders for Tutor and Regent of the Realme. He liued little after his Coronation, the which hee hastened by reason of his indisposition, and so hee died five and fifty yeares old, in the year 1061. Beloued and lamented of all his subiects, whom hee intreateth with much mildnesse some yeares before his death: the beginning of his reigne being disquieted with the feare of ciuill dissention, and the end crowned with a plentiful rest.

Happy successe of the Normans in Italy.

PHILIP THE FIRST, The 39. King of France.

According to King Henries decree, Baldwin Earle of Flanders, took vpon him the government of young King Philip person, (already confirmed by his coronation,) and of the affaires of the Realme with quietnesse: hauing the reputation of a good and wise man, although he were not pleasing to them all. For certaine Noblemen of Gascony did crosse him, charging him with ambition, as if he would make himselfe a King, like to other Regents, whereof the memory was yet fresh in all Frenchmens minds. But his integrity and wisdom (preseruing his credit with the greatest part of the French) gaue him means to subdue the rebellious Gascons, who made this great pretence, to fish in a troubled streame, during the minority of the young King.

Baldwin doth not winke at this repulse, neither doth he suffer it to passe vnpunished, he armes wisely, with a shew to goe against the Sarazins, which sometimes did ouer-run the frontiers of France, bordering vpon Spaine. This zeale hauing moued many to accompany him, he punished the rebels in Gascony, & preuented many which began to mutine in sundry places of the Realme, as shall appear in the future reignes. It is the ordinary ebbing and flowing of worldly things, in the impatience of the French, neuer to liue long in one state. We haue now passed 70. yeares in peace, in these three reignes: this Prince shall adde 49. more of great tranquillity to this Realme. But setting before our eyes the horrible confusions in other parts, it doth shew vs plainly the occasions, whereby the disease grew in the State, which in the end bred so long and dangerous a fever by ciuill warre. For why doth a History represent vnto vs the effect knowne vnto all men, if it touch not the causes and motives of these great euents, the which succeed not presently, but by degrees, as a clock which caried by contrary motions strikes the houre at the time appointed amongst all the minutes. This iudgement is necessary for the right vse of what we read. The Kings minority passed quietly by the wise government of Baldwin, who accompanying his pupil to the age of 15. yeares, leaues him his temporall Realm in peace, and seeks an eternal Crowne in heauen: greatly lamented of the good, and leaues a memorable example of a good Tutor to a King, & a wife Regent of a Realme. Philip takes in hand the helme of the Estate, beholding from a safe harbour the stormes of other nations, which exceed in pernicious furies, not forcing that his example giues liberties to his subiects to the like disorder.

Baldwin Regent in Philip's minority.

Baldwin punished the rebels of Gascony.

Baldwin dies much lamented.

The disposition of Philip.

A wife Prince, but disloyall, taking couetousnesse and ambition for his Councellours, seeking only his owne profit and contemning that plaine simplicitie; which had purchased so much happinesse to his father and grand-fathers, and to himselfe a respectue credit with all the French, and immortal praise to his posterity. A looking glasse for Kings and Princes without any deceit, wherein they may view the true causes of the happinesse of Estates, Flanders, England and Italy, began first before that France entred, who shall ad a long and tedious part vpon this stage. Baldwin of whom we haue made mention, left two sonnes, Baldwin and Robert, with their mother Richilde. Their vnele Robert the Frison, pretended the inheritance to belong vnto him: or at the least the guardianship of his Nephewes. Richilde and the States opposed to both his demands, so as they grew to words, and then to war. King Philip (as their Soueraigne) ought to be Iudge to compound their quarrels, but he labors to kindle them, seeking his owne profit in these garboiles. Robert the Frison procures him with promises to do what he pleased. He winnes him and gets a promise to be succoured against the right of his Nephewes. But Richilde mother to these pupils, knowing the Kings humor goes vnto him to crosse Robert designs, who brought nothing but words. This woman brought money with her good behaviour, and wonne him against Robert, who discontent with the King, assembles his other meanes, goes to field with his Army, and gets part of the Country: Richilde flies to Philip, who comes himselfe with a very great Army, and enters Flanders. His meaning was to make a benefite of their comon quarrell. But it fell out otherwise, by his prouidence who doth pull downe one and raise vp another, alwayes iustly, although the causes be vknown vnto vs. Robert defeats the King and his Nephewes. After this victory he is receiued Earle of Flanders without any discontent of the King for the distressed pupils: who relying no more on him, fled for succor to Thierry Bishop of Liege, who makes an accord: That Robert the Frison should haue the Earldome of Flanders, and giue his Nephewes some recompence. After this peaceable possession of the Earldome of Flanders, Philip became a dear friend to Robert, forgetting the good offices he had receiued from his tutor, measuring friendship by profit. Such was then the State of Flanders. England had a greater change, we haue said that Robert D. of Normandy had infatuated William his bastard sonne his wife, and that he had gotten possession of the Duchy, but behold a greater happinesse awaits him. Edward King of England hauing receiued much kindnesse from him, and knowing him fit for the government of the Realme, names him his heire by his testament, by vertue whereof (notwithstanding all the policy and force, that Harould, brother to the Queene could vfe) William is receiued King of England, and crowned in a solemne Assembly of the English, homage is done vnto him as to their lawfull Lord: and this great dignity continued in his posterity. Philip sees this new increase of power impatiently, yet can he not prevent it, for God hath prepared it as a rod to correct this Realme, by the three sons which William left to succeed in his Estates, Robert, William, and Henry. Ambition is the leuaine of these warres, it shewed it selfe soone after the birth of this new power growne to the Dukes of Normandy, (whose first breeding we haue seene in the second Race) by the increase of the Realme of England.

Robert and Henry the sonnes of William, come to the King at Constans vpon Oise. As they play at Chess with Lewis the son of King Philip, there fell some contention among these yong Princes, and from iniurious words they fell to blowes: Lewis called Henry the sonne of a bastard, Henry strucke at him with the Chess-board, and had slaine him, if Robert had not stayed him. This blow being giuen, Robert and Henry made all haste to take themselves in Normandy: where they incensed both heauen and earth with their complaints. From this light beginning, grew all the troubles which disquieted these two Estates during foure hundred yeares, vpon diuers occasions. Robert and Henry being escaped, the fathers so imbrace the quarrell for their children, as they fall to Armes. Philip goes to the field, and takes Vernon depending of Normandy. Robert goes out of Normandy and doth seize vpon Beauuons. King William parts from England, and lands in France, with a great and mighty power, and invades Xaintonge and Poitou. Behold the first checke of a dangerous game. Philip moued with these lesseis, enters into Normandy with a great and mighty army: but he cures not one wound in making of another. William on the other side, ouer-runnes and spoyle all the Country, euen vnto the gates of Paris, where hee entred not then, but his posterity did after him. after, but the quarrell suruiued in his children, who augmented this hereditary hatred in many years.

While they began to weare this web, Italy was in no better estate, being full of horrible contentions, and the cause was so much the more lamentable for that the mischief came from them, from whom all good was to be expected. We haue formerly spoken of the diuisions growne betwixt the Emperours and the Popes of Rome; for their preheminent. In all ancient times the Popes were subject and to be summoned before the Emperour, who had authority to create them, and to depose them that were vnworthy of their charges: to call Synodes, and to confirme all things which concerned the outward government of the Church. The Pope on the other side maintaines that all his authority was his, as vniuersall Bishop, hauing power to binde and loose, and to iudge of all men, and all causes, as the Soueraigne Iudge of the Church, not so to be iudged by any man: and so to dispose absolutely of all matters, as well Ecclesiasticall as Ciuill, as Monarch in the Church, not onely armed with power of excommunication to damne rebels, and authority to remit sinnes: but hauing also the temporall sword, with soueraine authority ouer Emperours, Kings and Princes of the earth, to place, and displace, and to dispose of their estates.

Contentions in Italy betwixt
the Emperour
and Popes.The Popes disputation.

Hereafter we shall haue in every reigne, some memorablen example of this soueraigne authority. This reigne giues a very notable one. After the death of the Emperour Conrad, called Salique, Henry the third of that name, (hauing happily gouerned the Empire) left it to his son Henry the fourth yet very yong, so as the Popes during this weaknesse of the Empire, had meanes to fortifie themselves: and so embracing this occasion, Gregory the seventh called Hadabrand, did prohibite the Emperour all authority ouer the Clergy, and forbade (vpon paine of excommunication) to haue any recourse vnto him for the collation of Benefices, or for any thing else that depended on the Church. Henry moued with so great an affront, lets Gregory vnderstand, that this his decree was contrary to the ancient orders, and the vfe of the Catholike Church. Vpon this refusal, he lets him know, that he will maintaine the rights of the Empire, and complains to the Clergie of Rome in an open assembly. Gregory calls another, wherein he doth excommunicate Henry and all his adherents, and sends forth his Bull in all parts, whereby he declares him excommunicate and degraded of the Empire, and in his place cauleth Rodolphe Duke of Saxonia to be chosen Emperour.

Strange confusions betwixt
and the Pope.

Thus there grows two factions in Italy, and in Germany, one for the Emperour, and the other for the Pope: behold two armies leauied of these factions, ready to shed Christians blood: nine battells were giuen vpon the quarrell of these preheminentes. In the end, Rodolphe the new Emperour is taken and slaine by Godfrey of Bouillon, who followe the Emperour Henry the fourth, who after this victory, assembled a great Councell at Bresse, whereas Gregory the seventh is excommunicated, and Clement Bishop of Rauenness appointed to succeed him, they conduct him to Rome with an Army, and take the City after a long siege, whereas the new Pope is solemnly installed, and Henry the fourth Emperour restored by the decree of Clement. But this was not all, those which were opposite to the Emperour, chose in this place of Gregory, Vrbane the second, and their party growing strong, the confusions increased, opposing one Emperour against another, Herman of Luxembourg to Henry, and after him Egbert Marquis of Saxony, the which were taken by Henry, and slaine one after another. Vrbane hath other practices against Henry, hee animates his owne sonne by his first wife, forcing all the lawes of Nature. And as Henry had suppressed the practices of this his eldest sonne, Paschal who succeeded Vrbane the second, succedes him euen in the like monstrous practices, incensing his other sonne Henry, whom the father intended to make Emperour, relying on him as his childe, beloued aboue all the rest. So this sonne (bewitched by ill counsel) found meanes to seize on his father, depriving him first of the Empire, and then of his life. The Pope added to this death a new disgrace, causing by his thundering Bulls, the body of Henry to be digged out of his grave. These were the fruits of their serious controwersies for preheminent, not onely vknown to the ancient Church, nor practised by the Apostles, but expressly forbidden by the holy mouth of the Song of God.

Philip, so had Henry the fourth, being a prisoner to his son, but the respect of his common friends, made him to keep the stakes and to be a spectator of these lamentable confusions. And yet many orders were erected by the Pope, amidst these disorders, that of the regular Chanoines, for a difference of the secular; the Chartreux, Templers, Benedictines, and Carmelites. Thus Philip a witness of others miseries, reigned peaceably during this age full of confusion, both in Church and State.

The beginning of the States of Dauphine, Savoy, Provence, and France Centre.

The Emperor had reduced the Realme of Bourgogne to the Imperial jurisdiction, distinguishing as we have said: but during these disorders, the whole body was consumed, bred, and reduced to another forme; as when once a weary of an old garment. The industry of such as held the Cities and Country in their possession, made foure peeces of this garment. The one was for Otho of Flanders, which is the Country about Heslens, with the title of an Earldome; whereof it carries yet the name. The other for Frederick of Saxony, who enjoyed Sauiy. The third for Guigne the son, Earle of Grifaudin, who from little, grew to great in the confusions of times; having taken the chiefe Townes of the Country, and in the end Grenoble the capitall City, as he became absolute Lord of all that Prouince: the which he called Dauphine, in favour of his Sonne, who having married the daughter of the Earle of Albion and Viennois, named Dauphine, we carry the same name, holding himselfe honoured by so worthy an alliance. The fourth pece is Provence, one of the goodliest and richest, both for the fertility of the Country and commodity of Ports, most convenient in all the Mediterranean Sea: this was fallen into the hands of Berenger successors, by the means before specified.

So the Empire lost the command of these foure Prouinces, which fell to the foure diuers Lord, leaving yet in Dauphine some traces of the ancient name, without any effect, for they yet call it the Empire in their common language, as we have said elsewhere.

Voyage to the Holy Land.

But as during the reign of our Philip these confusions were notable; so that great and renowned voyage to the Holy Land, made by our Argonauts Christians, is worthy to be carefully observed. The project was to deliver the Christians of Asia, tormented by the furious tyranny of the Mehomitans, and to repeople the land, the which God had honoured with the first fruits of his Church. This zeale of Christians was commendable. I would to God they had at this day changed their disordered passions, gladd with their owne blood, into to holy a resolution, winking their minds and forces against the common enemy of all Christendome. The occasion was given by a French Gentleman called Peter the Hermit, who having long travelled in the East, and scene the miseries of the Christians among the Barbarians, the manners of the Leuantiens, and the commodities and difcommodities of the Prouinces of Asia, neere to the Holy Land: hee laid a plot with Simon Patriarcke of Ierusalem, to sollicite all Christian Kings and Princes, to employ their Forces for the conquest of the Holy Land. The event was answerable to the project: for being come to Rome to Pope Innocent the second, he did so well lay open the estate and importance of this action, as being satisfied by him, hee resolved to invite all the Kings, Princes, Potentates, States, Countiehaltes, Lords and Gentlemen of Christendome thereunto. To this end hee calls a Councell at Clermont in Auvergne, where hee assisted himselfe, and induced the whole Assembly by his persuasions, with so great efficacy as they resolved neither to spare their persons nor estates, in the execution of so important a worke.

The motives of this enterprise.

Godfrey of Bouillon, sonne to Eustace Earle of Boulogne upon the Sea, being Duke of Loraine by his vncke Godfrey the Crooke backe, the sonne of Emelin, a great and generous Prince, offered himselfe the first to this expedition, and was choise chiefe of this famous adion. The Emperour and all Christian Princes, promised to contribute their means, some their persons. A troope of all the selected Nobilitie of Europe, did willingly consecrate themselves. The most apparent were Eustace and Baldwin, brothers to Godfrey, Hugh the great Earle of Vermandois, brother to Philip King of France, Robert the Frison, Earle of Flanders, Robert the second sonne to William the bastard, Duke of Normandy and King of England, Stephen Earle of Blois and Chartres, William Bishop of Puy, William Bishop of Oranges, Raimond Earle of Tholouse and Saint Gilles, Baldwin Earle of Hainault, Baldwin Earle of Reims, Robert Duke of Apoulie, Garnier Earle of Grez, Harpin Earle of Bourges, Isard Earle of Die, Raimond Earle of Oranges, William Earle of Forez, Stephen Earle of Anjou, Hugh Earle of Saint Pol,

Retren Earle of Perche) and many others, worthy to be registred in this History, I have only noted such as I could find.

All Europe was moved with this voyage, France, Germany, Italy, England, Scotland, Hungary, Denmark, and some other parts, being at that time much troubled to keep their owne Country free from the Sarazens, who were lodged each in their bowels. France did contribute more then all the rest of Christendome. The zeale which moved their Princes and valiant men, made them to head all Dukes, Marquises, Earles, Barons, Knights, and Gentlemen, old and young, their Seigniories, as hand themselves in this great voyage. At what place Godfrey of Bouillon chiefe of the Army, sold the Siege of the City of Antioch, to Robert Bishop of Legos, and Nica to the Archbishop of Constantinople, Godfrey himselfe, engaged all his lands to his brother William King of England, Harpin Earle of Berry, his Earldome to King Henry. A tale farre more honourable for the latter then for the former, being a boole plainly applicable to the Christian cause.

There was a quarrell betwixt the children of Tanner the Notman (of whom we have spoken) who by his valour had conquered Sicily, Calabria, and Apulia, growne from high beginning, to be brought to the question being betwixt his will and his kin, but this zeale did so pacify their quarrels, as they brought about twenty thousand brave men to the Army, with their owne persons. In every towne there was nothing but men making their provisions, the wayes were full of Soldiers, horses, and baggage, which hee paired to the Rendezvous, the Ports, Haueys, and Seas, swarmed with ships and vessels, to transport our generous Argonauts, they being guided with this holy zeale, to the State of Christians in the Holy Land. The number of the Army is diversly reported. Some say they were fifty thousand fighting men, others restrain it, only to a hundred thousand. The first number were more likely, for where were there in Europe, but for our wretched dissensions? But that which they add is to be considered. That many else with us, were kept backe by reason of the dissensions betwixt the Emperours and Popes. For Germany, a great number of men of warre, sent very few, and Italy fewer, being dissented with by the Pope, who had engaged others. See the ordinary fruits of home-bred quarrels, the which fortifies the enemies of Christendome. Some write of judgement adde, that Pope Innocent did cunningly use the Christians zeale, to weaken the Emperour and his Partisans, that he might prevail with more facility, causing them to march in this action, and retaining such as were at his devotion. This is their opinion as the wise Reader may verifie in their places. The sequel will shew, that this voyage did nothing mortifie the quarrell betwixt the Emperour and the Pope, the which was renewed after a tragick manner. We follow the traces of truth as every thing hath succeeded. Here we discourse of the beginning and motives of this warre, we shall see the end and issue of this great preparation. Let vs returne to the Hauens of our Argonauts, the Trumpers sound, they are already to set sail.

The number of the Army to the Holy Land.

Godfrey diuided his Army into three Fleets, making the Rendezvous at Constantinople, whither hee sent his Ambassadors to Alexis Emperour of Greece, who entering into the house of so great an Army, made some difficulty to grant him ports: yet in the end hee yielded, and gave him an honorable entertainment. The departure of these Christian adventurers was in the yeare 1096. the first day of April. Behold our Latines arrived in safe Port. (Thus hereafter we shall call them, to distinguish them from the Greeks, being Christians and friends: and the Turkes Leuantiens, enemies) They undertooke no small worke, neither went they to take possession of an empty inheritance, the Turkes and Mahometans their enemies, were Lords of Asia, from the Realme of Pontus (towards the Mediterranean sea) vnto Hellespont. After they had expelled the Greeks, theye throwne the Forces of the Caliphs of Babylon and Egypt, and had seized on Palestina, Iudea, and all the rest of the Kingdome of Israell, from the entry of the Holy Land, vnto Libanus: Ierusalem was in their hands. Their Estate (springing from weak beginnings) encreased daily. Soliman Belchiar was their first Sultan or Emperour, who quickened with so hot a summons of Christians, assembled his Forces together, stood upon his guard, and prepared to fight.

The Army parts, and arrives at Constantinople.

The Mahometans comm- mand

Godfrey (taking the advice of Alexis Emperour of Greece, who made him to employ all his means to advance the common cause) resolved to passe into Chalcidene, and beginning with the Cities of Asia to make his passage more easie: hee had sent Peter the the Hermit before, the first trumpet of this warre, with Gautier (who was a brave, stout-good) and some troopes to discover the Country, but Gautier and some few died Captaine, suffered themselves to be surprised and taken prisoner in their place one called Regnaud or Raymond, who was a noble French knight, the Count try, but hee perds worse, suffering him to be taken prisoner by the Turks, and so, in his life, he renounced the Christian Religion, and in all his life, he followed him to the slaughter. This was foretelling of a battle. The Army marching by Asia the selfe, but they besiege Nicomedia the selfe, and then the attempt in Asia. Caesar of Byzanti-nia (famous for the first general Council, which was held against Arrian). The Sultan had thrust Mahomet into it, one of his daughter's wives, yet was it taken by assault by the Christians, after two and twenty dayes siege. The Sultan being in Asia, hee fled which approached so favour the besieged, and in the meantime, of one day's marche and likewise to hold the Cities in obedience which stood amazed, Nicaea being yielded, there were some skirmishes so favourable for the Christians, as Armenia was in Army to the mountains, and leaves the places and Cities to Caesar, who put up with this hap-pie success, and leaving a good Guard in Nicaea, hee moved on towards Byzantium and comes to Heraclia, the which yields presently, and then goes on with good success, as in lesse then four years he subdued all the goodliest Provinces of Asia, that is to say, Lycania, Gilicia, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, Syria, Metopota and Comagene, as the whole Reader may see in the Originals of the whole History, without making of any particular relation in this Discourse.

These happy and gainfull conquests make as great a scrore into Bolonia and Italy, as as it purchased honour and reputation to Godfrey and the Christians, so as having taken Antioch, Tripoli, and other renowned Cities, they came into Judea, and to Jerusalem with a victorious resolution. Thus Jerusalem is besieged with his intelligence and resolution, as after eight and thirte dayes it is taken by assault, and all the Turkes are in pieces.
The poore inhabitants without Armes are carefully preserved, so purchase a double victo-rie to the Latines, of valour in fighting well, and of clemency in sparing the vanquished.
The citie wonne, the Latins assemble in Council, and with one common consent choose Godfrey of Bouillon King of Jerusalem. All the royal ornaments were taken and accepted by him; except the Crowne of gold, the which he would have of no more, like to that of our Saviour Iesus Christ, to augment the price of gold, and precious stones dedicated to his Crowne by a holy humility, and a religious acknowledgement of the victory which the Sonne of God hath gotten by his blood, to give vs in heaven the Crowne of immortal life. This famous act chanced in the year 1099. in the Month of March.

Having put Godfrey and the Christians in possession of the Holy Land, let vs returne into France to our Philip, not without griefe to see the difference betwixt the Emperour and Pope, who were nothing reconciled by the voyage to the Holy Land. The emperor of this new power, purchased in England to the Sonnes of William the Conqueror, gave him no final occasion to looke to his affaires, and the rather, for that this new King of England had begun to make a breach in his Estate, taking Xaintonge and Poitou Countries very important, being members of one of the principal Provinces of his Realme, foreseeing also that Normandy would bandy it selfe against France without all respect.

His disposition.

William had left three sons of great hope: William (named Rufus) King of England, Robert Duke of Normandy (whom we have left in the Holy Land), and Henry Earle of Maine with all his treasure. Philip therefore to secure his Estate, (following the example of his Ancestors) caused Levis his sonne (whom he had by Berthe, daughter to Baldwin Earle of Flanders) to be crowned King. There was a scandalous breach in this marriage, for Philip falling in love with Bertrude the wife of Fouques Earle of Anjou, puts away Berthe, and afterwards (having reiectd Bertrude) he received Berthe againe, being mother to King Levis, to whom having reigned the Crowne at Orleans, he died at Me-lun in the year of Grace, 1109. of his age 57. and of his reigne 49. having reigned long to fettle his Estate, but not without a levaine of much trouble to come, having degenerated from the vertues of his grand-fathers and father. He was disloyall, covetous, loving nothing but his owne profit, pittilesse, ingrate, and one who sowed dangerous seeds of much mischief, which began to bud in the reigne ensuing.

L E V I S

L E V I S the sixt, called the Groffe,

The 40. King of France.

As we foresee a storme by the clouds that rise, by the darke mists of the thicke ayre, pierced through with sparkles like the shining of a close fire, and by the mortuities of the water, driven with a violent and sudden wind; even so there be Symptoms and fits in an Estate, which foretell the alterations which shall ensue: the which fall not all at one instant, but the subject being gathered together, in proces of time, breaks forth when it can no longer hold. There is this difference betwixt natural things and those which belong to man, for that men can well discern what the weather will be, but he is blind in that which con-cernes himselfe, and neuer beleevues untill he feels the blow, falling into the danger which he flies, by his owne fault, neuer wise but after danger. France had enioyed peace about an hundred years, under these forecasted reignes: the now growes weary. This reigne is a piteable to a mournfull song, which shall make me to weepe that rejoiced in the fruition of so long rest. The name of royall authority held all those great men backe which had any interest therein, the wisdom of Capet, Robert, Henry, and Philip, had so bridled them, as they willingly obeyed.

Now they are of another humour. The Duke of Normandy (who since Capet had been obedient and well affected to the Crowne) seeing himselfe strengthened with the Realme of England, he frames all his practices to overthrow this order, by rebellions and tumults. Levis had scarce performed his fathers funerals, before the fire of rebellion kindled in divers parts of the Realme: and (as if the Kings youth had beene a blemish to his dignity) every one will play the petty King. The places neere unto Paris began these first revolts, by reason of the many great familiars thereabouts. Corbeil had an Earle, Chartres another, Piseaux in Beaufe had one, Crecy had his Lord, Marle his, Pomponne his, so all others other Seigneuries had every one their particular Lord. But as a disease stir-reth up all the humours in a weak body, so all that were discontented with Levis, gather together into one head, to afflict him vnder the countenance of the King of England. They were for a time suppressed, yet this was but to open a vein, and not to cure the Feur;
Guy of Crecy, the Lord Piseaux, Lancelin Earle of Dammartin, Thibaud Earle of Champagne, and Brye, Peau of Louvre in Paris, Milon of Montlehery, and Philip the bastard of King Philip: all joyntly play the mutines, and rise against their King. At the same instant, Henry King of England goes to field, his private quarrell was for the towne of Gifords, seated vpon the riuier of Epre, on the confines of Normandy. But this small proceffe was soone ended, for Levis having defeated the English neere unto Gifors, hee forced Henry to retire, and afterwards punished all these rebels, encreasing his reuenuues by their confiscations.

But the quarrell betwixt the Emperour and the Pope, did hatch a more dangerous proceffe for France. We have said that Henry the sixt banded against his father Henry the fourth (who had associated him in the Empire) and had cast him into prison by the Popes counsell, where this poore man died for griefe. Henry the sixt wonderfully troubled in conscience, and vexed with daily reproaches, that hee had violated the Imperiall right; resolved to haue his reuenge of Pope Pascal, the author of this cruel and vniuersal counsell. To conclude, he armes, and that with so great a resolution, as in few dayes hee assembles threecore thousand foot, and thirte thousand horse: with this Army he goes into Italy, and having taken and spoiled Nouarre, Pontremolo, and Arezzo, hee comes a Conqueror to the gates of Rome, the which are opened without any resistance.

Being entred the Citie, and causing the Pope and Colledge to assemble, hee makes knowne vnto them the rights of the Empire, as Pope Leo the eight had acknowledged them to Orto the second Emperour, and before him Adrian to Charlemagne, according to the Decree of the Councell at Rome, contained in the sixtie third Distinction: and to conclude, hee forced him to take the oath of fidelitie, as to the true and lawfull Emperour, and then returns with his Army. Pope Pascal extremely moued with this affront, calls a Councell, wherein he proffits to haue beene forced by Henry, so by consequence pronounceth, that whatsoever he had promised was of no force, and after all these toiles he died. Gelasius succeeded him both in place and hatred against the Emperour Henry: but being too weake of himselfe neither hauing any such friend as the King of France (according to the tryall so often made, time out of minde) he comes into France, but he died at Cluny: and in his place Calixtus, sonne to the Earle of Bourgoingne, was chosen Pope. The reputation of the place from whence hee was defended was great, so as being a Frenchman, he easily called a Councell in France, to the great satisfaction of the French. It was held at Rheims, where by an Ecclesiasticall decree, he declared Henry an enemy to the Church, and degraded him of the Imperiall dignity.

As this ignominious decree did moue the Emperour, so did it minister matter to the King of England his brother in law, to embrace all occasions to annoy Lewis his capitall enemy: for seeing this Councell had bene held in France, and consisted chiefly of the French Church: it was very apparent that the Kings fauour was very preiudiciall to the Emperours affaires. The English failes not to harpe vpon this string to the Emperour, being already incensed by the thing it selfe: promising him all his meanes, and encouraging him to enter France on the one side, whilst that he came on the other with all the Forces of Normandy and England. The party was not small, neither had Lewis small cause to feare, being encountered by two such enemies. But God shewed him the rod, and refused the punishment for another season: for as the Emperour was going to field, the Germane Princes (foreseeing the misery of a warre undertaken lightly vpon despight, and weighing the importance of neighbourhood) gaue him to vnderstand that hee ought not to attempt warre against the King of France, without declaring vnto him the causes of his discontent. He therefore sends his Ambassadors to this end. Lewis doth wisely answer him, that he is exceeding sorry to see the two great Pillars of the Church so shaken by these dissensions; and that it was to be feared, the whole building would be ruined. So as being a friend to both, he desired greatly to be a mediator of concord, and not to cary coales to encrease the fire, too much kindled already, the which ought to be quenched for the good and quiet of all Christendome. This Ambassage was pleasing, and prevailed so much, as the Emperour disarmed, and was content to make Lewis a mediator for an accord betwixt him and the Pope, to the great griefe of the King of England, who expected a long continuance of this jarre. The composition was made at Wormes, very beneficiall for the Pope, in the yeate 1122. whereby Henry grants him the installing of Bishops, and other benefices. This did ease the fore, but not cure it: as the sequell of the History will shew. While that Princes haue leasure to contend, the poore people die for hunger in many places of Europe. This famine was exceeding great in Flanders, who then had for their Earle Charles furnished the Good, for his good disposition and great charity to the poore. He sought by all meanes to relieue them. But as barrenesse was one of the causes of this famine, so the cruell couetousnesse of the rich, was a great hinderance to the commodity of vituals: whereby there grew as remarkable an act, as the successe was strange, the particular report whereof, the Reader must pardon in the briefnesse of our stile.

There were three brethren at Bruges, of the chiefe of the Country, the which had gathered together a great quantity of Graine, and would not sell it, expecting a greater dearth, which might cause a greater price, that is, Bertholphe Wendefstrate, Prouost of Saint Donas, and Chancellor of Flanders: Lambert and Bouffard Wendefstrate brethren: and another rich Burgesse called Lambert, one of the chiefe of the City. This dignity of Prouost and Chancellor was so great, as he supplied the Princes place in his absence. Vpon the peoples complaint, the Earle decrees, that all the Graniers of these great houses should be opened, and the corne sold to the people at a reasonable rate. The commission was giuen to Thamard, Almoner of the Earles house: he causeth the Graniers of these rich Burgesse to be opened, the corne is sold to the people, and the money deliuered to the owners. The people being relieved by the courageous care of Thamard, commend him. The Wendefstrates and Lambert (greatly discontented with this sale, wherein they held themselves interested) cause many indignities to be done vnto him. Lambert is directly accused by Informations, being an audacious young man, and the Wendefstrates were touched therewith. The Earle offended with these audacious attempts, repaired them by iustice: threatening Lambert, that if he continued, he would severely punish him.

There

A There was also another complaint, made by an old Abbot against the Prouost, to whom the Earle spake roughly, commanding him to restore vnto the Abbot what he ought him. These free admonitions of the good Earle Charles, did so alter the proud and trecherous minds of these Citizens, as they resolute to kill him: his mild facility giuing these wicked spirits both courage to attempt, and boldnesse to execute: And the end is answerable to their wicked designe. As the good Earle went ill accompanied in the morning to his deuotion, to the Church of Saint Donas, on a Wednesday, beheld a troope of young mad men, led by this Lambert, comes vnto him (being vnarmed, on his knees in a Chappell) the Priest attired in his ornaments at the Altar, (the Earle holding forth his arme to giue his almes to a poore woman) and without any warning, they beat him downe with their swords, and kill him, and so they seeke for Thamard, whom they find and massacre, with so great a fury, as they leaue him vpon the place, hewed into many peeces. Their troope encrease, and they flee to the Palace, where finding it without guard, without keyes, and without any gate shut, they enter it, they kill, sacke, and spoile: and running from thence into the City, they commit the like in those houses which they knew best affected to the good Earle Charles. The people exceedingly grieved to see these barbarous cruelties against their good Prince, whom they loued as a father, durst not speake a word during this fury, whereas this troope of murderers commanded absolutely. But the wisest Citizens fled to Lewis, as to their soueraine Lord. Lewis comes to Bruges with great speed: these butchers attending their misery, shut themselves into the great Tower of S. Donas. Lewis doth first burie the body of this good Earle honourably, (the which had layd without interring) and then doth punish the murderers and their complices rigorously.

But this is not all. He must provide for the Earldome, remaining without a Lord, by the death of Count Charles deceased without children. There wanted no pretendants, William of Ypre sonne, to Philip of Flanders, the second sonne of Robert the Frison: King Henry of England (who desired greatly to ioyne this goodly Country with his Normandy): Stephen of Blois, Earle of Montreuil and Bologne: Baldwin Earle of Hainault: and William the sonne of Robert called Count-hoff, brother to the King of England, but his sworne enemy, having vied his father ill, and kept him prisoner.

D Lewis was soueraine Iudge of this controuersie, Flanders depending vpon the Crown of France. He assigned all the pretendants to repair to the City of Arras: signifying that his intent was to doe them iustice: but in the end he inclined to fauour, adiudging the Earldome of Flanders to the last, that is, to William of Normandy, to bind him with more strict bonds against his kinsman. On the other side, the Flemings assemble at Ypre, and choose William of Leo, Lord of Ypre: the King aduanceth with his Forces to Ypre, to prevent this popular election, where he enters the stronger, and forceth William to renounce it. From thence he goes to all other good Cities: where by his authority he causeth William of Normandy to be receiued for lawful Earle, and puts him in solemn possession by a publike act. But his fauour had ill bestowed this goodly inheritance on an unworthy man, whose fury deprived him presently. Lewis hauing installed him, returns into France: William in stead of winning his new subjects by equity and mildnesse, begins to oppress them after an imperious manner: by infringing their priuileges, alterations of his authority, taxes, subsidies, new impositions, and by all other meanes which Princes (that seeke to lose their Estates) hold to torment their subjects. Hee had to fave himselfe as the Cities resolute to provide a better Earle; and to this intent they chose a head: The memory of their good Earle, makes them to cast their eyes vpon him that hath most right to this inheritance, as the nearest kinsman, which is Thierry sonne to the Duke of Holatia, and of Gerrude daughter to Robert the Frison. The Flemings intent him to come into their Country, promising him all assistance to conquer the State. He comes, and is receiued with an extraordinary joy by all the people: All the Cities assemble to acknowledge him by order, and dismisse William of Normandy, who seeing a hat repulse by this people thus freed, repairs to Lewis for succour in this extremity. Lewis falls him in his Army marcheth with great speed: he himselfe comes in person, and is receiued into Arras: from thence he adiuournes Thierry to come and answer before him as his Soueraine, by what warrant he carries him selfe for Earle: this summons is made vnto him at Ypre, whither he had repaired himselfe: Having condemned him by default, he approacheth his Armie to Ypre, to vex the inhabitants. Thierry rallies forth with a noble

The Pope and King of France at jare.

It is a priviledge, time out of mind, due to the Kings of France, that they admit not any to Ecclesiasticall dignities preferred by the Pope, or chosen by the people, if he bee not pleasing to themselves. The reason is apparent, to avoid either disloyalty, ignorance, or ill life, in such as are advanced to these dignities: our Kings having right to be sovereign over-seers of the Church. The King would not allow of Peter thus advanced to this dignity, although the Chapter of Bourges had given their consent to the Popes decree. Peter being reiected, had recourse to Thibaud Earle of Champagne, and to the Earle of Blois, men discontented with the King, and only fit to be opposed. But to this difficultie there was added a greater at the same instant. Raoul Earle of Vermandois had put away his wife Gilbert, the daughter of Roger Lord of Chastellu-briant, upon suspicion that she had been prodigall of her honour, without any proofes to convince her. But iealousie made him to see that plainly, which was concealed to others: so as he put her away, and tooke Peronelle, the bastard daughter of William Duke of Guienne in her place, being aduowed sister to Queene Elenor, and her deare friend. Gilbert complains to the Pope, being reiected (as she pretended) without cause, and demands iustice. The Pope commands Raoul to receive his wife againe, and to put away Peronelle as vnlawfull, and (for not obeying) doth excommunicate him. The King intreats the Pope for Peronelle, but he preuailes not: for he sends Tues into France as his Legat, to reuine the first censure, not onely against the Earle, but also against the Bishops which had consented to the diuorce of Gilbert, forbidding them any more to exercise their charges. The Earle Thibaud had undertaken to haue the Pope obeyed, to the more dislike of the King, as it were attempting it of purpose to offend him. Lewis moued with this affront, went against Thibaud: & at the first takes Vitry, and not onely sackes the towne, but in disdain of the Pope, caused the Churches to be spoiled: and many being fled out of the villages, to saue themselves from the fury of the disordered troopes, had retired themselves into a Temple, as to a place of safety: Lewis gives such liberty to his souldiers, as they set fire of the place, and burne fiftene hundred persons men and women. The horror of this massacre offended all good men, but especially Lewis, who was so much grieved as he could not be comforted. Misfortune is good for something. Lewis loathing the voyage to the East, for the aforesaid occasions, was easily confirmed by Saint Bernard, who had perswaded him to yeeld all succours to the afflicted Christians, for a reparation of so execrable a fact, committed by his commandement, vpon so many poore innocents: and likewise he embarked Conrad the Emperour and the Germanes. These two great Princes, caried with one zeale, and vnited in one will to this worke, make great preparations for the voyage. Conrad armes threecore thousand horse, and an infinite number of foot, and he himselfe is chiefe of this goodly Army, taking the way of Hungary to Constantinople, through the Country of Alexis his brother in law, Emperour of Greece: he arriued some moneths before Lewis, for the Emperour parted in February, and Lewis went to field in May, and takes the same course the Emperour had done.

A horrible massacre committed by the souldiers of Lewis, and by his consent.

The Emperour and Lewis goe into the East.

The Emperour voyages to no purpose.

The Kings Army was nothing inferior to the Emperours: and so much the more remarkable, for that Queene Elenor desired to accompany her husband in the voyage: so as after the King and Queene example, all France thought to flye into the East. They sent a distaffe and a spindle to all those that were fit for armes, if they marched not with this troope of braue warriors. Conrad arriued first at Constantinople: and so hee returned much sooner into Germany. Having passed into Asia by the Bosphorus of Thracia, it was likely that all should yeeld to so mighty an Army: but it fell out otherwise then hee had designed. All the Cities wonne at the first voyage were almost lost; and the Christians ill government was so well knowne, as the Turkes made head in all places. The Emperour measuring his triumph by the number of his men, contemned the enemy, and was negligent in his proceedings: having reiected the proposition to Alexis Emperour of the East, his brother in law, he found little bread, and store of enemies in all places. So as what by hunger and the sword, scarce the tenth part of his men came to his friends in the holy Land, where he found them all amazed.

Lewis (warned by Conrad example) did some what better in the beginning: for being reiected at Constantinople, and other Cities of Greece he passed the channel into Asia happily, where hauing bearen the enemy, he came without losse to Arhala, and thence caused his Fleet (which was at Rhodes) to come to the friend Ports of Palestina: hee arriued

Arriued by land safe with all his troopes at Antioch, where hee was honourably receiued by Raimond Earle of Saint Gilles, his brother in law. In the meane time the Emperour, besiegeing Afcalon alone, but preuailes not. Lewis arriues at Ierusalem, whither Conrad comes likewise. After they had visited the places of deuotion, they resolve to besiege Damas in Syria, a City very important for the commerce for Iudea: after a long and fruitlesse siege, all are dispersed. The Emperour who came first, returns first; the King stayed not long after him. There were foure yeares spent in this fruitlesse voyage, with much paine and cost, and not onely without fruit, but it also tooke away the terror of Christian Armies in these miscreants, and left the affaires of Asia in farre worse estate then when they came. There was yet another inconuenience. The Emperour Alexis (a friend at their entry) shewed himselfe an enemy to them both at their departure. Conrad saued himselfe as well as he could, more fearing the trechery of the Greekes, then the cruelty of the Turkes. Lewis prouides in time to haue the Fleet of Sicily come for his conuoy, else had hee lost both himselfe and his treasure, the which had bene a meanes for the Greekes to make their peace with the Turkes, and open warre against the other Christians, being better then themselves. This shamefull and preiudiciall departure, was hurtfull to the whole Christian Church. But there was a greater losse for Lewis, very troublefome to himselfe, and preiudiciall to all France: for Queene Elenor his wife (who made provision to goe visit the holy places) suffered her eyes to be abused with an ynchaste and filthy lust, which tainted her honour, and the King her husbands heart with an outrageous iealousie. This woman accustomed to the liberties of time and place, had so abandoned her selfe to the pleasures of the East, as the stench of her incontinency was poble to the whole world, before her husband had any notice thereof: her impudency did so farre exceed, as she would dishonourably haue stayed in Antioch, and left her husband presuming to cloake her shame with a shew of Religion: saying without blushing, that shee could be no more the wife of Lewis, to whom she was cousin in the fourth degree, preferring the loue of a lecher, named Saladin, of the Sarazin race, before the greatness of a King of France, her lawfull husband. Lewis being much disquieted, periwades this woman to returne (a heauier burthen to his mind, then to his ship) being returned to his house, he frees himselfe with all the speed he can. And whereas he should haue cast this inordinate woman into the Riuer, being no more his wife, and retained her dowry iustly gotten, shee playing bankrupt of her honour: He calls a Councell at Baugency to haue her diuorced, the which was granted vnder colour of farre fetcht consanguinity. But his desire was to be freed from her. So retaining two daughters, borne vnder the vaile of their marriage, he restores vnto Elenor all her Country of Guienne, that is, he puts into the hands of his furious enemy a Torch to set his whole Realme on fire: for as soone as the secher selfe freed from the subiection and feare of a husband, shee stayed not long to acquaint her selfe with Henry King of England, and Duke of Normandy, the greatest and most capital enemy that Lewis had. So he obtained Guienne by the voluntary Cession which Lewis made, to haue the better and more conuenient meanes to annoy him & his whole Realme. Moreover, Lewis payed dearly for so great a discommodity, for the Pope would not give him a dispensation to marrie againe, without a great summe of money to bee employed in the warres of the holy Land: and to finish this worke, hee tooke to wife Constance, the daughter of Alphonso King of Galicia, being a weakie friend, and farre off. This marriage was not greatly conuenient, neither for his own quiet, nor the peace of his subjects: This subiect of deadly rancor, encreasing the hatred of these two neighbor Monarchs of France and England, burst forth soone after by dangerous effects. The benefit of the new purchase of Guienne, was the cause of that perillous warre, the which had so long and so lamentable a continuance. William Duke of Guienne, Grandfather by the Mother to Queene Elenor, had married the onely daughter of the first Raimond, Earle of Tholouza, who had ingaged the said County to Raimond Earle of Saint Gilles, who lineally called himselfe Earle of Tholouza, being seized on the said County, and enjoyed it so quietly vnder the Kings obedience. Henry King of England offers the money to Raimond to redeme it, and demands the Earldome as his Wives right. Upon his refusal, hee armes, enters into Quercie, takes Cahors, spoiles the Country, and besiege Tholouza, being entrained by Raimond runners to quench this fire: Being arriued, and the warre almost ready to ioyne, a peace was made betwixt the two Kings, by the marriage of Henry King of Englands daughter daughter of Lewis, with Henry the eldest sonne of Henry King of England: but for that she A was very young, and not yet mariagable, shee was deliuered into Henry the fathers hands, vntill she were of fit age to marry. Lewis had now buried his wife Constance, who left him but two daughters, without any heyres male: so as being desirous to haue a successor, he made no delay to marrie, and tooke to his third wife Alix the daughter of Thibault Earle of Champagne, his vassall, and newly reconciled, but not greatly affected vnto him, vntill that time. He had a sonne presently by her, whom he called Dieu Donné, or Giuen of God, as an acknowledgement that God had sent him and his subjects prayers. This is he that shall succeed him. I should beginne to describe his reigne, but order commands me to relate what hapned during the reigne of Lewis, in the neighbour Nations of England and Italy, wherein Lewis had great crosses.

Noble troubles
in England
betweene the father and the sonne.

Prince Henry isalous of his owne father.

Henry King of England had two sonnes by Eleanor, Richard and Geoffrey: and by his first wife he had Henry, who was made sure to Marguerite of France, of whom we haue spoken. The father caused him to be crowned, to settle him in his life time, and tied the English vnto him by homage. A young Prince, ambitious, audacious, ill aduised, and rash, who cannot long containe himselfe with the taste of this new authority, but will play the King with his father. And although his fathers admonitions restrained him for a while, yet this ambitious humour still burst forth: so as the father from milde admonitions came to threats, the infolency of this young Prince encreasing daily. Some yeares passed whilst this fire lay smothered, very long for young Henry, to whom the fathers life seemed too tedious, and the children of the second wife grew by the care of Eleanor their mother. Henry the father discontented with his sonne, and fearing that in consummating the marriage betweene him and the daughter of France, the young Prince would grow proud, augmenting his traine and State, and (through the fauour of King Lewis his father in law) attempt something preiudiciall to his authority: hee delayed the accomplishment of his marriage, although the virgin were of more then sufficient yeares. To this mischief was added another more shamefull, for that Henry the father caused this Prince to be carefully kept, the which should be his daughter in law, fearing lest his sonne should take her away, and marrie her. Eleanor falls into ielousie, as if Henry had abused her: and it was easie to settle this conceit in her sonne in law Henric head, who had the chiefe interest in this delay: and to publish this scandalous report vnto the people, to make the old man more odious vnto the whole world. A malicious and importune woman, borne for a great plague to both these Estates. As men doe commonly adore the Sunne-rising, so there wanted no Sycophants in Court to flatter the eares of this young King, and likewise to incense the two Kings one against the other, in flattering their passions.

The fance made warre against the father.

Thus Henry transported by these occasions, complains to Lewis of the double wrong his father did him, both in the delay of his marriage, and deniall of his authority. And as Lewis at his request had giuen some admonitions vnto Henry, in the end this passionate young Prince came to Paris, where being well received, he enters league with Lewis, to make warre against his father, and to disquiet him in diuers parts. William King of Scotland is an associate, vpon condition that Henry shall giue him the Countie of Northumberland adioyning vnto Scotland, for his charges in the warres. Henry the father (aduer-tised of all these preparations) moues not, hoping that reason should reclaime his son, and to this end he sends an honourable Ambassage to Lewis, and to his sonne being in France: the which made them more resolute, an vsual thing in such as are fought vnto. Eleanor adds more to this dissention (great enough of it selfe) to crosse the affaires of her old husband, with whom she stood in very bad tearmes. She doth bandy her two sonnes Richard and Geoffrey against the father, causing them to ioyne with their brother Henry, who is put vp wonderfully herewith, hauing his brethren for companions of his furie. The warre breakes forth amongst them, the Kings Army enters into Normandy, the which obeyed the father. Henry the sonne takes some places, and ingageth some men of warre with great promises, and by great assurances of good, the which was not in his power to performe. Henry the father (hauing provided for England against William King of Scots) passeth into Normandy, where lay all the burthen of the warre, and armes with speed: The coldness of his age was charied by the lively apprehension of so many indig-nities. The greatest part of his subjects desisted the presumption of his Sonne, neither could they allow of Lewis his proceedings, who had done better in casting Water then

A Oyle, into this home-bred fire. Lewis besiegeth Vernueil, and fearing to be forced to raise the siege, vnder colour of a parlee with Henry, he takes the towne, and sends Forces from other parts into England, to cause new broyles. Richard Duke of Guienne by his mothers right, makes warre there: but all these vnlawfull attempts haue no successe. The French that passed into England are beaten: and Richard preuailes not against his father, to whom most of the Cities yeeld daily, and leaue the sonne. Richard drawne to his duty by the respects of Nature, which cannot bee denied, and forced by necessity, desires to parlee with his father. He is receiued into grace, and deales with his brother Henry for the like reconciliation. Lewis finding Henries disposition, allows of it. They send Ambassadors of either side. This vnciuill and vnlawfull warre was ended by this accord: That the father should remaine alone in the royall authority: acknowledged and obeyed of all his sonnes: that he should giue honourable allowances to either of them, according to their degrees: That the marriage of Henry with Marguerite the eldest daughter of King Lewis, should be consummated: and that Alix his other daughter, should be giuen in marriage to Richard the other sonne of Henry to make an absolute accord. Thus this Tragedy seemed to end with a Comedy: but there shall be change of subjects vpon another scaffold.

As these things passed in England, Italy was nothing quieter, by the dissentions, that were reuiued betwixt the Emperours and Pope. After the death of Conrad, Frederick surnamed barbarossa, is created Emperour, of whom Histories yeeld an honourable testimony for his wisdom and valour. Hauing pacified Germany, he came into Italy, to repair the confusions bred both by long absence, and the death of Conrad. The Emperour hauing punished the Veronois and the Milanois, had incensed Pope Adrian, who supported them, (the factions of Guelphs and Gibelins being confusedly spread throughout all the Cities) so as he was ready to excommunicate him: when as death stayed this storme, leauing it ready to his successors. The Schisme which grew in the Sea of Rome by these factions, stayed the blow, some hauing called Victor, as most affectionate to the Emperours party: other Alexander, as his sworne enemy. To remedy this diuision, Fredericke calls a Councell at Pavia, and sends for both the Popes to come thither: Victor comes, and offers to performe what should bee decreed. Alexander on the other side makes the old answer, (these be the words of the History) That the Pope was not to be iudged by any man liuing, and that he neither ought, nor would appeare. The Councell being thus dissolved, without any good conclusion: the Emperour for the making of an accord, intreats Lewis King of France, Henry King of England, and the Kings of Scotland and Bohemia, to meet him in some conuenient place for a parlee. Dijon was appointed, as bordering vpon the Empire: They meet, but their conference did aggravate the quarrell. Lewis was wholly for Alexander, who had likewise gained the Venetians, and the greatest part of Italy. The issue of this parlee was open force, the which Fredericke employed against the Milanois, being the principall cause of this dissention: whom hee did punish severely, hauing taken, spoyled, and sackt their City, ruined it vtterly, causing Salt to bee sowne there, and punishing the authors of this rebellion capitally. Alexander not able to resist Fredericke, retires himselfe into France, from whence he planted his battery against the Emperour. The Milanois (suing what they could in this shipwracke) begin to build their City, vnder the fauour of Pope Alexander, and to make new defences against Fredericke, who returns into Italy, makes himselfe master of Genoa, from whence their meanes came, defeats the Romanes in a pitched field, takes Rome, and causeth another Pope called Calixtus, to be created in the place of Alexander the third. Alexander saues himselfe at Venice. Orho the sonne of Fredericke follows after to take him with 75. Gallies. But the chance turned, for hee himselfe was taken by Cian General of the Venetians, and caried prisoner to Venice. Then Fredericke grew more milde, and accepted of such conditions of peace, as Alexander had prescribed. That he should craue absolution on his knees, and himselfe should lead his Army into Asia. So as Fredericke comes to Venice, and being prostrate at the Popes feet in a solemne assembly, he asketh pardon. The Pope sets his foot vpon his necke, and cries with a loud voice: Super Aspidem & Basiliscum ambulabis. The Emperour moued with this disgrace, answers, Non tibi, sed Petro. The Pope replies, Et mihi & Petro. This brauado of Alexander seemed so strange to some of his traine, as Theodore Marquesse of Misnia, trembling, and gnashing his teeth with choller, was held backe by the reines of respect: yet he

runnes to the Emperour and takes him vp. The Pope fearing lest these Germanes should offer him some violence, being amazed, calls himself about Fredericks necke, whom euen now he held vnder his feet, befeching him to preferue him from his traine. The Emperour giues him his word, for he was the stronger both within the City and without, hauing humbled himselfe for no other respect, but for the reuerence of Religion, and the zeale of publike peace. This famous act happened at Venice, in the year 1171. in the presence of the Ambassadors of the Kings and Princes of the greatest States of Europe, that were mediators of this accord. From Venice, Fredericke went into the East with a goodly Army, according to his promise: and the dissention was well pacified by his humility, but not altogether suppressed in Italy, for it reuiued afterwards, as we shall see in the continuance of this History. Thus the Christians liued, whilst their enemies preuailed daily in Asia, to the great and shamefull losse of all Christendome. Such was the Estate of the Church and Empire, vnder the reigne of Lewis the seuenth.

Lewis caused his sonne Philip to bee solemnly crowned at Rheims, at the age of 14. years, in the year of Grace 1179. He betrothed him to Isabel the daughter of Bauduin Earle of Hainault: and hauing thus disposed of his affaires, he dyed the yeare following 1180. An vnwise Prince, and vnhappy with all his policies, leauing a leuaine of great miseries to his posterity. Doubtlesse the greatest policy is to be an honest man. This assured peace caused the Vniuersity of Paris to flourish, as far as those obscure times would permit. Gratian, Peter Lombard, and Cornelior, learned men liued in that age. The inexcusable confusion which reigned in the Church, was a iust subiect of complaint to the good, as appears by the writings of Peter of Blois, John de Saraburck Bishop of Chartres, and Bernard Abbot of Cîteaux, great and worthy men: Their books liue after their deaths, wherein the wise Reader may see an ample and free Commentary of this Text, the which the History suffers me not to dilate of.

An excellent King, and an excellent reigne.

His disposition.

The title of Augustus given to Philip, is worthy of his person and reigne: who not onely preferred the French Monarchy, amidst so many sorts of enemies and difficulties; but enlarged it with many Prouinces (diuided to diuers proprietaries by Hugh Capet) and vnted them to the Crowne: for this cause hee was also called Conqueror. The beginning of his reigne was a preface of happinesse, for there appeared in his face a great shew of a good disposition, inclined to piety, iustice, modesty, being strong, quicke, vigilant, valiant, and active. He did consecrate the first fruits of his reigne, to purge the corruptions which reigned among the people: blasphemies, Playes, Dicing-houses, publicke dissolutions in infamous places, Tavernes, and Tipling-houses. Hee made goodly lawes which our age reads and scornes, doing the contrary with all impunity: but whilst hee reigned they were duly obserued.

The Iewes were mightily dispersed throughout the Realme, who (besides their obnoxious superstition, vsed exorbitant vsury, and were supported for some great benefit, by the Pope and other Princes and States, whereas they haue liberty at this day, to liue after their owne manner. Philip expelled them, although they obtained a returne for money: yet in the end they were banished out of all the territories of the French obedience, and so continue vnto this day. This was a small apprenticeship, and an entrance of much more happy paine, the which hee should vndergoe, both within and without the Realme, in great and trouble some affaires, as a famous subiect worthy of his valour. England, Flanders, and Asia, provided variety and change of worke to employ his reigne, the which continued forty yeares: but the change of his intricate mariages troubled him more then all his affaires, as the progresse of our Discourse will shew.

In the beginning there was emulation who should be nearest to gouerne him. Philip Earle

The Iewes banished out of France.

A Earle of Flanders, and the Duke of Guienne were competitors. The one as vnde to the young Queen Isabel his wife, and named by his father Lewis: the other as his neereft kinsman, and both the one and the other had great meanes to preuaile: but Richard was the stronger, as well by the Kings fauour, as by the Forces of England, of whence he was an Infant, and welbeloued by Henry his brother, who then reigned. Behold, the King is imbarqued against the Earle of Flanders, by the aduice of his Councell: The subiect of their quarrell was for Vermandois, which the Earle enioyed: the King demanded it, being no longer his, by the decaise of Alix dead without children, and therefore must returne to the Crowne: From words they go to armes. Their troopes being in field and ready to fight, a peace was made, with this condition: That Count Philip should enioy Vermandois during his life, and after his decaise it should returne to the Crowne. But this peace continued not long among these Princes. The King could not loue his Wife Isabel; it seemes this was the chiefeft cause of the dislike the King had against the Earle of Flanders her Vncle. In the end he put her away, in the year 1188. from which time Philip loued Richard Duke of Guienne.

But this good agreement continued not long, by reason of another controuersie betwix him and the English. Marguerite the Daughter of Lewis the 7. sister to Philip, married to Henry of England, as we haue said, dyed then without children. Philip doth presently re-demand his Sisters dowry, which was the Countrey of Vexin. The King of England is loth to leaue the possession, so as they fall to armes, and the mischief increased by this occasion. Henry the first son to old Henry dyed: Richard Duke of Guienne his brother, (who might haue compounded this quarrell) being called to the Crowne, embraceth the action with all eagernes. And to crosse Philip by an important diuersion (like to old Henry) auoides the blow in Normandy, and enters Languedoc by Guienne into the Countrey of Tholouse, renewing the old quarrell he had against Count Raimond. Philip being assailed in two places, is nothing amazed: hauing leaued an Army with all celeritie, he enters the English pale. Where he suddenly takes Chasteauaux, Buiancais, Argenton, Leuroux, Montrichard, Montforeau, Vandome, with other townes: and passing on, hee batters and takes Mans: and hauing waded through the River of Loire, he presents himselfe before Tours, which yeelds at the terrour of his Forces. Old Henry amazed at the sudden valour of this young Prince, faints, and oppressed with griefe, dies at Chinon, in the year 1190. leauing his Realme to his Sonne Richard, but not his Malice: for presently after his Coronation, he concludes a peace with Philip vpon a cause very honourable to them both.

The Christians affaires in Asia declined still. The Pope perswades the Kings of France and England with many reasons, and the zeale of the common interest of Christendome made them resolute. They became good friends, with an intent to make a voyage together to the Holy Land, to the incredible content of all their subiects. But whilst they prepare for this voyage, Ier vs passe into Asia, to visit the afflicted Christians. After the fruitlesse returne of the Emperor Conrade, & of Lewis king of France, things went from bad to worke, hauing caused the Christian Forces to lose their reputation with the Turks, being grown proud with this vaine shew of Armes: Baldwin dies after the fruitlesse attempts of these great Princes: Amaury his brother succeeds him, who toyled himselfe in Egypt, against Sultan Saracoon, and Saladin his successor. He was releeued by the coming of Frederick Barbarossa, who failed not to performe what he had promised to Pope Alexander. But the Christians found small comfort in his coming. The Forces of the Empire (which were great) being dispersed by the death of the Emperor, Amaury likewise dies, who leaues one Son named Baldwin both yong and a Leper, so as hauing voluntarily resigned the charge, finding himselfe vnfit, he did inuest his Nephew Baldwin, the son of William Longsword, Marquis of Monferat, & of Sibill his sister: and considering the weakness of his age, he appoints Raimond Earle of Tripoli for his Tutor. Hence sprung a horrible dissention among the Christians: for Sibill (by whom the right came to Baldwin her son, after the death of Marquis William) was married to Guy of Lusignan, who was seized of the yong Infant. He is now his Tutor by force, the childe dies, and Guy of a Turor becomes a King, (not without great suspition of treachery against the Infant) & in the end they fall to war. Euery one doth strengthen himselfe for this goodly Realme: & they are incensed with greater fury, then when they ioyntly made warre against the Infidels. Guy seeks seekes for succour of Saladin Sultan of Egypt, who imbraceth this occasion, and runnes A with a great Army to besiege Tiberiades. The Christians assemblé, and are defeated in a set battell. The Crosse is taken by Saladin and caried in Triumph. Then was Tripoly deliuered into his hands, and the Earle Raymond found dead in his bed, when as he should have reigned : to teach all men how to trust Infidels. Saladin passeth on, hee besiegeth, takes, and sackes Ierusalem : and in this amazement, Pielomais, Azo, Baruth, and Ascalon yeeld vnto him. These victorious conquests of Saladin, were accompanied with great mildnesse to the people whom he had subdued ; that by this wise course, the Miscreant might encounter the Christians disorders, by a notable example of vertue. Moreover, there happened another Tragical confusion ; Alexis a yong man of fifteene yeares, B sonne to Emanuel the Emperour, (issued from that Alexis, of whom we haue spoken in the beginning of this Easterne warre) was cruelly slaine by his Tutor Andronicus, and he himselfe afterwards by Isaac, and the people of Constantinople, who had called him to the Empire. Such was the sicke estate of the East, when as our Kings were solicited to goe and visit it, in the yeare 1190.

Philip calls a Parliament at Paris to settle his estate : they dissuade him from the voyage, but zeale transported him, and made him fight and contend with impossibilities : So great efficacy this resolution had to go to this war, which seemed to be the gaine of their soules health, as the History saith, great changes were imposed vpon such as went not the voyage, to pay the tenth of all their reuenues, both spirituall and temporall, called for C this occasion the Saladins tenths. Richard King of England came with many Dukes, Marquises, Earles, Barons, great Lords, and an infinit number of yong Gentlemen. The Kings swaue a brotherly and inuolable League : but the continuall and priuate entercourse by the way, bred a familiarity ; and this familiarity engendered a contempt, and contempt hatred, as the course of this Historie will shew. A notable lesson for Kings and Princes, to teach them how farre they should conuerse familiarly. Having crossed the Seas with some difficulties, in the end they come into Syria. The losse of the Crosse made them to besiege Acon, the which they take very valiantly, after great losse of their men : but the Crosse would not be found, As the Originall saith.

The plague fell among their troopes, euery one talkes of returning. Philip speaks first, D pretending indisposition. Richard made some difficulty, lest that Philip in his absence should indeavour to attempt something in his territories of France. Philip hauing assured him by oath, retournes, and passing by Rome, comes safe into France : Hauing left the greatest part of his Forces in the East, vnder the command of Odo Duke of Bourgogne. Richard remaining alone, was better obeyed of the Army, and achieved great and memorable exploits against Saladin, being already amazed and astonished by the taking of Acon. He fortified Gaza and Iaffa, hauing re-peopled them with Christian Colonies, and vanquished Saladin in battell : From thence he resolved to besiege Ierusalem, but as he was kept from this enterpryse by reason of the Winter, so was hee forced to leaue Asia, vpon this occasion, and returne into England. During his voyage and Philips, there had passed E some vnkinde speeches, by reason of Alix Sister to Philip, and the wife of Richard, who in great disdain said : That he had neuer toucht her : and that she should neuer come neer him, blaming her, as if she had bene prodigall of her honour, by a monstrous incest with his Father. Notwithstanding all shewes of friendship at their parting, yet this did sicke in Philips stomacke, who at his returne found his sister Alix at S. Germaine in Lay, whither she was retired, expecting his returne, who failed not to seeke all means of freuenger Richard hath left his brother John in England to gouerne the State in his absence. Philip solicited him, and promifeth him all his meanes, with his sister Alix (being vnworthily reiecte) for a gage of his loue. But Elenor the mother of these Princes, kept John in awe from ioyning openly with Philip against his absent brother, yet could nee not refrain John from giuing his word to Philip, who failes not to feize covertly, seeing his faith plighted, and the reuerence of the cause which held Richard from his house, would not suffer him to worke openly. So hee takes Gisors by intelligence, and all the other Townes of Vexin, which were in controuersie. These newes gaue Richard iust cause to resolve vpon his returne : but it cost him deare, for Saladin (whom he had kept in awe since the taking of Acon) well informed of his necessitie and resolution, makes him to buy a truce for five yeares at a deare rate : yeelding him vp all that had bene taken since the

A the coming of the two Kings into Asia, and so the Blood, Time, and Cost, spent in this conquest, were lost in an houre by the ill government of our Kings.

Richard hauing left the absolute command of the affaires in Asia, to Henry Earle of Champagne, takes his way for England ; but as he came to Vienna, in Austria, hee was knowne and stayed, first by Leopold Duke of Austria, and then by Henry the Emperour, for some discontent hee had against him. Thus Richard was retained 22. months, and not deliuered but for a ranfome of an hundred thousand pounds sterling, which was then a great and notable summe. This was the successe of that long and dangerous Easterne voyage, crossed with so many toiles, takings, and yeeldings vp, and with such troublefome consequences for both Kings & both Realmes : for the quarrell ended not vpon King Richard, release out of prison, as we shall see. Richard being returned into England, hee sought all means of reuenge for the wrongs he supposed to haue receiued vnworthily of Philip in his absence and calamity. But let vs returne to Philip, he had put away Isabel, and taken Alix the daughter of the King of Hungary, who liued not long with him. Shee being dead, hee tooke Gelberge sister to the King of Denmarke, whom likewise he put away, and in her place married Mary the daughter of the Duke of Moravia. After long & bitter controuersie vpon the repudiation of Gelberge, the King remaining obstinate in his resolution, yet in the end hee receiued her againe, beyond all hope, and ended his daies with her, sending backe Mary with honorable meanes to liue in this kind of solitary life, in manner of a widow. But our Inuentory may not excuse it selfe vpon the breuitie of the style, without reporting the manner which Philip held in receiuing Gelberge after so long and obstinate a suite. The King of Denmarke pursued vehemently in the Court of Rome, for the honor and quiet of his sister reiecte : Philip notable to auoide the decision of the cause, and yet resolute not to receiue Gelberge, prepares his Aduocates to shew the reasons which had moued him to put her away. The cause was to be pleaded before the Popes Legate in the great Hall of the Bishops palace at Paris, thither they runne of all sides. In this great and solemne Assembly, Philips Aduocates pleaded wonderfully well for him against his wife, but no man appeared for her. As the cryer had demanded three times if there were any one to speake for Gelberge, and that silence should be held for a consent : D behold a yong man vnknowne, steps forth of the presse, and demanded audience : It was granted him with great attention.

King Philip assisting, euery mans eares were open to heare this Aduocate, but especially Philips, who was toucht and rauished with the free and plaine discourse of truth which hee heard from the mouth of this new Aduocate, so as they might perceiue him to change his countenance. After this yong man had ended his discourse, hee returns into the presse againe, and was neuer scenemore, neither could they learne what hee was, who had sent him, nor whence he came. The Iudges were amazed, and the cause was remitted to the Councell. Philip without any stay in Court, goes to horse, and rides presently to Bois de Vincennes, whither hee had confined Gelberge : hauing imbraced her, hee receiues her into fauour, and passed the rest of his daies with her in nuptiall loue. By Isabel hee had Lewis E the 3. of that name, whom (during his life) hee employed in affaires, & left him the crown, but the peace of his house was blemished by these crooked changes, whereby we may observe by the disquieted mind of this worthy Prince, that there is nothing absolutely perfect in humane affaires. He which could surmount the insolencies of his enemies, could not vanquish his owne passions. Hee that could get elsewhere, could not preferre that which was most pretious, that is, the peace of his house & of his bed : and which is more, that of his soule : who could not liue quietly amidst these continuall debates bred and nourished in his bosome. This was the banquet which was prepared for him at his returne, after so many broyles passed in the voyage of the East. Flanders and England ministred him matter of troubles all his life time, & hee required his enemies with the like, ouer whom hee had victorious aduantages. Baldwin son to Baldwin Earle of Hainault and Namur, called the 4. and of Marguerite of Alsatia heire of Flanders, by the decease of her brother Philip, (dead of late in the East) was then seized of these goodly Signeturies : whereunto hee had added Vermandois, the which hee pretended to belong vnto him by a certaine agreement : but in effect it was by the right of consuetudine : the which hee had seized on in Philips absence, who at his returne recovered it from him by force, with the Country of Artois, the which hee gaue to his son Lewis being now grown great, who took possession possession and received homage from them of the Country. Moreover, Philip caused Baldwin to do homage (as his vassall) for Flanders and other Lands of the low countries, noted by that name at Paris, according to the solemnities required: from thence hee marcheth into Normandy, takes Gisors and the Country of Vexin, giuing it for a dowry to his sister Alix being put away by Richard, whom he had married againe to the Earle of Ponthieu. But suddenly there are complaints from England, That Philip did breake his promise. He replies, That seeing his sister was nothing to Richard, there was no reason he should enjoy her dowry. But this quarrell must proceed farther. Richard receiues his brother Iohn into fauour, and pardons what is past, so as hee will serue him faithfully against Philip, and be no more seduced by his practices. It chanced moreover that Orso of Saxony, the son of Richards sister, was chosen Emperour, in his absence, being then in England, from whence he presently departs, assisted with his vnclcs meanes, the which hereafter shall import him much, Richard seeing how much Tholouse did import him for his Countries of Guienne, enters into a strict League of friendship with Raimond Earle of Tholouse, then a widower by the death of Constance, Aunt to Philip, giuing him Ieane his sister in marriage, the widow of William King of Sicilie.

All these were preparatives of great warre against France. And could Baldwin Earle of Flanders be well satisfied being intreated as we haue seene? Richard ioynes with him. They resolute to make war against Philip in diuers places: hauing assembled their Forces, Baldwin enters into Artois, Richard into Vexin (Countries then in controuersie) where by reason the warre should begin, seeing the proccesse was bred there, Philip without any amazement provides for Artois, sending Forces thither vnder the command of his Son Lewis. Helmselife marcheth in person against Richard, who besieged Corceele, which he belecced in despite of him. Richard not able to hinder these succors, takes his way into the Country of Beauuillain and spoiles it, Philip doth the like in Normandy. All tends to trouble, by the willfulness of these two Princes: when as the Pope (some say Celestin, others Innocent the 3.) sends his Nuncio to exhort the to peace. This perswasion said it not, but only made a diuersion of their armies: for Richard supposing that Philip could not auoide the blow, being engaged in Normandy, hee marcheth into Berry, and being assisted with all his Forces of Guienne, besiegeth Yssoudun, hauing wasted & spoiled all the Country. Philip hauing besieged Vernon (although the name be diuersly quored Vernon, Vernueil or Aumale) he leaues the towne and flies to Richard to draw him to fight: who finding himselfe too weak, retires from the towne, & Philip returnes to his siege, and wins the towne, notwithstanding all the attempts of Richard, who now takes breath to seeke his reuenge, but God hath otherwise disposed, with whom all Princes ought to account for their actions, who laughs at men when they vex theiues most. During his abode at Limoges, hee was aduertised that one of his men at armes had found a great treasure in the ground: this Souldier fearing to be ill rewarded by Richard flies to a small towne of Limotin, which the History called Caalac or Cailus, held by the French, although of the Prouince of Guienne, then belonging to the English. Richard besiegeth it, but as he approached too neer the walls, hee was wounded with an arrow in the left arme. His desire to follow this siege, makes him to neglect his wound, which impaires not being drest. He takes the towne, but the man saues himselfe, hauing hidden his treasure, so as Richard took not the treasure which he hunted after, with a desire so vnseemly for a great Prince: but in stead of taking gold, Death surpris'd him, who leauing his life vpon so light an occasion, leaues a notable example of the vanity of this world, in the lightnes of humane spirits, who suffer themselves to be transported with couetousnesse, a miserable counsellor both to great and small. This death did somewhat temper the bitterness of their diffentions, but it did not quench it betwixt France and England.

Iohn had right to succeed in the Realme of England, as Brother suruiuing the King deceased: but Arthur Duke of Britany, sonne to Jessrey the other brother, as wee haue said, pretended the Crowne to belong vnto him, as the sonne of the elder, Eleanor their mother being yet liuing. Iohn was receiued by the English, so as being in possession, hee had the better and stronger title. Philip fauoured Arthur, but he meant to make his profit of the brother's diuision, and to keepe the stakes. Being fought vnto by Iohn the new King of England (who had then nothing of greater import than his friendship,) he concludes a peace with him, vpon condition, that Iohn should yeeld vp all that his brother

Ather had taken in Berry, and neuer pretend any thing of that which Philip had taken in Vexin in these latter wars: & that Eleanor (Mother to Iohn) Duchesse of Guienne, should do homage to the King for that Prouince, as depending of the crown of France. This accord is ratified by a new alliance, the which encreased no loue. Lewis the son of Augustus, takes to wife Blanche the daughter of Alphonse King of Castill, and of Iohns Sister, being his Niece. In the meane time Philip fauours Arthur vnder-hand, who (assisted by his meanes) takes the City of Tours to his great content. Arthur doth him homage presently for the Countries of Touraine, Aniou, and Maine, and so passeth on and takes Mirebeau, where Eleanor his Grand-mother was, resolving to proceed, but the Almighty God stayd his course. For Iohn comes, besiegeth and takes Mirebeau againe, and Arthur his Nephew likewise.

Eleanor extremely afflicted with these diuisions, dies for griefe, and Iohn puts his Nephew Arthur (whom he held prisoner) to death, to extinguish all controuersies, for the title of the Realme: although this death were cloaked as accidentally fallne out for sorrow. Hence sprung a cruell warre: Constance the Mother of Arthur Duchesse of Britany, demands Iustice of Philip, as her Soueraigne: Philip adiournes Iohn, & (for not appearing) he condemnes him as guilty of the crime imposed, and felony, in disobeying of his commandments. He proclaimes him an enemy, & doth confiscate all he held of the Crown. This sentence is seconded by open force, to make the execution thereof more easie: The

C Britans and Poiteuins, (wonderfully grieved with this cruell fact) arme & come to Philip. So Iohn abandoned of all, flies to Pope Innocent the 3. accusing Philip of the breach of his faith, in making warre against him. Innocent the 3. declaring that the breach of faith belonged properly to his authority, and so by consequence, carying himselfe for Soueraigne Iudge of the controuersie betwixt the two Kings, commands both the one and the other, to lay aside armes, and to suffer the Churches in peace: threatening to curse his Realme that should disobey his authority. Philip shewes, that he hath neither broken his faith nor peace with Iohn: But that he being his vassall, had laine his Nephew, in the territories of his obedience, as it appeared by good proofes, so as it was not reasonable the holy authority of the Church, should serue as a defence or support for his impunity. D In so detestable a crime, seeing the punishments of sabbicids and vassals, appertained to the Prince by all diuine and humane lawes. But there were new complaints to the Pope against Philip: that finding himselfe oppressed with war, hee imposed certaine tenths vpon the Clergy, to ease the people, who complained of their burthens. He did not exact this of the Church by his owne decree, but had assembled a Nationall Councell at Souissons to that end. The Pope said, this was done against his authority, and not only threatened Philip with his censure, but also all the Clergy that had assisted at this Assembly: Philip lets him vnderstand, That (touching the Clergie of the Realme) it was necessary that out of their abundance they should helpe to beare the charge for their common preferation: the which hee would discharge when as the necessity ceased. And hauing thus sent backe the Popes Nuncio, he pursues Iohn, so as in few daies he becomes master of all Normandy, the which had bene diuided from the Crowne since the yeare of our Lord 885: as wee haue sayd.

Normandy being thus reduced to obedience, with an admirable celerity, Poitou doth likewise yeeld vnto him: Iohn vpon this plarum comes to Rochelle, & from thence passeth into Aniou, but in vaine. He takes & vnpeoples Angers, & seekes to seize vpon Britaine, being well guarded through the care of their Duke Guy, so as he knowes not which way to turne him: when as suddenly behold new occasions in Flanders, the which hee feeds all the can to kindle new troubles, whereby he hopes to finde some rest: but his death shall Releall these toyles, as due punishments for his blind couetousnesse & horrible parricide. He seeks all meanes possible to trouble Philip with the ruine of France: Flanders misers matter by this meane. We haue formerly spoken of Baldwin Earle of Flanders, who after he had done his homage to Philip, he resolves to passe into Asia to succour the afflicted Christians. He had two daughters, Iohne and Margueris, the which he left in the charge of Philip Earle of Namour their vncl, with the Kings good liking, who required the eldest to giue her in marriage to Ferrand of Portugall, to the dislike of the Flemings; and in the end hee took her himselfe, when as he hoped for profit. Iohn employing all his meanes, he first vnto this instrument to oppose him against Philip in his ayde. Orso the Emperour his Nephew ioynes with him in such sort, as France was in great danger of ruine, by so great Forces in so resolute an Enterprise.

Philip takes counsell for his passage into England, finding so good successe in his Affaires. Ferrand having openly in counsell disswaded this attempt, shewing it to be both vniust and impossible, he made many of the chiefe to wauer, ouer whom Philip commanded with great respect, and among the rest, Regnauld Earle of Bologne, of whom hee had great need, for his descent into England, holding him in suspect, he sought to make trial of his faith, offering him a French Garison, the which he refused; whereupon Philip comes to Bologne, where the people giue him entry, and Count Regnauld (discouering himselfe) retires into Flanders to Ferrand. The league was great against Philip, being encountered by two fo great enenies, neighbours, and vnited: but Otho the Emperour swaid most, hauing promised to assilt John his vncl with all his meanes in this warre. But the issue of this great league was not answerable to their designe. Philip fore-sees this storme, and resolues to preuent it. He goes to Field, seizeth vpon Cassal, Ypre and Lisle, and takes assurance of the Cities of Gant and Bruges, employing his Sonne Lewis in these exploits, hauing meane thereby to be in sundry places, by so faithfull a Lieutenant. On the other side, Count Ferrand falls vpon Tournais, and hauing taken Tournay, hee crossieth *Philip*s delignes: John hauing sent an Army to Sea, defeats the Kings Fleet at Dam: and hauing passed into France, he recouers Poitou. In the meane time the Emperour Otho comes downe with a great and mighty Army, in which they number an hundred and fifty thousand Foot, and a notable troop of Horse, not specified. There were great Captains on eyther side. Against the King were Ferrand and Regnauld resolute men, who had fury and hope to encourage them. Otho the Emperour brought his honour with the Imperiall Eagle in the view of all Europe. John hauing intelligence of some stirrs in England, returnes with speed, leaving his army to his Confederates, and providing to send vnto them vpon all occasions. On Philip side, his greatest advantage was in his owne person, who did glister like the Sunne. Lewis likewise was there: Odo Duke of Bourgogne, and the Earle of Saint Paul held the first rankes. The common Souldiers were nothing inferior to their enemies in courage, and they surmounted them in number and expectation of victory: for who would doubt but the greatest number should vanquish. But the souereigne Iudge of victories had otherwise decreed, whom Philip had called on in this extreme danger. He fought to encounter his enemies apart, but God had prepared him a greater triumph in a greater Combat. The armies were betwixt Lisle and Tournay, where there was a Riuer to be passed by a bridge. Philip takes it, and whilst the Army passed in their rankes, he sleeps: being awaked, they giue him intelligence that the Emperour had passed the Riuer at a Ford, meaning to charge him behinde. Philip when hee had prayed vnto God (a circumstance very profitably obserued in the History) meaning to preuent him, hee caused those troopes to turne head which had passed the Riuer, and that with such celerity as they came vpon their enemies backs. The combat was furious on eyther side, vnder the most famous Ensignes of the world.

On the one side, was the Eagle holding a Dragon in his Talons: on the other side the Aurifume or standard of France. The Germanes, Dutch and English, shot at the King, the French at the Emperour, the King was in extreme danger, ouerthrowne vnder his horse, which was slaine, and rescued by Hugh of Marueil. The fame of which fact is more honorable to his posterity, then the Lordship of Mille-bois, which was giuen him by the King in recompence of fo worthy a seruice. The Emperour Otho hauing fought valiantly, was in danger to haue falne into the Kings hands, as the Earles Ferrand and Regnauld did, hauing performed as much as Valiant Captaines might doe. But God would punish (both in the Emperour and in them) the rashnesse of an vnecessary warre. The slaughter was great on either side: blood vniustly spilt through ambition and conuentionall reproachfull causes of a voluntary losse. The signes of an absolute victory remaine to our Augustus. The field enignes, yea, and the Imperiall Eagle, (which was to be instead of tearing) the chiefe Commanders, the Camp and dead bodies, Philip added to the triumph of this victory of his valour, dismissing all the baster prisoners, and honouring the Nobles with good viage, and their liberty. He retained Ferrand and Regnauld prisoners, whom hee accused of ingratitude and rashnesse, to haue rebelled without cause against their King and benefactor, he led them in triumph to Paris, where he made a large peny, drawing them

A them chained in litters, and condemned them to perpetuall prison: Regnauld to Peronne, and Ferrand to the Louvre at Paris. All France made Bonfires for this happy successe, and Philip built a Temple in honour of the holy Virgin, which he called Victory, neere to Senlis. By a decree of the Parliament at Paris, the Earledome of Flanders was adjudged vnto the King as forfeited, who gaue it againe to Jane the heire of the said Earledome, being not guilty of her husbands treachery.

This memorable victory called the battell of Bouvins chanced in the year 1215. the five and twentieth day of Iuly. To make his triumph absolute, Philip gaue free passage to the Germanes, and Otho the Emperour being returned to his house, willingly resigned the B Empire, and died of a pining griefe, which neuer left him after that shameful flight, hauing willingly sought his owne misery: in supporting wrong against right, and searching danger, to perish in danger. A notable example which shewes, That victories come from the Eternall, that mortall man dies before his time by his owne rashnesse, and that no vniust warre can be successfull.

But what shall become of John the only motiue of this war? while the Emperour, and the Earles of Flanders and Bologne (great Princes whom he had imbarqued) be at war, he remains at home free from blowes attending the euent. Seeing his confederates thus defeated, he fears the whole storme will fall vpon him, what doth he? he plaies at Double or Quire, and flies to Innocent the 4. as to his Sanctuary. And being forced to saue his Estate in this extremity, hee resolues to giue him a good part. The Popes hatred, with the power of France, was the last end of his downe-fall. The Pope had excommunicated him, not only for the parricide of his Nephew Arthur, but for the ill vsage of his Clergy. To purchase fo difficult an absolution, there needed a great satisfaction. Hee therefore sends confident men in all haste to Innocent the 4. humbly beseeching him to pittie him in his calamity. That if it would please him to receive him into grace, and protect him against the King of France, he would bring the Realmes of England & Siegneury of Ireland, to hold of him and his successors, and in signe of obedience to pay him a yearly tribute of a thousand marks of silver. This franke offer caused *John*s Ambassadors to be wel entertained. Innocent sends his Legat presently to absolve him, to passe the contract, & to receive the homages of fealty, as well of himselfe, as of his subiects. John is absolved, and hauing laide his Crowne, Scepter, Cloake, Sword and Ring, (the Royall ornaments of a King) at the Legats feet, he doth him homage for his Realme of England, kissing his feet as his tributary; and binds the English to the like duty by a solemne oth. He was also willing to discharge that which he had taken from his Clergy. This shall be the meane to make him lose both his estate and life. This hapned in the year 1215. These things being performed in England, the Legat returns into France, and denounceth vnto Philip in the Popes name, That hee should suffer John to enioy his Realme of England in peace, and freely to possesse the lands which he held by homage of the Crowne of France. Moreover, that he should satisfy the great complaints which the Clergie of his Realme had made against him, restoring that which he had exacted from them during the warres, vpon paine of excommunication, if hee did not presently obey. Philip promisseth to submit himselfe: and before the Legats departure, he frees the Clergie of his Realme of the tenths which hee had exacted for the charge of the warres, according to the decree of a Nationall Councell held at Soissons.

John liues at peace in England, for that which concerned Philip: but (see, he is the instrument of his owne misery. Being exhaust of meanes, through the long and chargeable warres, wherewith England had bene afflicted, he had bound himselfe to the Pope, to restore vnto the Clergy, all such summes of money as he had extorted from them, during his troubles: and for want of payment, hee sees an excommunication ready, the which was reuoked, but vpon condition of obedience. Thus freeing the Clergy, he sur-chargeth the people: and pressed by the Pope to satisfy his command, he oppresseth his subiects, by extraordinary impositions, and tyrannicall exactions, adding force to his commands. So as it fell out, that as hee could not helpe the one without hurting the other, and that the people hate him commonly that wrongs them: behold the English make strange complaints in Parliament against John, who doth incense them the more by his rigorous answers. The English seeing themselves reioiced by their King, fly to extraordinary remedies, & being denied iustice by him that should giue it, they seek it elsewhere, choosing a King in the place of a Tyrant. France was their only refuge in these circumstances, and there.

The English receive John, and offer the Realm to Philip.

Lewis of France received by the English.

The Pope sends to Philip for John.

King John dyes for griefe.

Our English Chronicles say that hee was poisoned by a Monk.

The English change their opinion.

The English receive Henry the sonne of John, & disclaime Lewis of France.

Auvergne united unto the Crowne of Philip the eighth.

therefore they send the chiefe Noblemen of the realme to Philip, to offer him the Crowne of England, promising to obey him as their lawfull King. Philip (who desired nothing more) makes shew to refuse it: pretending both the truemade with John, and his word passed to the Pope, but vnderhand he sends them his sonne Lewis, his faithfull Lieutenant, giuing him a traine fit for his person in to great an exploit.

Lewis having taken hostages of the English (for assurance of their faith,) he passeth into England, being receiued of them all with greatioy, as the Prince from whom they attended their health and quiet: He makes his entry into London, which was the Rendezvous of his most confident friends; and by their example many cities come and offer him obedience. In the meane time, complaints come to Philip from Pope Innocent as if he had broken his faith; and threats, if he did not repaire it. Philip denies any breach of faith. They be (saide he) the discontentes of the English against John, whom they accuse to haue slaine Arthur their lawfull King: and hauing free liberty to make a new election, they repaired to his Son, who was of age to gouerne himselfe, for whose errors hee was not answerable. But attending the end of this sute, let vs returne to England. John held strong places, Winchester (whither he had retired himselfe) Windolifor or Windfor, Norwich & Douer, he had likewise factions in other cities. Lewis (receiuing homage from many of them) commandeth his Army to march, to reduce the Cities to obedience, who for the most part receiued him willingly. Norwich yeelds without any dispute: from thence he goes to Douer, (hauing attempted the Captaine by means of his brother, whom he held prisoner) he resolves to take it by force, and in the meane time he besiegeth Windfor by some Noblemen of his party. John sleepees not, he makes a vertue of necessity, employing all his meanes to leauy men, and to keepe what remained. But behold an accident which ends both his suite and his life. One of his Captaines brings him certaine troops to releue Winchester, where he attended the Siege, but they were charged by Lewis his men. John seeing his people perish, some by the sword, and the rest drowned flying to saue themselves, oppressed in his conscience, not able to endure the reuenging furies of his Ne-phewes blood vniufully spilt, he falls to a despairing griefe, and shortly after dyes, suffering the punishment of his iniustice and cruelty. Leaving a notable example and president to all men, neuer to hope for good by doing euill, although the offender grow obdurate by the delay of punishment. This was after eightene yeares patience, during the which John reigned with much trouble, a slave to his furious passions, which is a cruel and insupportable commander.

Thus the decree of Gods iust iudgement against John the parricide, was put in execution in the yeare 1217. But this death of John did not settle Lewis in his new Royalty, as it was expected. The discontent of the English dyes with John, and the loue of their lawfull Prince reuiues in his Sonne Henry. God limits the bounds of States, which mans striving cannot exceed. The Sea is a large ditch to diuide England from France: the Pirenei Spaine, and the Alpes Italy, if audacious ambition and courtousnesse would not attempt to force Nature. The English (pleased with his death that made them to languish) cast their eyes vpon their lawfull King. The Pope interposeth his authority for Henry against Lewis; who desirous to preferre what hee had gotten, prepares his Forces, when as the losse of his Fleet (comming from France to England) makes him to change his resolution, yeelding to reason and time: restoring another man his right and estate, to keepe his owne at home the surer and safer. Thus Henry the third, the sonne of John, was receiued King of England, and Lewis returned into France: but *John*s posterity shall be reuenged of the children of Lewis with more and heauier blowes then he had giuen: Lewis (being returned into France) findes worke at home to employ him in warre, which hee fought beyond the Seas. The occasion was to make head against the Albigeois, of whom we will discourse in his life, and not interrupt the course of this reigne. It is now time to finish this tedious relation of *Philip*s actions, and to shew the conclusion of his life. Hee did confiscate the Earldome of Auvergne, and vnitied it vnto the Crowne, taking it from Guy, being found guilty of Rebellion: this was his last act. All the remainder of his dayes were consecrated to make good Lawes for the well gouerning of the Realme. At Paris hee did institute the Prouost of Merchants, and the Sheriffs, for the politicke gouernment thereof: he caused the Citie to be paved, being before very noysome by reason of the dirt and mire: hee built the Halls and the Louvre, being beautified since by Henry the second with a goodly pauillion

A pauillion, and the rest of the new lodging: whereunto King Henry 4. did adde a Gallery of admirable beauty. He walked in Bois de Vincennes, and replenisht it with Deere & with diuers other sorts of wilde beasts: hee finished that admirable and sumptuous building of our Ladies Church, whereof the foundation was only laid, vnkowne by whom.

He made lawes against Vsurie, Players, Iuglers and Dycing-houses. An enemy to publicke dissolutions, and a friend to good order and Iustice. Hee releued the people ouercharged by reason of the wars. He restored vnto the Clergy all the reuenues he had taken from them during his greatest affaires. And thus he employed this last act of his life to gouerne the Realme, to the which he had vnitied a good part of that which was alienated by Hugh Capet. That is, all Normandy, a good part of Guienne, the Earldomes of Aniou, Touraine, Maine, Vermandois, Cambresis, Vallois, Clermont, Beaumont, Auvergne, Pontieu, Alanfon, Limosin, Vandoline, Dampmartin, Morraigne, and Aumale. Wee shall hereafter see, how the rest of the Crowne-lands returned according to the diuers meanes which God gaue by the good gouernment of our Kings.

Philip employed his peaceable old age in this sort, when as God did summon him to leaue his Realme to take possession of a better. Hee was very sicke of a quartaine ague, which kept him long languishing in his bed, giuing him meanes to meditate vpon his death, and to provide for the Estate of his Realme; leaving a good guide, whom he had leasure and meanes to fashion, yet could he not make him the perfect heire of his vertues and happinesse. Although Lewis his sonne were not vicious, yet had hee nothing excellent to make him apparent amongst other Kings. He would not Crowne him in his life time, being taught by the late and neighbour example of the ill gouernment of England, betwixt the Father and the Sonne: finding his Forces to faile him by the continuance of this Feuer, hee made his will; In the which he dealt bountifully with his seruants, according to their deserts: hee gaue great Legacies towards the Chriftians warre in the East, and to the Temples, who were then held in great reputation, to be very necessary for the guard of Chriftendome: hee gaue new rents to Hospitals, and to very many Churches.

And so he died in peace, the yeare of our Lord 1223. the first of Iuly, at the age of 59. He beloued and lamented of his subiects. He was 15. yeares old when he began to reigne, & gouerned 44. yeares. He left two sonnes, Lewis and Philip, and one daughter called Marguerite. Vnhappy in his house, and very happy in his reigne. His minority was reasonable good, but his age was very reuerend, crowned with all the contents a mortall man could desire in this mortall life. Hauing left many testimonies of his vertues, to make his memory deare and respected of his posterity: his Estate peaceable: his heire knowne and beloued of his subiects, and of age and experience to gouerne himselfe, and to force obedience. A Prince rightly called Augustus, whom we may number among the greatest. He was most religious, wife, moderate, valiant, discreet and happy: a louer of Iustice, or order, and of policy: friend to the people, enemy to disorders, dissolutions and publicke violence: charitable, liberrall, and iudicious to giue with discretion. To conclude, the pattern of a great King, by whom our Kings should take example, to learne how to gouerne the helme of an Estate, in the tempest and stormes of many toyles and confusions, and by the managing and successe of his reigne, to gather this goodly poeie, or rather to take this passport for the confirmation and greatnesse of Kings: That a vertuous King is in the end happy, howsoeuer he be compassed in with difficulties. But before wee enter into a new reigne, order requires that we obserue the estate of the Church and Empire. *Fredericke*s humility to the Pope, had somewhat calmed the violence of these factions, and his voyage to the holy Land, to performe his full obedience, seemed to bring a perfect peace to Chriftendome: when as behold a new cause of troubles.

Fredericke going for Asia, had with the consent of the Princes of the Empire, confirmed his eldest Son Henry Emperour, but he being dead, and his Sonne Henry to succeed him, Pope Innocent opposed another Emperour, which was this Otho, of whom wee haue spoken, and did excommunicate Henry in hatred of his Father Fredericke. *Otho*s ambitious of command, caused Henry to be murdered in his Chamber. But it chanced, that hauing committed this fact, he went to receiue that disgrace in France, which was his death: and Fredericke the second succeeded him, so as hee liued when as our Augustus left the Crowne to his Sonne Lewis.

the blood flowed by the losse of threecore thousand persons: & in the end it was spoiled, A fackt, burnt and made desolate. All other townes being terrified, yielded at the first summons. Carcassone held out, but it was taken by compulsion: That the inhabitants should depart all naked, only their privie parts covered, and halsters about their necks. Castelnau likewife would not obey, yet in the end it yielded, and Simon caused 50. men to be burned alive. Alby obeyes without force. Lauaur by the resolution of Gerarde the Lady of the place, did resist, but the towne was taken by force, and this woman cast into a Well: A-maulry a gentleman of the Country, (who had maintained the siege against Simon,) was hanged. By these fearful examples, Castres, Rabastens, Gaillac, la Caussade, Puy Laurence, Saint Antonin, and Saint Marcell yeeld; Cahors followes, but Moissac being obstinate, was taken and spoiled. This sudden execution amazed Count Raimond, who having excused himselfe touching the Legates death, and being so neere allied vnto the King his brother in law, he attended nothing lesse then an army against him: yea hearing of the leasy, and seeing it to march, he feared not that which was put in execution against his subjects. He conceived it had beene onely to countenance the sermons of Saint Dominike who accompanied the Army with a notable number of Clergy men. Being awaked with so great a losse, he seeks out all meanes and friends to oppose them against Count Simon, of Montford, who was wonderfully feared by reason of so victorious a successe. King Alphonso of Arragon, and the Earles of Cominges and Foix, bring him great troopes. Incouraged by these examples to their preferation, Raimond employes all he can, his army (as they say) consisted of an hundred thousand men.

As this Army of the Albigeis by Count Raimond, goes to field to recover their lost townes, Simon opposeth himselfe courageously with far lesser Forces, and yet overthrow these great numbers with little losse. Alphonso was slaine in this defeat, the taking and sacke of Tholouse followed, where there died 20000. men by the victors sword, the cities of Rouergue and Agenois (terrified with this feare proceeding) yielded obedience vnto Simon. This happened in the year 1215. the place of the battell is diuerly reported, at Muret or at Mirebeau. After this strange and ruinous defeat, Count Raimond (being spoiled of his possessions) retires into Spaine to the Estates of King Alphonso, attending meanes to repair his affaires in better season. In the meane time Simon doth promise himselfe the property of all Raimonds estates, which he had gotten with his sword: but for that it was apparent, that the King of France would hardly grant so goodly a Prouince, taken from his kinsman, to one of his subjects, Simon therefore flies vnto the Pope, by whose authority this war was chiefly managed, and from whom hee attended his chiefe recompence, having laboured for him. Innocent the third, finding that Philip (who would not desist in his pursuit against John King of England, notwithstanding his interdictions) would not be moved now by his simple authority, to leave so important a peece: he assembles a great Council, meaning to force the King to yeeld vnto his will. The Patriarks of Ierusalem and Constantinople were there in person and those of Antioch and Alexan-dia sent their deputies, there were twenty Archbishops, foure hundred Bishops, and thousand Abbots and Priors. The Emperors of the East and West: the Kings of France, England, Spaine, Ierusalem, Cipres, and other Kings, Princes and great Estates had their Ambassadors. By a decree of this notable Assembly, Count Raimond was excommunicated with all his associates, and his lands adiudged to Simon of Montford, for his service done (and to doe) to the Catholike church. Philip could not gaine-say this decree confirmed in a manner by the consent of the whole world. Hee therefore received Simon to homage, for the Prouince of Languedoc, whereof he rooke peaceable possession: but he did not long enjoy it: for seeing himselfe inuaded, he began to oppresse his new subjects.
An eele is lost with ouer gripping. The people of Languedoc finding themselves oppressed with this insupportable burthen of Simon, they resolute to call home their Count Raimond who was retired into Spaine, to seeke some meanes to recover the possession of his estate.
His case was not desperate, for he inioined the Earldomes of Viuaretz, Venaiffon, and the City of Auignon, places kept by his subjects during these occurrences, whither Simons Forces were not yet come. Raimond (being called by his subjects) returns into Languedoc accompanied with a notable troop of Arragonois, being discontented for the death of their King Alphonso. The whole country bandied against Simon, hating him as an vsurper, & de-testing him as a tyrant, for doublese vnjust and violent things cannot continue. Whilst

A that Simon seeks to bridle the Cities of his new conquests, leaping from place to place, with an infinite toile, behold Raimond is receiued into Tholouze by intelligence, and with great ioy of the inhabitants. Simon abandons all the rest, and flies thither: but he finds a stop, for coming to the gates of the City, as he approached neere the wals to parlee, he was hurt in the head with a stone, whereof he died. The example of Tholouze made the greatest part of the subdued Cities to reuolt. Simon of Montfort left two sonnes, Guy and Amaulry: vpon the reuolt of Tholouze, the one seizeth vpon Carcassone, the other of Narbonne: but Guy was slaine in Carcassone by the inhabitants, who were the stronger. Amaulry having fortified Narbonne, repaires to Philip Augustus, beseeching him to succour him in his necessity. Philip held the Wolfe by the eare: for as on the one side he desired this goodly Prouince for himselfe, rather then for the children of Simon of Montfort, so was he also restrained by the authority of the Pope and Councell. Hee therefore sends his sonne Lewis into Languedoc, to reduce the Country to his obedience.
But he had scarce taken any one castle, when as his fathers death calls him home. So as Count Raimond and his subjects of Languedoc had time to reuiue their spirits, and recouer many places gotten by Simon. The King of England would neither assent nor send to the coronation of Lewis, although he were held as Duke of Guienne. This occasion moued Lewis to warre against him; whereby he got Niort and Rochel: and Sauary of Mau-leon Gouvernor for the English, retired to his seruice. This losse made the warre more C violent.

Richard Earle of Cornwaile, brother to Henry King of England, passed into France with a goodly Army, and having taken Saint Macaire, Langon, and Reolles, (townes sca-ted vpon the riuer of Garonne) and defeated some French troopes, hee made way for a Truce, which was fauourable for both parties; but especially for Lewis, being desirous to settle matters in Languedoc, which troubled him, for the daily proceedings of the Albigeois; yet was he loth to labour for another. For this reason he treats with Amaulry Earle of Montfort, touching the right that hee to that Country: with whom hee preualled the more easily, for that having lost the greatest part of the Prouince, hee was not able to hold the rest with the Kings dislike, to whom he resigned it, by order of a decree, D made by the Pope in the Councell of Latran: and in recompence hee made him Constable of France, with the consent of Pope Honorius. Having compounded with the children of Simon Montfort, he resolved to winne Count Raimond to his deuotion, and to perswade him to lay aside Armes, where he did see the euent to be very doubtful. His intent was to winke this rich Prouince of Languedoc to the Crowne. But reason which saith that no man thinks his owne too much: the respect which great men doe vsually beare one to another, and the alliance which the house of France had with the Coun-tie of Tholouze, were great restraints for the couetousnesse of Lewis. But howsoeuer, hee determined to make himselfe the stronger, and to prescribe them a law. To this end hee leauied a great Army, fortified with his Edicts, by the which hee thunders against these E poore Albigeois, as Hereticks and Rebels. These Edicts were of force, whereas his authority was respected. Count Raimond (considering with himselfe the cruell beginning of this warre, and the continuance of the like misery in these second armes, fearing to em-barke himselfe the third time with a people against his King) is easily perswaded by Lewis to reconcile himselfe to Pope Honorius. Thus Raimond leauing to oppose himselfe, yields to Lewis, and perswades the Earle of Cominges (the chiefe agent of his designs) to the like obedience. Thus both of them abandon the people, and goe to Rome, they make their peace with the Pope, and leaue the Albigeois to the mercy of Lewis, who seeing them without a head, embraceth this occasion to their ruine. High and base Languedoc was wholly in his power, by Raimonds departure. Auignon remained, with many other places in the County of Venaiffon, and in Prouence. Hee besiegeth Auignon and takes it: from thence he passeth into Prouence, whereas all yeelds to his will. The Counties of Viuaretz and Die yeeld without blowes, and many families were made desolate, by the rigour of these Edicts, which did forfeit both bodies and goods. The house of Mau-ler, one of the greatest of Viuaretz, having followed the Albigeois party (being cursed makes his peace by meanes of the towne of Argentiere, giuen to the Bishop of Viunty, who enioyeth it vnto this day. These poore miserable people were dispersed here and there, and such as remained in the Country, were forced to acknowledge the Pope as soueraigne

soveraign pastor of the Church. This hear was for a while restrained, but the seeds were not rooted out: as we shall see in the following reignes.

Lewis dies.

Lewis having thus subdued the Albigeois, gave order to suppress them, if they should rise againe: appointing the Marshall of Foy of the house of Myrepolis, to command his Forces, and leaving the Lord of Beauieu for Gouvernor and Lieutenant general of Languedoc, he tooke his way towards France. But coming to Montpensier in Auvergne, he died in the year 1227, the 27. of October, leaving four sonnes by his wife Blanche: Lewis which succeeded him; Robert Earle of Arthois, who died in Morez; Alphonso Earle of Poitiers; and Charles Earle of Anjou, who shall be Earle of Prouence, and King of Sicilia and Ierusalem. In this year the Flemings were much disquieted by means of an Impostor, who said he was their Prince; but he received condigne punishment for his rashnesse, and by his death this error vanished, wherewith many had bene bewitched. Lewis the eldest sonne of France, succeeding his father, goes now to sit in the royall Throne.

LEVVIS the ninth, called S. LEVVIS:

The 44. King of France.

Blanche Regent of the King and Realme.

HE piety and good disposition of this Prince, consecrated to the happy memory of his posterity, represented vnto France goodly first-fruits: but his age (not yet capable to gouerne the helme of this Monarchie) suffered him onely to take the first and most pretious game of his lawfull and hereditary right: for being but twelue years old, he was crowned at Rheims, but his mother Blanche (a wife and courageous Princeesse) tooke vpon her the gouernment of his person and Realme; according to the decree of Lewis the eight who knowing her capacity, had appointed her for Regent. He beganne to reigne in the year 1227. Blanche had much honour in the education and instruction of her sonne, the which purchased her the free consent of the Estates (assembled at Paris) to be admitted Regent: but this was not pleasing to the Princes of the blood, who pretended this prerogative to appertaine vnto them, and not to a woman and a stranger borne. From these discontents sprang two wars in France, in the beginning of his reigne, the which were suppressed, not onely by the discretion of Blanche, but also by the wisdom and valour of young Lewis, who then played his part with so good successe, as hee purchased great credit in his youth.

A faction in France for the Regency.

The heads of this faction, were Philip Earle of Bologne, vnder to the King by the fathers side; Robert Earle of Champagne; Peter of Dreux Duke of Britanie; and Robert Earle of Dreux his brother: Princes of the blood, valiant, and factious men, who had embarked many of the Nobility, vnder a goodly pretext; That it was not reasonable a Spanish woman, (abusing the Kings minority) should gouerne the Realme at her pleasure, and by the counsell of Spaniards, whom she advanced, rejecting the Princes, keeping backe the naturall French from all preferments. But that which was most to be feared in this occurrent of affaires, was that Raimond Earle of Tholouza, who had so great a subiect of discontent against the King (being spoiled of the greatest part of his Estate should ioine with that party, and draw his cousin the Earle of Prouence into the same quarrell: men which were neither dull-witted nor gouty-handed, and who were nothing altered in minde, although they had made a good shew, yielding to necessity: the which Blanche perceived happily, winning Count Raimond (who now began to rise in Languedoc) by the marriage of Isabel his only daughter with Alphonso the Kings brother, & Earle of Poitiers, vpon condition that Raimond should enjoy it during his life, & that after his death the said Alphonso should succeed in the right of his wife; and if they had no issue, the Earle dome with all the dependances, should returne to the Crowne as to his first beginning. Thus Languedoc shaken at the first by armes (as we haue said) was honorably vnto the Crowne of France, by this accord, as the History will hereafter shew in the reigne of Philip, sonne to our Lewis. By the like meanes the drew Robert Earle of Champagne vnto her, a very

A very factious man, and did not onely thereby weaken the party of these discontented Princes thus disioyned, by withdrawing the most sufficient man they had, but also the employed him against them. There remaind a Triumuiate, the which three diuided. They made a good shew, but Blanche did cunningly counterminne them, discouering their actions euen within their Cabinets, where she found access by money. In the end their practice must breake forth.

Blanche supplants the discontented Princes.

The Earle of Bologne fortified Calais, and the Duke of Britaine, with the Earle of Dreux, did purposely demand some of the Crowne-lands, which they knew well, that Blanche would not yeeld vnto, as inalienable; whereby they might pretend some colour to rebell. They now goe to armes, and at the first seize vpon Saint Iames of Beuron, and Beleime. Blanche flies to the Maiesty of the King, and threatens these armed Princes to proclaim them Rebels, and guilty of high treason if they obey not. The confederate Princes answer: That they most humbly beseech his Maiesty to giue them free access, to complaine of his mother, who abused both his name and his authority. Blanche admits them, being well aduertised by the Earle of Champagne, that their intent was (vnder colour of this parlee) to seize vpon the Kings person. Their desire was to haue this meeting at Vendome, but they had layd their ambush neerer to surprise him by the way. They had advanced their troopes to Corbeil, when as the King parted from Paris: being ariued at Montchery, newes came that the troopes marched to surprise him.

Lewis in danger to be surprised by his Rebels.

The King retires to the Castle (then being of some strength) and Blanche giues it out that the King is in a manner besieged. The Parisians arme speedily, and goe in great troopes to fetch their King, to make the Leaguers thereby more odious, and to confirme the Queenes authority.

These Princes being thus discouered, depart from Corbeil, and enter Champagne in hatred of the Earle, who had forsaken them to follow the Kings party: But Lewis taking him into his protection, and marching towards them with his men at armes: all their designs came to nothing: And yet they had embarked the Duke of Loraine, and the King of England in this quarrell. Lewis having expelled them Champagne, follows his course, takes Angiers, without any contradiction, belonging then vnto the Britans, and from thence he marcheth into Britany. Terror opens the gates of all the townes. The Earle of Dreux leaves his brother, who (seeing himselfe abandoned of them all, but first of iudgement) confesseth his fault, and doth homage to the King for Britany: and by this rebellion, he gets the name of Masclercok, having so ill employed his time, as to suffer himselfe to be vanquished by a child and a woman.

The League broken.

These troubles thus pacified (to the dishonor of the authors) the young King wonne great reputation, and his mothers wisdom was generally commended, who thought it fit that her Sonne should be seene of all his subiects. As he went this progresse, he received homage from all his Nobility, and ordained many things according to occurrents. It chanced, that having erected Poitou to an Earle dome, and given it to Alphonso his brother; Hugh Earle of Marche (which lies within Poitou) would not acknowledge Alphonso for his Lord: his wife Isabel mother to King Henry of England (who had bene first married to King Iohn) was the motive; for coming to subiect her selfe to an Earle of Poitou. This ambitious passion was the cause of great warre: First the drew in the Earle of Lusignan, vnder the same pretext (for that there had bene Kings of Ierusalem and Cyprus) issued out of this Noble house; and afterwards the King of England. The first tumult not prevented, had almost surprised Lewis within Saumur, and this woman transported with pride and hatred, sought to make him away either by poison or sword, kindling the warre in England by hired Preachers. In the end, after the two Armies had made great spoile in Poitou, Xaintonge, and Angoulmois, both of friend and enemy, a peace was concluded with the English, vpon condition, that La Marche should remaine in France. This was the end of that feminine rage, ridiculous in the issue; but lamentable for the poore people, who alwayes pay for the folly and malice of Princes.

Lewis makes a progresse throughout his Realme.

Prouence was gouerned by the Berengiers (as we haue said) since the ouerthrow of Lewis the sonne of Boson: and then in the hands of Raimond Berenger, a fierce and cruell man: who had so incensed his subiects, being impatient and turbulent of himselfe; as they had recourse to Raimond Earle of Tholouza, his nearest kinsman, to install him in their Earles place, with whom they would haue no more correspondency. Being ready to arme, the felicity of Lewis pacified all. Raimond Earle of Prouence had foure daughters, Marguerite which was wife to our Lewis the ninth, and Queene of France: Elenor which was married to Henry King of England: Sancho to Richard his brother, Duke of Cornewaile: and Beatrice which was to marrie. Daughters of great happinesse: hauing had three Kings, and a royall Prince. The Earle of Prouence would hardly haue bene controuled by Lewis, but Gon (who meant to plant a generall peace in France, by the hand of this good King) buried Raimond with his rage in one tombe, taking him out of the world, whom a whole world could not containe. Lewis after the decease of Raimond, pacified the Prouencals, in marrying his brother Charles Earle of Aniou, with Beatrice the daughter of their Earle, to their great content: adding (in fauour of this marriage) Maine to Aniou. And since this Charles was King of Sicily. Robert the younger brother was Earle of Arthois. By this meanes his brethren remained satisfied. Alphonfus being Earle of Poitou and Tholoufa, by his portion and marriage: Charles Earle of Prouence and Aniou: and Robert Earle of Arthois: and the Realme continued in happy peace.

These things thus happily performed by Lewis, hee employed his care in the reformation of the Realme, beginning first with his household: then did hee plant Religion and Iustice (the principall pillars of a State) for the good and ease of the people. Hee led a life worthy of a King, louing and honouring Religion with much zeale and respect, taking delight in the reading of the holy Scriptures, the which he caused to bee translated into the French tongue, which I haue scene in a Gentlemans custody, carying this title. Hee did greatly honour Clergy-men, being worthy of their places, and was a seuerer Censor of them that did abuse it, whom he charged to liue according to their Canons, and to shew themselves patternes of good life to the people. That they should bee preferred to Ecclesiasticall dignities according to order, in all liberty, and should enioy their reuenues without lett: That the exactions and insupportable charges imposed by the Court of Rome (these are the words of his Edict) on the Realme of France, by the which it was mightily impouerished, and which hereafter might be leauied, should not in any sort be leauied without apparent cause, his expresse command and the approbation of the French Church. He had a good soule, being iust, sober, modest, temperate in his eating and drinking, in his talke, habits, and conuersation, neither melancholicke, nor exceeding merry, in circumspet, of a good iudgement, stayed, charitable, moderate, vigilant, and seuerer in the obsecration of that he had decreed.

The patternes of an excellent Prince.

And as the Prince is the rule of his house, he either chose seruants of his owne humor, or else his seruants framed themselves vnto his disposition: so as hee had his treasure replenished to giue to such as deserved. Hee payed his seruants well, yet hee gouerned his treasure in such sort, as his officers could hardly steale from him, and such as offended he punished with so exact a seuerity, as the rest feared to commit the like. The orders for his treasure are registred in his Ordinances, where you may see them at large. Hee loued and cherished learning and learned men, and delighted to reade and heare good Workes: fauouring his Vniuersity of Paris, & drawing the Parisians to loue Schollers: so as in his time the Vniuersity of Paris had great prerogatiues, as the eldest Daughter of our Kings. The Realme was corrupted with the iniustice and extortion of former reines, by the sale of offices, being most certaine, that what wee buy in grosse, wee must sell by retail. Hee did therefore expressly prohibit these sales, and supplied such places as were void, according to the merits of persons, after due examination, to draw good men, and of vnderstanding, to apply themselves to study. Hee punished the abuses of Iudges severely, as appears by his Orders made to that end. And that which caused him to be much honored, he gaue free audience to his subiects complaints, and especially at Bois de Vincennes, where he tooke delight, and oftentimes (being set vnder a Tree, very simply) like a father giuing his children counsell. He was a capital enemy to suites, commanding the Iudges expressly to doe speedy iustice: so as suites were then layd aside, and compromises did end an infinite number of controuersies. But his chiefe care was in sparing, for to ease the people: abating the taxes and subsidies imposed on them by his Predecessors: and hee did so husband the publicke reuenues, as hee had sufficient for his traine and his great affaires, and yet a surplusage to relieue poore Widowes and Orphelins, to feed and instruct Children, marrie their daughters, cure the diseased, and the remainder was to build Churches. There are many in this great City of Paris and about it, it, built or repaired by him. But he said, that the chiefe Stones of Gods Temple were liuing, and they must rather beautifie the Church with good manners then with words which he had learned out of Saint Bernard. But these Christian-like vertues were lodged in a royall brest, fit for the government of this royall Estate, heroicke, valiant, wife, and active. Yet Lewis was more enclined to peace then warre, louing better a good and fruitful rest, then the doubtfull and turbulent euent of warre. God likewise sent a greater peace to his Realme, then vnder any King that euer liued: and with so great authority and obedience, as there was neither great nor small, but held himselfe most happy to obey so good and happy a Prince. He was likewise well guarded, for all his subiects were his guard, and he enioyed the peoples hearts by good viage. The people called him Father, the Nobility their Head, Religion her Defender, the Church her Protector, the Lawes their Guardian and Tutor, and Armes their Mars: by the terror whereof hee kept the most rebellious in awe, both within and without the Realme: For after the pacification of the former troubles, suppressed in the spring, there was not any tumult within the Realm, neither durst any one mutine against him.

A worthy saying of a goodly Prince.

A happy peace in the reigne of Lewis.

But to crowne these blessings of Gon, the peace of his house was ioyned to the publicke, Blanche his mother had her humours; extremely louing the sweet of command: but she resigned the Regency to her Sonne, when as hee came to age, and discharged her selfe in open Parliament, to the great content of all men. Lewis and his subiects loued and honoured her much, being generally well respected for the good education he had giuen the King her sonne, and the happinesse of her wife government. Queene Marguerite (the wife of Lewis) was much beloued and respected of her husband, but not so by her mother in law Blanche, being jealous of the loue which Lewis did beare her, and of the credit shee had in his fauour, and generally throughout the Realme: but she could wisely beare with the humours of her mother in law, for the loue of Lewis: a wife and a milde Princeesse, wholly of her husbands humour, whose continency is commended to haue loued none but this woman, by whom he had five sonnes, and foure daughters, the gages of their inuoluable loue. To this good government was added the strict loue and amitie hee had with his brethren, and the respect they bare vnto him. Worthy considerations of our History, and considerable in our corrupted age.

Lewis happy government.

The rest of the Albigeois.

Lewis seeks to reclaim them, by reason why they were called Valdenes.

The manuscript of these miserable Albigeois adds, That euen as the Pope would haue continued his persecution against them, and that the Marshall de la Foy (so called for that he was as it were the chiefe Champion of the immortal warre decreed against the Albigeois) prepared for a new search to root out the remainders: Lewis would not allow of it, saying, That they must perswade them by reason, and not constrain them by force, whereby many families were preferred in those prouinces. They called them Valdenes, either for that the greatest part of them retired into the Vallies and Mountains of Sauoy, Viualetz, Dicis, and Prouence, where the chiefe seed was preferred at Merindol, Lormarin, and Cabrieries; or of the name of Peter Valde, one of their most renowned Doctors; or that the Vallies of Piedmont haue preferred the families, from father to sonne vnto this day.

In those times also liued Gulielmus de Sancto Amore, a Doctor of Paris, and Chanoin of Beauuois, exclaiming both by word and writing, against the abuses of the Church: and namely, against this planting of Monkes. Pope Alexander pronounced him an hereticke, and armed Thomas Aquinas and Bonauentura men of violent spirits, and well read in Aristotles Philosophy) against him, but he prevailed against these reprovers. The Writings of either part make mention, and the issue of their controuersie is apparant. France enioyed a perfect and plentiful peace, when as Italy and Germany were afflicted with cruell and tragickall dissensions, by the implacable quarrels of the Popes and Emperours, as if they had bene hired to multiply the miseries of Christendome by their importune hatred. The subiect of the old quarrell continued: the Popes would haue Italy, and the Emperours would not yield it. Rome (which had bene the head of the Empire) was then the seat of their pontificall authority, belonging wholly to the Pope, the Emperour hauing no more command there. This usurpation had bene gotten by degrees, but they pretended the like of the whole Country: first they would seize vpon what lay neerest vnto Rome; then vpon Calabria, Appulia, and Abbruzzo; euen vnto Lombardy, the which they left to the Germanes, French, and Venetians, to command sole, hoping hoping in the end to cary it, after a long strife of the contenders, who should leaue the possession more easie to their successors. To conclude, in the end the Imperiall sovereignty being banished out of Italy, it was dismembred by diuers Lords, and the Realm of Naples and Lombardy were made the subiect of long and bloody warres, betwixt the French, Spaniards, and Venetians. This reigne was a witness about thirty and three yeares of these disorders, by excommunications, depofings, armes, taking and sacking of Cities and Countreys, vnder the Empire of Fredericke the second, who opposed himselfe against Innocent the third, Honorius, Celestin, Innocent the fourth, Gregory the ninth, Popes, with such policies, trecheries, and vnkind cruelties, as I am affhamed to set to view these scandals of Christendome, whiles that our dissensions doe settle a free Empire for the blasphemies of Mahomet in the East. As the Popes proiects were to become absolute matters of Italy, so their ordinary course was to flye vnto France when they felt themselves the weaker, to vse their meanes in necessity, and to vsurpe vpon them by all occasions, as we haue seene, and shall see by that which folloves.

To Otho the Emperour (who wilfully went to seeke his owne ruine in France) succeeded this Fredericke the second, grand child to Fredericke Barbaroussa, of whom wee haue spoken. A generous, wise and learned Prince, who being scarce seated in the Empire (having giuen Innocent the third the Earldome of Fondi, in the Realme of Naples, to be proclaimed Emperour) when as Honorius, successor to Innocent the third, caused a part of Tuscane and Apulia to be surpris'd by certaine Noblemen of the Countrey, esteeming the conquest the more easie, for that Fredericke was newly aduanced to the dignity, hauing neither courage nor power to oppose himselfe against his surprisals, and even in the fresh memory of so many affronts which the Pope had done to his predecessor Fredericke. But he was ignorant of his disposition, being resolute not to suffer the Imperiall dignity to be any thing blemished by him. Fredericke goes into Italy, with an army, recouers what had bene taken, and punisheth the rebels.

Honorius seeing himselfe the weaker, flies to his accustomed meanes. To his fulminations and Ecclesiasticall terrors (these are the very words of the History) against the French. He did first excommunicate Fredericke, then he flies to France, and doth stirre vp Henry the sonne of Fredericke against the father. Fredericke begins with the most dangerous, for being seized of this disloyall sonne, who would haue taken and depriv'd him of his dignity, he confines him to perpetuall prison, by a decree of the Princes of the Empire.

He had happily made a League with Lewis the eight, father to our Lewis, and had renewed it with himselfe, on whose faith he relied much; but Charles of Anjou Earle of Provence his brother, would be doing, being desirous to get something. Hee was easily persuaded with the hope of these goodly Realmes of Naples and Sicilia, which the Pope offered him as the fruits of his labours: so as in the end he shall come to his ayde, and being King of Sicilia shall expell the Race of Fredericke.

This Tragedy must continue long, they vie craft vpon craft, and whilest one is preparing, another is put in practice. The zeale of the holy Land was the Popes ordinary colour to censure the stormes raised by the Emperours: and in sending them farre off, to haue better meanes to compass their designs at home, without controule. Iohn of Breynne King of Ierusalem comes, and preuailes so much, as Pope Honorius promised to absolve Fredericke the second, so as he will make a voyage into the East. Fredericke accepts thereof, and presently makes leaues in Germany for an army: whilest that he assembles the Estates of the Empire at Cremona, to assure the affaires of Italy in his absence: the place and subiect of the assembly displeased Pope Honorius, who accuseth Fredericke that by his delays he suffered the Christians to goe to ruine in Asia, whither he had promised to goe, and doth excommunicate him againe. This doth hasten Fredericke: he parts with his army (but without taking leaue of the Pope) and arriues suddenly at the holy Land: where he strucke such a terrour into Sultan Saladin, as he demands a Truce, and obtaynes it vpon condition, That he should restore Ierusalem and the holy Land to Fredericke, and all the Christian prisoners without any ransom. These conditions, duly performed, Fredericke visiteth Nazareth, fortifieth Ioppa, and the other Cities of Iudea, being in a good way to settle the Christians affaires. As he labours thus with a commendable successe, the Pope displeased at Frederickes departure without his blessing, and holding turned against the Emperour:

irreconcilable.

A ding it done in contempt of his authority, proclaimes him excommunicate, and forfeits his Estates. He presently seizeth vpon the Realme of Naples, and raiseth factions in all the Cities of Italy, to cause a reuolt against the Emperour. Fredericke (moued with these newes) leaues Asia, and being returned into Italy, he employes the Princes of the Empire to make peace with the Pope, forgetting the priuate wrongs he had done him, and obtains absolution, giuing him 11000. markes of gold to pacifie him. But this accord lasted little, yea it turned into an implacable hatred, which augmented the factions, shed blood, made Cities desolate, buried Fredericke and his posteritie, and in the end banished the Imperiall authority quite out of Italy.

B Vpon this accord Honorius dies, and leaues Gregory the ninth his successor in the same quarrell against the Emperour. Fredericke (having satisfied the Pope for his priuate interest, and payed very dearly for his authority) sayd, that he could not passe away the rights of the Empire: beseeching Pope Gregory to leaue things as they had bene before his going into the East, that the Cities of Italy (which had freed themselves by this occasion) might acknowledge the lawfull authority of the Empire. Gregory the ninth is wonderfully moued with this proposition, and forbids Fredericke vpon paine of a new excommunication to make any more question thereof, but to leaue the confederate Cities in their libertie. This was to giue a law to the Emperour; to subiect his authority to the Popes command, to giue leaue to the Imperiall Cities to rebell, and to authorize their rebellion.

C Fredericke much discontented with this answer, and seeing plainly that this was the last farewell of the Imperiall authority in Italy (as without doubt it was) hee employed his wit and all his means to preuent the practices of Gregory, who without any dissembling, sought to suppress the Imperiall dignity in those parts. Fredericke tries all means to crosse the Pope, he solicits the Ghibelin faction throughout the cities of Italy, he leuies a mighty army in Germany, and enters into Italy with a horrible waste; taking, sacking, and spoiling the reuolted Cities, and filling all places with fire and blood; Milan, Genoa, and diuers townes of the Duchy of Spoleum, were thus strangely spoiled by violent force, without any mercy, wherein Fredericke exceeded the bounds of a iust punishment, the which must be in the Magistrates hands, as the rod in the fathers, and the razor in the

D Surgeons, to chaffe, and not to ruine, to cure, and not to kill. He shall soone receive his reward, by his hand who strikes two strokes with one stone, and doth alwayes well when men doe ill. Gregory stood at a gaze at Frederickes first entry, not much moued with the shedding of so much blood, and the sacke of so many Cities ruined, for his quarrels sake: but when he sees Fredericke conquers to encrease, hee straines his wit to find out remedies to stop so dangerous a deluge. He raiseth some troopes which he calleth Holy, but they were too weake to withstand so great a force. He therefore flies to Councils (the firme bulwarkes of his authority) he makes a Bull of Excommunication, proclaimes him a capitall enemy to the Church, and layes open the causes by a publicke declaration. Fredericke continuing his armes, answers the Popes writing by an Advocate of Capua, called Iohn de Vignes, and so giues in exchange words for words. But Frederickes forces had preuailed without a better remedy. Hereupon Pope Gregory dies. Celestin succeeds him, who within few daies after his election dies, and leaues the Chaire to Innocent the fourth, with this quarrell not yet determined. Innocent in the life of Gregory was a Ghibelin, and by his death (being chosen Pope) he becomes a Guelphe, as great an enemy to Fredericke, as he had bene a friend; a cunning and circumspect man, who politickly wrought the means to vndoe Fredericke.

Gregory turnes enemy to Fredericke being chosen Pope.

After his election he sends his Nuncio into France, to exhort our Lewis to succour him, according to the ancient proofes of the most Christian Kings to the holy Sea, and to assure him the better, he giues him to vnderstand that he is resolu'd to come into France, as the most fast retreat of Christendome now afflicted. Hee comes and calls a Councell at Lions, whither he cites Fredericke, but vpon so short a warning, as he could not appeare. Fredericke (having sent his Ambassadors to the Councell, to require a lawfull time and to aduertise the Pope of his coming) begins his iourney to performe his promise. Being arriued at Thurin, he had intelligence giuen him that the Pope had condemned him as contumax, excommunicated him, and degraded him of the Empire. But this was not without the consent of the Princes Electors of the Empire, who after mature deliberation proceeded to a new election.

The Germanes
chooſe another Emperour.

The thundring Ball of excommunication and depofition is no ſooner publiſhed, but the Princes Electors chooſe Henry Landgraue of Thuringe for Emperour: vpon the receipt of theſe newes, Fredericke ſtays at Thurin, and hauing ſent to ſound the Germanes mindes, he findes ſtrange partialities, the greateſt part of the Nobility banded againſt him, and reſolued to reiect him. Thus he felt the force of the Popes power. The prooffe of this reſolution was at hand, for as Henry of Thuringe (the new elected Emperour) approached to Wimes, to force them to yeeld to his obedience, and that the partifans of Fredericke would not receiue him: hauing beſieged the Citie, he was wounded with an arrow, whereof he died ſhortly after: whereupon the Princes Electors of the Empire did preſently chooſe William Earle of Holland for Emperour: and at the ſame time the faction of the Guelphes of Paui being baniſhed, found meanes to re-enter the City, where they made a horrible and bloody maſſacre of the Gibelins, with more then ordinary fury vſed in ciuill mutinies.

The Emperour Fredericke in this vncertainty of his affaires, being in Italy with his army, he flies to the neceſſity. He beſieged Paui, and for that hee would not hazard his Forces (whereof he might ſtand in need, if Germany failed him) hee reſolued to blocke it, and builds a Fort which he calls Victoria; but he reckoned ill without him that giues victories, meaſuring the iſſue too confidently by the proict. Thus God confounds the enterpriſes of men, when they attribute that to themſelues which belongs to his power. This done, Fredericke (leaving his baſtard Encius to command the ſiege) takes his way to Lions, where the Councell was yet remaining: with an intent to reſtore his affaires: but he is not farre gone, when as newes comes vnto him, that the inhabitants had made a great ſally, and forced and razed his Fort of Victoria, with great loſſe of his men. He returns to Paui, takes it by force, and did execute that which the outrage lately committed, might moue a chollerick man vnto, being halfe deſperate: but this ſurpriſe repaired not his Eſtate, for in all the chiefe Cities of Italy the Guelphes faction was the ſtronger, through the authority of the Councell of Lions, which had wonderfully diſgraced Fredericke: firſt by excommunications, and theſe by a ciuill depofition. Fredericke ſeeing himſelfe diſtreſſed of al ſides (as in great afflictions one miſchiefe calling another, the greateſt is to be faile hearted) he ſuffered himſelfe to be ſo oppreſſed with griefe, as he falls into a burning Feur and dies, burying in one graue, his deſignes, and his imperiall dignity, whereof at that time he was deſtitute. Thus Fredericke dies, leaving Italy and Germany in great combustion: and Conrad his ſonne, the ſucceſſor rather of his miſeries then of his inheritance, for ſeeking to effect that which his father could not do, and to preſerue the Realmes of Sicily and Naples to his ſucceſſors, hee loſt his life and both Realmes, hauing truſted Manſſey his fathers baſtard too much; who poiſoned him, notwithstanding he had appointed him Tutor to his ſonne Conrad, not knowing by whoſe hand he died. Manſſey ſeeing himſelfe in poſſeſſion by this title, gives it out that Conrad was dead, and vnder this goodly title to be the neceſſity kinsman of the lawfull Lords, hee tooke poſſeſſion of theſe two Realmes. The ſtronger alwayes preuailes in an Eſtate. Manſſey was maſter of Naples and of Sicily, although Conrad had the right: and to aſſure the poſſeſſion of what he had gotten, he allies himſelfe with Lames King of Arragon, giuing his daughter Conſtance in marriage to Peter his eldeſt ſonne. This was in the year 1255. a remarkable date for ſo long a quarrell. Manſſey could not be heyre to Frederickes Eſtates, but hee muſt withall ſucceed in the hatred the Popes did beare him; the ſubiect of diſcontent remaining in thoſe Seigneuries which he enioyed vnder his name. Pope Vrbane 4. (who then held the Sea of Rome) did excommunicate Manſſey, as a diſturbor of the Church and of Italy, but finding himſelfe too weak for the execution of his decree, he caſt his eyes to the place from whence his predeceſſors had alwayes drawne aſſured and timely ſuccours. Lewis our good King, of a contrary humor to their turbulent paſſions, was a ſpectator of theſe diſorders: but ſo indifferent, although the Councell of Lions had bene held by theſe diſorders: but ſo indifferent, that hee endeavoured to quench this fire, kindled betwixt the greateſt perſons of Chriſtendome. He could not be moued by the authority or perſwaſions of Pope Vrbane, to take away another mans Eſtate, being well content with his owne. But Charles Earle of Prouence perſwaded by his owne diſpoſition, thruſt on by his wife Beatrice (deſirous to be called Queene like to her other ſiſters) and drawne headlong by the ſhew of theſe goodly Crownes, ſuffereth himſelfe to be eaſily transported at the Popes entreaty.

For Charles Duke of Aniou became maſter of theſe two Realmes in the year 1265, and Manſſey was confounded in his vniuſt deſigne. After the death of Fredericke 2, and the violent elections of Henry of Turlinge and William of Holland (feare retaining ſome, and fury thruſting on others) the Empire was in effect without an Emperour, being without a guide, by the fury of ciuill confuſions, like a great ſhip at ſea beaten with winde and waues, without ſailes, helme, and Pilot. Pope Vrbane pretending then, that in the vacation of the Empire, the gouernement belonged to the Sea of Rome, he created Charles of Aniou Vicar of the Empire, giuing him Tuſcane, vpon condition to ſuccour the ſea of Rome againſt the Gibelins & Suenians. So at one inſtant Charles of Aniou was poſſeſſed of the two Realmes of Sicily and Naples, and the gouernment of the whole Empire. Conrad in the ſonne of Conrad was not dead, as the Impoſtor Manſſey had giuen it out: but hauing bene patient during theſe tempeſts, hee had ſo well managed his hereditary meanes, as finding himſelfe ſtrong, he fought to recover his Realmes viſtured by Charles Duke of Aniou. Hauing incited the Gibelins throughout all the Cities of Italy, to draw them to reuolt, he leaues a goodly army, with the help of his friends, and comes into Italy, hauing in the meane time bred an alteration in Sicily, where many Cities were taken, and Nocera in the Kingdome of Naples. Conrad accompanied with many Noblemen, which hunted after his doubtfull fortune: the chiefe whereof were Frederick Duke of Auſtria, and Henry the ſon of the King of Caſtile. Charles of Aniou beſieged Nocera, where Conrad reſolued to charge him. Hauing provided for the ſiege, hee goes to encounter Conrad, and hauing drawne him to fight by a ſtratagem, he defeats his army, takes him priſoner, and with him Fredericke of Auſtria, and Henry of Caſtile, with a great number of the Nobility. This goodly and abſolute victory, leading the Commanders priſoners in triumph, ſhould haue bene ſeaſoned with the wife clemency of our Lewis. But Charles of Aniou his brother had no portion with him in this excellent vertue: whereby we haue ſcene, that Philip their Grand-father, in well viſing a victory, did purchaſe the name of Auguſtus, and conſecrated it to the honorable memory of his poſterity. For Charles (hauing theſe great Princes in his power) by the counſell of Pope Clement the fourth, beheaded the two firſt, bathing the ſcaffold with the blood of twelue of the greateſt Noblemen of the army; and coop vp Henry of Caſtile in a Cage of Iron, to make him dye hourly, cauſing him to be caried through all the Cities of Apulia and Beneuent, in a moſt ignominious ſort. But we haue wandred enough in the confuſions of Italy: let vs now returne into France, and to our Lewis. Lewis beheld the tempeſtuous eſtate of Chriſtendome aſtrike off: which was the more incurable in Germany and Italy, for that the ſicke reſeſed phyſicke, and that darkneſſe came from them whence light ſhould haue proceeded. He caried himſelfe very coldly in the heat of theſe diuiſions, the which he could not redreſſe: but ſeeing his Realm in peace, and his authority firmly ſetled in the loue of his ſubiects, and the amity of his brethren: foretelling alſo, that by the wiſedome of his mother he might ſalue the inconuenience of his abſence, he reſolued to ſuccour the Chriſtians afflicted by the miſcreants, both in Affricke, and in the Eaſt. Philip Auguſtus, with the Emperours (which had paſſed thither one after another) had nothing repaired their decayed Eſtate: and the miſchiefe came from the Chriſtians themſelues, one oppoſite to another, the which gaue great advantage to their enemies, as if they had purpoſely fought to fortiſie them. The Empire of the Eaſt was in a horrible confuſion, diſmembred by home-bred diuiſions, which drew in the French and the Venetians.

The Theodoros, Ducas and Laſſares, (being the greateſt Families) contend for the Empire. In the end Conſtantinople is taken by the French, and Baldwin Earle of Flanders (of whom we haue ſpoken) is choſen Emperour: ſo as the Empire of Greece is transported to the French, and diuided with the Venetians, who at that time caried away the Iſle of Candy. So as at one inſtant there were three Emperours in the East: Baldwin Earle of Flanders at Constantinople: Theodore Lascaris in Naxos, in the City of Nicea: and the third was Alexis Comnenus at Trebizond, commanding over Cappadocia and Calcidia. All this shall bee a prey to the enemies of Christendome. But let vs returne to our Frenchmen, who leaue the certaine, to rume after the vncertaine. They scarce held this shadow of the Empire threecore years. Baldwin of Flanders was slaine; Henry his brother died soone after: Peter of Auxer his father in law succeded, rather in his misery, then in the Empire: for going against Theodore Lascaris the other Emperour, he was taken and afflicted with the imprisonment of two yeares; in the end he lost his head vpon a Scaffold, leauing the shadow of the Empire to his sonne Baldwin, too young to gouerne a masse of affaires so confused: So as by the aduice of Pope Gregory, John of Breynne was giuen him for assistant. This John of Breynne (of whom we haue spoken) was a French Gentleman of meane calling, who by his valour (hauing taken the City of Tyre) became a Prince, and after in the confusion of times (as the most sufficient of these poore afflicted Christians) was chosen King of Ierusalem: the which was not yet in his possession: so as finding himselfe too feeble for to waigh a burthen, he allied himselfe with this Fredericke the second, Emperour; who hath filled some leaues in our Discourse, and made his peace with the Pope; vpon condition, That he should succour and ayde the Christians in the East. Fredericke hauing recovered Ierusalem, by the truce he made with the Sultan, (as we haue sayd) left it to John of Breynne his father in law, and returned into Germany, to make the end which we haue before set downe. On the other side, as Christian Kings and Princes laboured what they could to repaire this their decayed Estate: Andrew King of Hungary (the sonne of Bela) assisted by the Dukes of Austria and Neuers (whose names are not specified) went into the East with a goodly army, and (to make work for the Christian enemies) he besieged Damietta in Egypt, where being succoured by John of Breynne, after a long siege he takes it, but it was soone after recovered by the Mammelucks.

Lewis goes with an army into the East.

Lewis therefore vnderooke this voyage of the East, when as extreme necessity called him to succour the afflicted Christians. The Popes, Innocent the third, Honorius and Gregory, had one after another vehemently perswaded him to this voyage; but the affaires of his Realme had stayed him from attempting rashly, to settle the generall Estate, and ruine his owne particular: yet being fallen extremely sicke, he resolved to delay it no longer, preparing for this expedition vpon his recovery. Hee assembled his Estates, and by their free consent, left the Regency of the Realme to his mother Blanche, who was gladly receiued of all men, vpon the conceit of her first government. Hee parts, accompanied with Alphonso Earle of Tholousa and Poitiers, and Robert Earle of Arthois, his brethren; Hugh Duke of Bourgogne; William Earle of Flanders, and Guy of Flanders his brother; Hugh Earle of Saint Paul, and Gustier his nephew; Hugh Earle of Marche; the Earles of Salbruke and Vandome, of Montfort, of Dreux; and Archibauld of Bourbon; (very renowned in the course of this History, being father to the mother of our King now reigning) the Lord of Ioinuille, (who hath worthily written this History;) Hugh Brissac and his sonne; Gaubert of Apremont; William Morlet; William of Barres, men of great esteeme in their times; the Lords of La Voute, Montlaur, Turron, and Crusol, men of account in the Country of Viualetz, enrolled with Count Raimond, who died vpon the point of their departure, and the rest passed on. This was in the yeare 1258. about the twentieth yeare of the reigne of Saint Lewis. The army consisted of two and thirty thousand fighting men. Queene Marguerite his wife bare him company in his voyage, but more faithfull then Elenor was to Lewis the seuenth: the Countesses of Tholousa and Arthois did also goe with their husbands, after the Queenes example.

The Queene vnder-standes the Kings.

He embarks at Marcellus.

Blanche his mother bare him company to Lions, where Innocent the fourth attended him. From thence he went to Marcellus, where he embarked with the Geneuois that were hired by him. His departure was the 25. day of August, to the best voyage vnder heauen. He arriued happily in the Island of Cipres, held by Guy of Lusignan, where (attending the rest of his army) the plague wasted many of his men, euen of the chiefe of his Court: Archibauld of Bourbon, John of Montfort and others died. The fame of his holinesse moued the King of Tartaria to send his Ambassadors vnto him, to offer him his friendship, and to acquaint him with the desire he had to become a Christian. Lewis sends him Preachers to instruct him in the Christian Religion. But the Tartarians vnderstanding that the Christians liues were not answerable to their profession, they returne without any better fruit then the shame of their ill life, whose doctrine was so famous. At the reliefe of Cipres, Lewis had conference with the Christians of Iudea, where they resolved to recover the City of Damiette, a most rich, and very important for their state. The Mammelucks sought to hinder Lewis his descent, but to their great losse, and also of their Commander the Satrape of Canope.

Behold Lewis is now landed, and from thence he goes to Damiette, the which he speedily besiegeth, yet not with so great foresight, but the stranger Garison (hauing made shew to yeeld at the first summons,) had meane to make a hole in the night, and to saue themselves. This happy taking of Damiette, gaue sundry counsels both to Lewis and to the Mammelucks: to Lewis to pursue his victory; to the Mammelucks to defend themselves, and the rather, for that soone after the losse of Damiette, Meledin Sultan of Babylon died, leauing his sonne Melexala for his successor: a young man of great hope. The proiect of Lewis was to pursue his victory, and to keepe his enemy busied in attempting Caie, the capital City of Egypt, anciently called Memphis; but the ignorance of these strange places where he was, not onely deprived him of the fruit of his first conquest, but gaue Melexala meane, not onely to perseuer himselfe, but to defeat Lewis his army, and to take him prisoner. Whilest they attend Count Alphonso his brother with new Forces, and spend too much time vpon the passage of Nilus, behold the miscreants Forces flye into Egypt from all parts, to succour the young Sultan, from Arabia, and Syria. The scallowes betwixt the Satraps of Hala & Damas, were by this occasion conuerted into vnion and firme loue, to expell a common enemy, whose victory would proue their generall ruine. Lewis ingaged beyond Nilus, in an enemies Country, where hee must either vanquish or die; beheld a great and mighty army of enemies against him assembled from all parts. Lewis a braue and resolute Commander, desired nothing more then to employ the first fury of the French in battell, encouraged by the happy successe of Damiette. But Melexala, (who was within his own country, and prepared rather to defend himselfe then to assault) resolved to weary Lewis his Forces, the which he knew would be more annoyed by the foggy ayre where they were lodged, and by the want of all kind of victuals, then by his sword. The successe answered his designe: the Campe is presently full of diseases, and those contagious. The common souldiers, the Noblemen, and in the end the King is sicke: all is disordered with this infectious sicknesse: the Guards and Sentinels stand in feare, all are amazed. Melexala well enformed of their estate, surchargeth them with another discommodity, hee takes from them the passage of Nilus, by the which victuals came from Damiette to the Christians Campe: And to braue these poore sicke men (who had neither hands to fight, nor feet to flye) he sends troopes hourly to their trenchcoats prouoke them, and cuts them in peeces that goe to forrage. Lewis who lay in his bed extremely sicke, had nothing but courage to maintaine life, and zeale to dye in this holy warre, in the which hee had embarked himselfe very inconsiderately. And not to giue his enemies all aduantages to braue him thus dayly, he makes choice of such as were least sicke, being resolute to dye, vnder the command of Alphonso and Robert, his brethren.

This poore embated troupee was easily beaten by a fresh and strong enemy. The Kings brethren were taken. Lewis being then prest dayly by Melexala to yeeld, he giues care to a composition (which till then he had reiecte) seeing himselfe a prisoner without hope of recovery. The conditions were very hard in so great an extremity: That Damiette should be restored to the Sultan, all prisoners freed, and eight thousand pounds of gold payed to the Mammelucks to redeeme his life, which they held as it were in their hands. Lewis payes foure thousand presently, and hauing left the Host and the Pix (as a most precious pawne) hee was deliuered: but before hee returned into France, hee payed the summe, and tooke his pawne: Hereof it comes that in the Tapistry of Egypt you shall alwayes see the Host and the Pix for a memoriall of this worthy victory. Attending the payment of this summe (very great for that age) Lewis fortified the Cities of Iudea, and redeemed prisoners and reliques, being loth to returne into France with empty hands. But these newes were presently brought thither with an incredible celerity. All things seemed to inuite fooles and ambitious men to innovations: but God had seld to great a loue in the hearts of the French to their good King, as they come all ioyntly to his mother, wonderfully perplexed for her sonnes losse, (a griefe which caused her to dye) with as great obedience and respect, as if he himselfe had bene present in his greatest prosperity. Private houses, publicke places, and especially Churches, were full of sorrow, teares, & vows, for the distresse of their good afflicted Prince, for whom all founded forth their prayers and deuotion. Their priuies were as open as their hearts, to furnish whatsoever was needfull for their Kings ransom, or his returne, so much was hee beloued, and wished for of all men. The money is speedily provided, sent, and deliuered to the Enemy: and Lewis returned into his Realme, five yeares after his departure, bringing with him Marguerite his deare Spouse with the conceit of the same chastity she had before. But after his absence, he nether found his Realme so well ordered as hee left it, nor his neighbor-State in any better peace. He began by the reformation of his owne, making constitutions concerning the Church, Iustice, the reliefe of the people; against publicke dissolusion, blasphemies, Stewes, Dicing-houses, Plaies, and other enormities. He made orders for mariages, debts, Impositions, Offices and Benefices, which are contained more at large in the originall history. This was in the yeare 1251. The fruits of his voyage and affliction was, that hee became a better man; hauing increased in zeale, modesty, wisdom, and diligence, better beloued and respected then before his departure; and generally had in great admiration, for his good life, and constancy in the midst of greatest dangers, as a miracle among Kings. He found his Mother Blanch wanting in his house, being dead a little after the imprisonment of her Sonne, furcharged with age, and the griefe of so great an affliction. Lewis hauing ordered the constitutions sprung vp in his absence, hee employed the rest of his time and authority, to pacifie quarrels growne among his neighbours, as the generall Arbitrator among Christians.

England did offer a notable occasion. The English were reuolted against King Henry vnder the command of Simon of Montfort, a man of great credit, for some discontentments touching their priuiledges. By the countenance and conduct of this commander, their complaints are converted into open warre, in the which Henry and his brother Richard are taken prisoners. Lewis exhorts the English to concord, and doeth not seeke to nourish these diuisions for his owne benefit, as his father Lewis had done. Edward sonne to Henry that was prisoner, giues them another Battell, in which Simon of Montfort was slaine, yet his faction dyes not, but the warre was reuiued vnder the command of Guy the sonne of Simon. Lewis employed his authority so happily, both with Guy and the people, (who held his piety and wisdom in great admiration) that hauing perswaded his brother, Charles king of Sicily to make Guy his Lieutenant (and as it were companion in the conquest of Tuscany) he was a means to restore King Henry to his auhority, and the people to their liberty with a generall content. Flanders presented him another subiect, Marguerite Countesse of Flanders (issued from Baldwin father to Jane the wife of Ferrand, as we haue said) had children by diuers men. Two by one bed which were held vnlawfull (hauing bene abused either by William her Schoolemaster, (who was a Priest) or by Besford of Auvergne her gouernor, or by both of them, hauing voluntarily yielded to either of them) and three in lawfull matrimony, by Guy of Dampierre a Gentleman of Champagne. The two first were the eldest and strongest in credit, whereby must needs grow great troubles among a stirring people, as wee haue seene a great combustion of a finaler fire.

Lewis pacified this quarrell without force as the soueraigne Iudge, assigning the Earldome of Haynault to the first, and Flanders to the last: and so ended a suit which in shew seemed infinit, and should immortalize a dangerous dissention, holding those children for legitimate, which could not beiectioned without troubling the lawfull equity of the country according to the rule, That a common error makes a iust title. But Languedoc was ready to rise vpon the controuersie of the Earles of Tholousa & Rossillon, both parties were strong, his brother Alphonfus on the one part, & James king of Arragon on the other. The question for those lands was the cause. This great Family had diuers branches, and by this occasion diuers diffusions, and so diuers names were giuen to this Province, now called the Earldome of Tholousa, sometime S. Gilles, sometime Beziers, and otherwhiles Narbone, as we shall declare in the theater of Languedoc. Lewis decreed, that James king of Arragon should enioy the County of Rossillon, and all the rest should remaine to his brother without controuersie: the which was obserued by them and their successors. Thus this good Prince laboured happily to compound controuersies in notable actions, being careful to pacifie

A pacifie all suites among his subiects, and happily hee might haue preuailed in reconciling that great diuision betwixt the Emperour and the Pope, if zeale to relieue the afflicted Christians, had not made him to abandon his owne quiet, with all his good works, to transport his treasure and life into Africke, and there to leaue them among the Barbarians. All declined in the East; Mahomet preuailed so, both there and in Africke, as Europe was threatened by their neighbourhood. Spaine as the neereff, and Prouence, and Languedoc, by the easie aboard of the Mediterranean Sea. Lewis not able to liew without seeking the aduancement of the Christian Religion, resolues a voyage into Barbary, against the aduice of his State, and contrary to his owne experience: a zeale which shall succeed ill for himselfe and his whole Realme, whom we cannot excuse of indiscretion. Thus hee enrouled himselfe the second time, and his son Philip likewise which shall succeed him; with Peter Earle of Alanson, and John Earle of Neuers, furnished Triflan. Hee left the Regency to Simon of Neele, and Mathew of Vendosme, on whose fidelity he relied much. Before his departure he made a League with the King of England, to whom he had done many good offices in his great necessity. It was agreed, That the English should pretend no interest to Normandy, nor to the Earldome of Anjou, Maine, Poitou, and Touraine: and as for Guienne, he should enioy the Countries of Quercy, Limosin, and Xaintonge, vnto the River of Charenton; all which Countries he should hold by homage of the Crowne of France, and in this regard he should be Vassall and Liege-man to the King of France. For confirmation of this Accord, Edward his sonne enters into society of armes with Lewis, for the voyage of the holy Land, to march at the same time. This accord was made in the yeare 1269, and their departure was the yeare after 1270. the first day of May. He parted from Aigues-mortes, and not from Marfeilles, as some haue written: and for that there was no good Port vpon the Mediterranean Sea, he caused the towne of Aigues-mortes in Languedoc to be built, and compassed with goodly wals, which speake yet of him, and with channels for the commodity of the shoare, the largest is called The great Lewis, by his name. Edward takes his course for Asia, and Lewis for Africke: the French army consisting of forty thousand fighting men: that of England is not specified. The voyage was short and vnhappy for them both, but especially for our good Prince. Lewis had scarce lost the sight of shoare, and discovered the Iland of Sardinia, when as both hee and his whole Fleet had almost perished in a storme. A preface of a mournfull successe. In the end hee lands in Africke, (a Country worthy to lose that ancient name among vs, and to be called Barbary, for the barbarous and vnfortunate successe it brought.) Lewis resolues to take Carthage, a new City built vpon the ancient name, and held for a strong Garison of the Barbarians: hee takes it, but with great paine and losse. From thence hee goes to Tunis, a strong and well guarded Citie, resolute to haue it, at what price focuer. But man purposeth, and God disposeth: for as Edward, son to the King of England, turned backe from his voyage of the East, hauing passed but to Malta, & Charles King of Sicilia going to ioine with him, to set vpon the Barbarians of Africke altogether. In a manner at the same time as they arrived all at Tunis, the plague had deuoured a great part of the French army, and taken away many Noblemen. And to increase the mischief, it enters the Kings paullion, and strikes Lewis, although some say it was a flux. But whatsoever it be, our Lewis is extremely sicke, and feeling it deadly, he calls for Philip his eldest sonne, whose age and vertue preferred him to the Crowne. Hauing giuen him goodly admonitions, and exhorted him to serue God, to liue vertuously, and to gouerne his people fatherly vnder the obedience of his lawes, which hee himselfe must first obey: hauing recommended vnto him the loue of his brethren, and entreated all the Nobility about him to obey Philip, he yielded vp his soule to God, to take his true rest in heauen, leauing all his followers in great heavinesse: being the most perfect patterne of a good King, that euer was read of in history. Hee only wanted the happinesse of a good writer, although these small gleams which we find in the writings of the Lord of Ioinuille make his vertue admirable. A Prince borne for a testimony to that obscure age, and for ours which is corrupted: to be a president to all Kings and Princes of religion, equity, clemency, wisdom, valour, magnanimity, patience and continence; to loue piety, iustice, order and peace: to ioine the loue of holy things, and the modesty of manners, with armes and state. Hauing shewed, that it is very fitting for a King, to be a good Christian, a good warrior, a good husband, a good father, a good Gouernor, a good iusticer, and to know how to make warre and peace. That it is very necessary to ioine vnto the Majesty, pietie, petie, clemency and authority, to gaine the love, respect and obedience of all men. And to conclude, That the best guard, and most assured renuence of a Prince, is the love of his Subjects: worthy of that venerable name of Holy, wherewith posterity hath iustly honoured him. He was twelve years old when he began to reigne, and governed forty four years. So he died in the fifty first year of his age, having received this mortal Crown in the year 1226, and the Immortal in the year of our Lord 1270. the 25. of August. Of Marguerite the daughter of Raymond Earle of Prouence, hee had four sons, and four daughters. A Princeesse worthy to be great a husband, the sole wife of one husband, and he the only husband of one wife. His Sons were Philip surnamed the Hardy, King of France, Peter Earle of Alanson, Robert also Earle of Alanson (succeeding his brother Peter deceased without children, and hee likewise died without any issue) and Robert Earle of Clermont in Beauvoisin. His Daughters were Blanch Queene of Castile, Isabel Queene of Nauarre, Marguerite Countesse of Brabant, and Agnes Duchesse of Bourgonne. So as of his four sonnes there remained but two, Philip and Robert. From Philip the third, called the Hardy, his eldest sonne, are issued successively either from Father to sonne, or from brother to brother, or from the nearest kinsman, to the next of blood, Philip the 4. called the Faire, Lewis the tenth, called Hutin, Philip the fifth, called the Long, Charles the fourth, called the Faire, Philip of Vallois, John, Charles the fifth, Charles the sixth, Charles the seventh, Lewis the eleventh, Charles the eighth, who dying without children, the law calls the children of Lewis Duke of Orleans, the Son of Charles the sixth, to reigne. One after another. Charles Duke of Orleans, and John Duke of Angoulême, for Lewis the sonne of Charles reigned under the name of Lewis the twelfth, who dying without issue male, the law takes the other branch of John of Angoulême, so as it sets the Crowne vpon the head of Francis the first his only sonne, and from Francis the first, to Henry the second his sonne, and so in order to Francis the second, Charles the ninth, Henry the third his children successively from brother to brother. This direct line ending in Henry the third, the last King of the house of Vallois: the law calls the second Son of Saint Lewis, named Robert, who gives the Royall branch to Bourbon; Out of the which is issued Henry of Bourbon, the fourth of that name, King of France and of Nauarre, and Lewis his Sonne now reigning: but wee will set downe his genealogie distinctly in the end of the Royall race of Vallois. It sufficeth to haue noted the order of the following reigns, returning to the course of our History. Thus S. Lewis the 9. liued, and thus he dyed, the honor of vertue in our Kings, leaving Philip his eldest son for his successor.

PHILIP the third, called the Hardy.

The 45. King of France.

HE authority of Lewis was so great, as neither his absence, nor his death, could alter any thing in the Estate of France. Being dead, Philip his eldest Sonne was proclaimed King in the Army, and (as the time would permit) was received with a generall applause of all men: as hee in whom the Fathers vertue and authority was yet living. The Army in the meane time is fortified with the Fleetes of England and of Sicilia, so as the Barbarians seeing the whole Countrey in Armes and on fire, they demand a truce, and obtaine it vpon condition; That they should suffer the Christians (which were dispersed in diuers parts of Africke) to liue in peace. But that which did most presse Philip, was his returne into France. So as hee gathers his troopes together (the remainder of the plague, and of the vnciuill vlage of that barbarous Countrey) and parts from Africke into Sicilia, where his losses encrease: for his wife Isabel diest there; and his Vncle Alphonfus, with his Wife the Countesse of Tholousa, die soone after at Bologne, without any children, so as according to the contract of marriage, the Earledome of Tholousa should be incorporate to the Crowne.

Richard (son to Henry King of England) slain traitorously.

Another sinister accident chanced to Richard the Son of Henry King of England (to the end the English might likewise reckon their gains in this voyage:) for being arrived at Viterbo a City of the Popes, walking in Saint Lawrence Church, suspecting no enemy: beheld this City of Montford the son of Simon (of whom we haue spoken) kill him in the presence of all his followers, and drawing his sword, hee makes his way to the Church doore, where finding a horse ready, hee flies into Tuscane: wherat neither the Pope Philip, nor Charles, were any thing moued. This murder thus neglected, shall bleed hereafter. But these were not all the occurrents which Philip had in his returne home.

Pope Clement the fourth (borne in Languedoc) being dead, the Cardinals loth to yeld vnto another, disagree in the election of a new Pope, and continued in this contention of two years nine moneths and one day, as Platina reporteth. Our Philip and Charles his vncle intreat the Colledge of Cardinals to make an end of so scandalous a dissention. The respect of their admonition was not fruitlesse: For the Cardinals resolve, that not any one of the Colledge that had assisted at this tedious controuersie, should bee Pope. Thibaud of Plaisance Archdeacon of Legee, (being absent in the voyage of the East) was chosen, and called Gregory the tenth. In the end Philip returns into France, to the great content of his Subjects. Having interred the dead, his Father, Wife, Vncle, Aunte and Cousin, he disposed of the affaires, and of matters of iustice, according to the instructions and example of his Father S. Lewis, famous amongst all our Kings. And then he married with the daughter of Henry Duke of Brabant: having three sonnes by Isabel his first wife, Lewis, Philip, and Charles. But here we shall not finde the happiness of our Saint Lewis, for this second mariage was blemished with a sad and soule suspect. Lewis the eldest Son of King Philip, dyed with apparant signes of poyson. This mischief encrease by the ialousie is had of Queene Mary his Mother in law: and Peter de la Broche, (chiefe Chamberlaine to the King, and principall Intendant of his Treasure, being the Queenes Favorite) is accused for this fact, who being prisoner, confesseth the crime; and accuseth the Queene, as having poysoned Lewis by her command. Moreover, as one mischief commeth not alone: La Broche is found guilty of Treason, by his owne Letters, giuing intelligence to the King of Castile, of the estate of France, being then no friend to this Crowne. This crime alone was sufficient for his death: being hanged, leaving Mary in trouble by his accusation, and by the strange euent: a notable example of the inconsistency of the Court, and the vanity of the world. Mary denies the fact by oath. The King desirous to be satisfied, proceeds strangely. For want of common proofe, he resolves to leane the truth by a Sorceresse, to whom he sends a Bishop and an Abbot. This Witch remained in Holland, and was Subject to the Duke of Brabant the Queenes Father. The Bishop & Abbot at their returne, faile not to absolve the Queene by her report, but they free her not from the generall ialousie of the French, nor in the Kings conceits, who after this accusation, did neuer enjoy any rest in his house. These were the beginnings of the reigne of Philip, whose progresse and end shall be nothing better. His Vncle Charles King of Sicilia, shall crosse his life with many toyles, and end it with perplexity. But let vs obserue euery thing in order.

As by the decease of Alphonfus, and Isabel his wife (being dead without Children) the County of Tholousa came to the Crowne: so Philip failed not to take possession thereof, as one of the most important peeces of his Estate: but hee found some alterations there, through the priuate quarrels of his Subjects. The Earle of Foix having a notable quarrell with Girard of Castebonne, had taken his house from him by force, Girard fled to the King for iustice, but the Earle trusting to his Forts, and the mountaines, deluded the Kings commandements, who knew well how to hunt him out of his Rockes, and to send him prisoner to Beaucaire with his wife and children, there to digest his felony, and to teach more mighty Vassals and Subjects, what it is to dally with their Soueraigne. Having tamed him with a whole years imprisonment, and drawne from him proofes of a serious confession of his fault, he grants him liberty, his Earledome, and his fauour, making good vse of him in his affaires. But the quarrell of Nauarre was of greater consequence. Henry King of Nauarre Earle of Champagne and Brie, had married Isabel the daughter of Robert Earle of Arthois, brother to Saint Lewis, and at that time dyed, leaving one only daughter his heire, named Jane, with his Widow, to whom hee had appointed the regencie of his Realme. After the decease of Henry (which was in the year 1274:

at Pampelune) the Nobility were grieved to be governed by a Woman, she flies to Philip as to her neere kinsman. The King sends Eustace of Beaumais, a Knight, to assist her with his Councell, the which encreased the discontent of the Navarrois, who take Armes, and besiege the Mother, the Daughter, and this new Councellor in the Castle of Pampelune, hoping to become Masters thereof, and to settle the government at their pleasures. Philip hastens thither, relieves the besieged, punisheth the Rebels, sedeth the Government, furnisheth the Forts, and sends John the heire of Navarre into France, with the good liking of the Navarrois, by the assurance which Philip gave them to make her Queene of France, in marrying her to his eldest sonne. Navarre continued thus without any alteration wholly at Philip's disposition, whose authority was confirmed in all those Prouinces, and his name grew great throughout all Spaine.

This worke thus easily ended, another taske began, which brought much misery to this reigne. The French affaires succeeded not well at Constantinople, we have shewed inq what extremity the successeours of Baldwin Emperour of Constantinople were brought, and now behold the last Act of this borrowed Empire. Baldwin the son of Robert, in the life of John of Breynne his Father in Law, made head against his enemies, so as having imployed his all meanes, and exhausted his treasure, hee flies to Fredericke the 2. his brother in law, but in vaine: and this was the period of his ruine, for his absence gaue his enemies meanes to attempt, and his fruitlesse labour was a proofe of his weaknesse at his returne, Michel Paleologus a Lord of the Countrey, great both in meanes and courage; after the death of Theodore Lascaris, (of whom we have spoken) had so managed this occasion, as Baldwin could scarce enter into Constantinople, to provide for the safety of the Citie, when he was besieged by Paleologus, and so hardly prest, as hee saved himselfe with difficulty in the Ile of Negrepont, and from thence went into Italy, leaving Constantinople with all this imaginary Empire, three score yeares after the taking thereof by Baldwin the first. Thus the Greekes are repossessed vnder the government of Michel Paleologus, who in the end seized on the Empire of the East. But the coming of Baldwin into Italy, was the cause of a long and painful taske, wherein our Philip was so farre engaged, as hee shall leave his life there, and cause much trouble to his subjects: His Vncle Charles King of Sicilia, shall be the motive, but his owne disposition shall thrust him forward. Philip was a great undertaker, and oftentimes of other mens affaires, as the whole discourse of his life will shew, whereby it seemes the title of Hardy was giuen him. Not so discreet therein as his Father, who caried himselfe alwayes coldly, a newter in his neighbors dissensions, but when he found meanes to reconcile them with mildnesse. Let vs now returne whence we parted. Baldwin thus dispossessed of Constantinople, flies to Charles King of Sicilia, a Frenchman to a French: but he had a more strict gage, his daughter Bertha whom Charles had married after the death of Beatrice Countesse of Provence. Moreoer, hee addressed himselfe to one, whose spirit was neuer quiet but in Action. A strange man, he was Earle of Provence, King of Naples and Sicilia, Vicar of the Empire, and Senator of Rome, holding Tuscane at his deuotion, and almost all Italy: in as great reputation as any Prince of his time, and yet not satisfied. Baldwin arriued presently after this shipwracke, perceiving him to hope for better, hee tries all meanes to leauy a goodly army to go into Greece, and to restore him with the rest of the French Nobility to their Estates and Seigneuries, whereof Paleologus had dispossessed them: not foreseeing how much more necessary it was for him to guard his new conquests of Sicilia & Naples, and to keep his credit in Italy, in well intreating his new subjects, and embracing politickly the Italians loue. As Charles deuiled the meanes to attempt, so his enemies fought the meanes to prevent him. They were not small nor few in number: Pope Nicholas, Peter King of Arragon, & Michel Paleologus Emperour of Constantinople, but there wanted a Solicitor. There was one found out, which proued a notable instrument. John Prochite, one of the greatest men of Sicilia, being dispossessed, he imployed his study to recouer his Estate, by expelling of Charles his capitall enemy. Pope Frane a Frenchman borne at Troyes in Champagne, had called Charles to these goodly Kingdomes; and contrariwise Pope Nicholas an Italian, borne at Rome, plotted this Tragedy to dispossesse him, although his succour Martin borne at Tours, did fauour him, seeking to restore him againe to his possessions, but it was too late.

Such is the ebbing and flowing of the fauour of the Sea of Rome, subiect to rectiue diuers persons, and by consequence diuers humours. Peter of Arragon had married the

A party made against Charles King of Sicilia

A daughter of Manfrey, whom Charles had dispossessed of Sicilia (as wee haue said) and therefore had reason to attempt any thing against Charles for the recouery thereof, holding his title better then the Popes gift. Michel Paleologus fought to prevent this storme which Charles prepared against his new purchase, and therefore had reason to imploy all his Forces against him. But that which did most preiudice Charles, was his carriage, and officers, towards the people of Naples and Sicilia, whom hee discontented by all kindes of exesse, impositions, rigorous exactions of money, insolencies against their wives and daughters, and outrages against their persons. This vniust and vnchast liberty, which exceeded in the manners of our men, bred a iust choller against them, in the minds of this poore captiue people, which made them to seeke all meanes to shake off their yoke, and to be reuenged. But they had chiefly offended the fouereigne Iudge of all the whole world, who neuer suffereth such iniquities vnpunished, although hee forbear for a time. Behold the party is made against Charles from many places, and executed with incredible celerity.

John Prochite hauing priuate conference with Peter of Arragon, and knowing the secrets of his heart, goes to Constantinople to Paleologus, of whom hee was well entertained, and obtained what hee desired for the King of Arragon; which was the charges of the Army which was presently to be imployed. This plot was laid by Pope Nicholas a capitall and open enemy to Charles, from whom hee had taken all hee could. By the aduice of Pope Nicholas, Prochite (attired in the habit of a Fryar) goes into Sicilia (being well acquainted with all the passages) to incense the Sicilians mindes: which he performed so cunningly, as there wanted nothing but force. The designe was to murder Charles with all the French; and to seize vpon Sicilia, and all the rest for the King of Arragon. The event is answerable to the proiect. The King of Arragon leaues an Army in the view of all the world, but with this supposition, that it was to succour the afflicted Christians in Asia and Africke, especially after the death of Saint Lewis, who had but stirred vp, and not suppressed the Barbarians. Philip who was then at Tholoua, sent to Peter of Arragon to know his intent, and to offer him his meanes. He answers, that it is to follow the stepps of Saint Lewis, a Prince of immortal memory, and to help the poore afflicted Christians, resolving to set vpon the Africans as the necrest: but that his meanes were short, and therefore he desired him to succour him in this great necessity. Philip provides, with an affection worthy of the publike zeale, and sends him money, vn furnishing himselfe to supply his enemies want. In the meane time Peter of Arragon, and John Prochite lose not an houre, but they imploy all instruments and meanes. His Army arriues vpon the coast of Bonne in Barbary, called in old time Hippon, and hauing burnt all the Countrey neere the Sea coast, he takes Port in the lland of Corsica. John Prochite sleepees not, hauing laid his plot with the chiefe men of Sicilia, at Palermo, and Messina, where the conclusion was of the whole practice, and a conspiracie made throughout the whole Countrey, very attentive to their deliuey; he begins the game in seizing vpon Charles his Gallies and Ships, which lay dispersed in the Ports of Sicilia, all was easily effected without paine or danger, and this was a signall to the Army.

In one day and one houre all Sicilia riseth in Armes against the French, both Cities, Townes and Villages. All are massacred, men, women, young and old, all ouer-floues with blood. This popular fury armed with a shew of iust reuenge, spares nothing of the French name. This was done in the yeare of our Lord God, 1282, on Easter day at five of the clocke, when as euery one was sitting at supper on this solemne day. Charles was wanting (being the chiefe oblation of this solemne sacrifice,) but the vnder-takers had changed their first resolution, to watch a time to kill him with the rest, fearing lest his presence should hinder the execution of their designe. He was in Tuscane, doubting nothing of this rebellion, which at the first brute must needs amaze him, but he recalled his spirits, and sought for remedie. Pope Nicholas his great enemy was dead, during these preparatiues. Martin the fourth borne at Tours, held the Sea after him, of another disposition, French by nation and humour. But it was too late, the last peale was rung to the Sicilian eunefion, hee could not prevent it. This massacre thus performed by the Sicilians, a signall being giuen, behold Peter of Arragon appears in the view of Sicilia, to behold the sport more courtly, giuing daily some aduice to Prochite, and to the chiefe of the Sicilian tumult, yet loth to imbarque himselfe rashly with the humour of a people as soone past.

fied as moued. But being assured that the people (having cast the chance) grew daily more resolute, and that they wished for him as their deliverer: not to lose their good will, and to give way to his enemies practices, he casts himself into the Port of Palermo, where he was attended by all the Sicilians in great devotion. Charles in the meane time doth what he can; he doth aduertise Philip his Nephew of what had hapned, assembles Forces in his neereft territories, sends into Provence, to gather what he could together in all his ports, and besiege Messina by sea and land. The fury of the French is greater in their first heat, and had prevailed, if the Sicilians only had withstood them. But the Arragonois was strong and resolute in his first credit, and the Sicilians in their desire to be freed of the French. So Charles is forced to leave the Island to keepe the maine land, and Peter of Arragon was joyfully received by the Sicilians, and crowned King of Sicilia in Palermo, in the year 1282. the eight of May.

Behold the beginning of a tedious quarrell which shall continue long betweene the French and the Arragonois, and shall cause many Widowes and Orphelins, bringing nothing but miseries to them all. A proceffe betwixt Kinsmen, and Allies, for Isabel the first wife of Philip King of France, was sister to Peter of Arragon, with whom hee had lived in great love, and had three goodly gages, Lewis, Philip, and Charles. Oh miserable ambition, and cruell couetousnesse, the rootes of all mischiefs, which make men unkind, deprives them of reason, teares out their bowels, and fills the world with a deluge of all sorts of calamities! Two great Kings and old, which should and might live in peace, now cutting into their graves, they lay the foundation of a new life, by their new conquests, as if they should live hundreds of yeares: And not content to be sicke themselves, they infect our Philip with their contagious disease, who imbarques both himselfe and his children in this quarrell. But the yeare shall not passe before they be all intombed, and Pope Martin with them, who instead of casting Water, brought Wood and Oyle to this fire, he shall be bound vp in the same bundell, to be cast with the rest into the graue: but lets returne to our discourse. The quarrell betwixt these two Princes, begins by reproaches. Charles complains of Peter, That during the Peace, hee had against all the rights of neighbourhood, affinity, honesty and friendship, against the law of Nations, and duty of Kings, vsurped and invaded by detestable fraud, by theft, and treachery, vnworthy of a Prince, and an honest man, the Realme of Sicilia, given him by authority of the holy Sea, as a holy gage of the Church. Peter answers: That Charles is the vniuall vsurper, hauing violently taken the Lands of the Empire from Manfroy the lawfull heire. That hee could not bee ignorant of his right, hauing married Constance his Daughter, by whom hee had Sonnes, to whom hee could not deny the duty of a Father, without wronging of Nature.

Thus he opposeth the authority of Nature to the Popes power, right to wrong, and reason to passion. Moreover, to this law of Nature, hee ioynes Faith, the ground of humane societie, being called and desired by a people vniuallly wronged in their goods, liues and honors. Should he then condemne their teares, being bound to succour them? He hath therefore done what hee ought, a lawfull heire against an vsurper and a tyrant, for poore people oppressed: resolute to continue so great a worke, worthy of a Christian King, perswading himselfe that God, who had given him a good beginning, would send him a happy ending, leaving Sicilia free and peaceable to his posterity. And thus one for another. Hereunto Pope Martin the fourth did adde his thundrings, supporting Charles his cause with as great vehemencie, as his Predecessor Nicholas had laboured to plot this practice against him. Hee sends a Legat to the Sicilians to let them vnderstand that they were excommunicated, and their goods confiscate. The Legat deliueis his Commission freely, and cites all the people to Rome, with an expresse inhibition to all Priests, to communicate any Sacraments vnto them vnder great paines: So all the Churches in Sicilia were shut vp by the Popes command. The same thunderbolts cast against Peter, hee is excommunicated, degraded, and his Realme of Arragon accursed; but from words they fell to blowes. Charles resolute to hazard all, intreats Philip his Nephew to succour him with his best meanes in this his great necessity. And the better to ingage him, he giues Katherine (the daughter of his sonne Charles the lame) in marriage to Charles the youngest sonne of Philip, and in consideration of this marriage giues him the Duchy of Aniou. Of this marriage shall issue Philip of Vallois, who shall be King of France 43. yeares after.

Philip succours his vnkle Charles.

The Sicilians seek to make their peace with Charles.

A combat appointed betwixt a King.

Peter fortifies himselfe in Sicilia.

Charles King of Naples dies.

All France armes for this warre: Philip employes all his meanes, Peter Earle of Alanfon the Kings brother, Robert Earle of Arthois his nephew, the Duke of Bourgogne, the Earles of Bologne, Dampmartin, and Iogny, with an infinit number of the Nobility, repair from all parts of the Realme: Charles sending men expressly with priuate letters, to all his friends to inuite them to this warre. And to keepe Paleologus in Constantinople, he works with the Christians of Asia, and with the Islands of Cipres, Malta, Rhodes, and others to make warre against him, and likewise he fought to disquiet Arragon, by meanes of the Nauarros, Philip remaining at Tholoufa for that purpose.

Behold the Arragonois in great perplexity, charged on all sides, both with spiritual and temporal armes, but that which troubled him most, the Sicilians (excommunicated by the Pope, and amazed at so great Forces as came to Charles from all parts) not only grew cold, but also sought to make their peace with Charles. To this end they got to Rome to Pope Martin, of who they craue pardon with an extraordinary humility, for the History notes that their Deputies being on their knees, cryed to the Pope, Qui tollis peccata mundi misere nostri. A title belonging only to Iesus Christ. This deuout respect, had in a manner drawne the Sicilians to Charles his obedience, wherein doubtlesse hee had prevailed, if he would haue embraced the occasion, for Pope Martin had perswaded them to yeeld, but without a French Garrison: Whereunto Charles would not condescend, seeking to haue them at his discretion. Peter was not quiet in mind amidst all these difficulties, hauing the Pope in front, the people ready to reuolt, Philip watching ouer his Realm of Arragon, and an army in the port of Naples ready to land.

He finds an expedient for all these difficulties, to stay all these forces, to quiet this storm of Sicilia and to escape all dangers, after a manner in shew worthy of commendation, for the reputation, valor, and bounty of so great a Prince. He giues Charles to vnderstand that he lamented the common misery of so much people, whom hee did see in danger for their priuate quarrels, that it were much better to end it betwixt themselves by the sword. That if he were an honest man, a souldiar, and a King, he was ready to fight, with him, and Sicilia should remaine to the Conqueror. They were both old & broken, but both equal: Peter had only the aduantage in one thing, hee was more cunning then Charles, and his Dint was to circumvent him, as indeed he did. Charles willingly accepts the combat. The manner is determined by a common consent. That either King should take a hundred choise horse, and that the conquering troope should purchase Sicilia to his King.

Bordeaux is chosen for the place of combat, the day is appointed. All Europe flies to this Theater, to see an end of so notable a quarrel, by such an extraordinary means. Charles comes to the place at the prefixed day with his troope chosen out of the brauest Gentlemen of the army. Peter appears not, nor any one for him. He is called, he is summoned, they protest against him, but there is no newes of him. So after all these solemn prote-stations, every one retires with laughter: but Peter was otherwise employed; he assured Sicilia by his wiues meanes, whom he sent thither, providing to fortifie the weaker places, both of Sicilia and Naples equally threatened. The heate of the French is cooled, by this intermission of time, by the hope of an accord, and by the departure of so great a multitude disbanded to see this fight; the Sicilians had taken breath, & Peter stood firme to chooise his best aduantage. The French (being out of hope to see this controuersie ended by combat) returne to armes, (but with lesse courage,) to make warre in Sicilia, they must approach, and they must land. Roger of Lore a banished man of Apulia, Admiall of the Arragon fleet, had the guard of the landing: Charles the Lame, son to King Charles, offers to land, but his fleet is defeated, and he taken prisoner.

Charles wonderfully perplexed with this losse, runs from City to City in his Realme of Naples, seeking to raise new Forces, when as death calls him to his rest: the which in his life time he would neuer enioy, hauing giuen to many, and receiued himselfe infinit troubles without any fruit. In his youth his enterprises were happy, but in his age very unfortunate. Robert Earle of Arthois (by the decease of the father, & imprisonment of the son) remains Tutor to the children of his father in law Charles the Lame, and Regent of the Realme of Naples: but Peter of Arragon keepees Sicilia (at that time lost) for the French. After the death of Charles of Aniou, behold Peter of Arragon is assailed with a new party. Pope Martin the 4. doubled his excommunications against him, as a capital enemy of the Church, and inuested Charles the youngest son of Philip King of France in his Realme.

he absolues the Arragonois from their oath of obedience, and proclaimes a holy warre, as against a sworne enemy of the Church. For the execution of these threats, Philip employs all his meanes to raise a goodly Army, vowing to bee no more circumvented by Peter of Arragon. James King of Maiorica and Minorica ioynes with him an enemy to Peter, who had spoiled him of his Estate, so as there were foure Kings in this Army. Philip King of France, and his eldest sonne Philip King of Nauarre, Charles his sonne inuested in the Realme of Arragon by the Pope, and James King of Maiorica. The Army was faire, & the Frenchmens courage great, being very resolute to reuenge the massacre of the Sicilian Euen-song, the ridiculous scome of the combat, and the imprisonment of Charles. The red scarfe, the marke of the holy warre, against one excommunicated, and their courageous resolution to bee reuenged of a cruell enemy, who had shed blood by treason, appears in these troopes brauely armed. All this promised a great victory to Philip, who commanded his army in person. But the issue will shew, that being a Conqueror hee lost the fruits of his victory, and in the death of three great personages, shall bee seene the vanity of this world. Philip enters the Countie of Rossillon with a goodly Army: all obeyes him, except the Cities of Genes neere to Perpignan, the which he besieged, and it was well defended, but in the end it was taken by the French. Peter was come out of Sicilia to defend his fathers inheritance: hee fortifies all hee can against Philip, and the difficulty of passages, seemed to fauour him, but the resolution of the French surmounted the steepnesse of the Rocks.

The passages are forced, Peters army is defeated, and hee saues himselfe with difficulty by these inaccessible places. The Army enters the countie of Emporia. Pierre late yeeldes in one day: Girone is besieged, and as Peter comes to succour it, the French encounter him, and overcome him, who hardly saues himselfe in Ville-franch, extremely amazed with this happy beginning of Philip. What followed he that was accustomed to deceiue all the world by his inuentions and policies, could not by any meanes deceiue death, transported with griefe, sorrow, impatience, and despair, he dies the fifteenth of August, in the same year with his enemy Charles. The brute of Peters death makes Girone to yeeld presently, being a very strong City, and promitteth Philip an assured possession, not onely of the Realme of Arragon, but also of Sicilia, where in shew they could not resist: when as behold other occurrents, which mans reason could not prevent. Philip assuring himselfe thus of the peaceable possession of the Realme of Arragon, minding to free himselfe of a needlesse charge, hee dismisseth the Gallies of Genoa and Pisa, the which hee had hired, and for that the plague was crept into his Campe, he had dispersed his forces about the Cities of Girone and Perpignan, whither he retired himselfe very ficke, with an intent to pacifie the whole Countrey, hauing recovered his health, and taken some breath. Roger Admirall of Arragon (of whom wee haue spoken) ignorant of Peters death, was parted from Sicilia, with an intent to bring him succors against the French flecte. Being arriued at Genoa (a newwre City, and of free access for both parties) he is informed both of the death of his Master, and of the Estate of Perpignan, and being there, of this new accident, hee takes a new aduice. In stead of returning in Sicilia, hee hires the Gallies of Genoa and Pisa, dismissed by Philip and resolues to enter the port of Perpignan, where hee had intelligence, that Philip remained without any great guard, and the port to bee without defence. Hee arriues so happily, as without any opposition hee giues a signall to the people of his arriuall, who suddenly rise and kill the French in the houses and streets. Philip lay sicke in his bed, and the French souldiers had no thought of Roger. The King made a vertue of necessity, hee encourageth his men with a sicke and feeble voice, and they behaued themselves so valiantly, as they expell Roger out of Perpignan, and Philip held the City, who was so diftempered with this alarm, as his sicknesse encreased daily, and he died the fifteenth day of October, hauing suruiued Peter but two moneths: In the same year 1286, and in the same moneth died Pope Martin the fourth, to shew vnto great Princes the incertainty of their great dignities.

Thus liued, thus reigned, and thus died Philip the third, surnamed the Hardy, hauing reigned fifteene yeeres, and liued forty, a great vnderaker, leauing no memorable act to his posterity, but a good example, not to deale in other mens affaires. Of his first Wife Isabel he had Philip and Charles remaining. Charles was Earle of Vallois, of Alanson, and of Perche, father to Philip of Vallois, who in his course shall succede to the Crown.

A Philip his eldest Sonne was King of France: of the same marriage hee had one daughter, Mary who was Duchesse of Austria. By his second wife Mary, hee had Lewis Earle of Eux, and Marguerite Queene of England. The estate of the Empire (after a long confusion of diuers Emperours, and the interregne) had sinnerest: the Popes being buied in the warres of Sicilia. Raoul of Auspourg a good and a wise Prince, was chosen Emperour after these disorders: employing himselfe carefully to cure the wounds of Germany, and held the Empire from the year 1273. vnto 93. The estate of the Church appears by that which hath bene spoken in this reigne. This onely in particular, That a Councell was held at Lions by Gregory the tenth, where it was decreed, That to auoide the tediousnesse of the Popes election, the Cardinals should assemble at the Popes death, and keepe the Conclau, neither going forth, nor conferring with any one, vntill the Pope were chosen. The which is practised at this day. In those daies died Thomas Aquinas, a very subtill disputer, Bonaventure, John Duns called Scot, and Gabriel Biel (famous men in those daies) suruiued him.

PHILIP the fourth, called the Faire, The 46. King of France.

HE found his authority respected within the Realme, as well for his age, as hauing gouerned the State with dignity vnder his father Philip. A good Prince, Iudicious, and of a noble minde, and (the which was not the least point of happinesse in his life) hee was well married with Isabel Queene of Nauarre, whereof he took the name of King, before the decease of his father, enjoying her as a sweet companion of his complexions. Hee had three sonnes by her, goodly Princes of body, and excellent spirits, Lewis, Philip, and Charles, which shall bee Kings successively one after another, but all so ill matched, as it was his griefe to see his childrens houses infected with three Strumpets, and put away without all hope of issue: hauing severely punished the corrupters of his daughters in Law, and confined these insatiate maisties into Monasteries. Hee had also one Daughter of the same bed, named Isabel, who was married to Edward King of England, leauing vnto France a heauie and dangerous leuaine of horrible confusion, by the meanes of her sonne, a fatal scourge for this Realme. Philip after the decease of Isabel, married Constance Daughter of Charles King of Sicily, a faire and a young Princeesse, whom hee left great with a sonne, the which was borne eight daies after his decease, and suruiued him but few daies. Hee began to reigne in the year 1286, and died in the year 1315. Hee reigned 29. yeares. The entrance of this reigne was goodly, but Flanders, Guienne, and the Pope, gaue him (vpon diuers occasions, and at diuers times) many great and painfull crosses. Hee loued Iustice and Learning, wherein hee was well instructed, for that age: so as he did consecrate the first fruits of his reigne, to honour both the one and the other: as also the Muses did honour him with a goodly Oration, which is read in the Originall of this History, for a commendable memory to posterity, of the vertues of this great Prince. The Parliament was not tied to any place, but changed according to the necessity of Prouinces. Suites were most commonly iudged definitively by the Bayliffes and Seneschals, and the greatest causes were decided souerely in the Kings Councell, who gaue free audience to their subiects. Philip hauing obserued (by the experience of former reignes,) that it was very necessary to haue iurisdiction distinctly limited, left a soueraigne power to his Parliament at Paris (a part of his Royall authority) in ciuill and criminall causes: and the better to gouerne it, hee appointed a sufficient number of presidents and Councillors, with his advocate and proctor (which number hath bene since augmented according to occasion) and for the greater countenance of this dignity, he placed it in his chiefe City of Paris: and to that end hee caused that great Palace (one of the most admirable buildings vnder the coape of heaven) to bee built by the meanes of Enguerand of Marigny Barle of Longueuille, Superintendane of the treasury of France. Hee first ordained but two sittings of the Parliament in the year, the which necessity had made ordinary vnder Lewis Hutin his sonne, who also erected an Exchequer at Roan.

Other Provinces had their Parliaments at diuers times, and vpon diuers occasions: with like affection he fauoured his Vniuersitie of Paris, with all manner of priuiledges: hauing his wife Isabelle a companion of the same humour, whom he suffered to build in her name that goodly Colledge of Naurre, where at this day in this iron age, we may behold with admiration, the great bounty of our Kings in commendable and vertuous actions. These goodly beginnings (in shew the first fruits of a found peace,) were crossed with many difficulties, both within and without the Realme. Flanders gaue the first subiect. This country is one of the chiefe Seigneuries of this Monarchy, & in the year 1225. this lawfull subiection was acknowledged at Melun by the Earle of Flanders. In the beginning of this reigne, Guy Earle of Flanders came to doe his homage to Philip, who required to haue the Cities of Flanders to ratifie this peace of Melun, the which was performed, but vnwillingly by this rich people, who still complained vnto Philip, that his parliament at Paris did infringe their priuiledges, for the which he wisely provided: but the great security of these rich Cities must needs be the cause of their own afflictions, as it chanceth often, that a rich people, being too far, seeke wilfully their owne ruine. Guienne did likewise much trouble Philip, and these two quarrels were intricate one with another, like vnto discords which come together, according to the times and occasions when they chance. The King of England was Duke of Guienne since the mariage of Eleanor, as wee haue seene: but many difficulties haue falne out: the accord made by the King S. Lewis, specified by vs, had limited the Seigneuries of Guienne to the English, the which hee should hold by homage of our Crowne: but he could not limit his desire, being watchfull vpon all occasions, to free himselfe from the subiection of France. Let vs follow by degrees, the actions and the order of time, in the comberfome report of these new stormes, falling out diuersly, and in diuers places: like as in a time inclined to raine, a cloud diggeth it selfe by planets in diuers parts.

The force and neighbourhood of England increased the quarrell, and caused a continuance by diuers accidents. Edward the first of that name, sonne to Henry the third, liued then in England, and Count Guy in Flanders. Edward came likewise into France, and did homage to the new King for the Duchy of Guienne, and other lands which hee held of the Crowne, as Guy had done for his. It chanced that certaine English ships scouring along the coast of Normandy, made a great spoile of the subiects of France. Philip vpon their complaints, intreats Edward to cause restitution to be made of that which had been vniuilly taken by his subiects. Edward neglects it: so as Philip causeth him to be adorned, to yeeld a reason of this attempt, as vassall to the Crowne. Hee appeares not, and so by sentence he is declared guilty of felony, and of high treason, and to haue forfeited his interest in all his Seigneuries of France. For the execution of this decree, Arnoul of Neefe Constable of France is sent into Guienne with an Army, in the year 1293. a notable date to quote the first letter in this Inuentory of a very long processe, although with some intermission, yet so violent, as it had almost ruined France. The Constable doth his exploit, he taketh Bourdeaux the chiefe City of Guienne, and then most of the other Townes doe willingly yeeld obedience vnto the King. Rions and some other Castles well fortified by the English hold good, to serue as a leuaine of this warre.

Edward seeing himselfe thus afflicted, armes by sea and land. By sea he sends an Army vnder the conduct of Robert Tipstiffe: by land he sends some Forces vnder the command of John Breton, to preclude that which remained in Guienne: and to fortifie himselfe with friends in the doubtfull euents of so important a cause, hee makes a league with Guy Earle of Flanders, & for confirmation thereof, he demands his daughter Philip for his eldest sonne the Prince of Wales, the heire apparent to the Crowne of England, which the Earle accepts willingly. And to omit nothing that might auail him, hee enters league with Henry Duke of Bar, giuing him Eleanor his daughter in marriage, and with Adolphe of Nassau Emperour, both hauing pretensions against France. The Duke of Bar demanded Champagne of the King, by the rights hee pretended, and enters it with Forces. Philip sends Gualter of Crecy the Lord of Castillon vpon Marne against him with a goodly army, who on the other side (entring into Barrois) makes a diuersion, & forceth the Duke to

A returne to defend his owne against Gualter. The Emperour after a brauing manner giues notice vnto the King, that he will make warre against him, to recouer the lands belonging to the Empire. Philip makes no other answer, but sends him a packet well sealed vp, in the which was a white paper folded like a Letter, without any writing. This scoffe was a great desic, as indeed the braueries of Adolphe had no successe. The Earle of Flanders was the neereft and most dangerous enemy to preiudice Philip, who had ioyned himselfe to the King of England, by so strict a bond as the mariage of his Daughter. Philip hauing three great enemies in front, tries his wits to stay them. The most dangerous was he that dealt vnder-hand, that is, the Fleming: who made a good shew to Philip, and yet treated with his most dangerous enemy, but policy did circumspect policy. The King finds meanes vnder-hand, to giue him notice that he would gladly see his Daughter, whom he had christned, & was called Philip by his name, before he led her into England. Guy brings her with him to Paris: being arrived, he is committed prisoner by the King: the cause is made knowne vnto him by such as had commandement to arrest him. That being his vassall, hee had presumed to ally himselfe with a capitall enemy to the Crowne, giuing him so precious a gage as his daughter. Guy obtaines leaue to speak with the King. He excuseth himselfe, but his daughter remains as a pawne with the Queene, to bee married at the Kings good pleasure. His daughter (although kindly entertained by the King and Queene) was full of griefe, lamenting daily, as if this honorable guard had been a most cruell prison. The Earle intreats Philip to send him his daughter: he answers him plainly, that he tooke her not to restore her. Hereupon Guy takes occasion to complaine of the great wrong he pretended to be done him by Philip, who detaines his daughter forcibly without reason.

The English in the meane time make open warre in Guienne. Philip foreseeing that this was the beginning of a great storme (meaning to lay the burthen vpon him that might do him harme) sends a goodly Army into Guienne against the English, vnder the conduct of two great Commanders, his brother Charles Earle of Vallois, and the Constable of Neefe, to molest the enemy in diuers places. Rions and Fronlac, townes vpon the riuier of Garonne, (then strong, but now ruined) are besieged, and after many difficulties, D yeeld vnto the King, and in the end Saint Seuer, but with more paine. Edmond, brother to the King of England is defeated at sea, and returning into England, repaires his Nauy. But struing afterwards in vaine to besiege Bourdeaux with new forces, hee goes and dies at Bayonne, then belonging to the English.

Thus all things succeeding ill for the English, he seeks all meanes to fortifie himselfe. Hee flies to the Emperour Adolphe, the chiefe instrument of his hope, and sends him money to leaue an Army. To Pope Boniface the eight, beseeching him to remember the priuate bond hee had to the preservation of England, whereof he was protector. Guy Earle of Flanders ioynes openly with the English in this societie, to make warre against Philip with all his Forces. But from these light beginnings sprung diuers occasions E which troubled these great Princes. The Fleming is the chiefe aduancer of this tragedy, and shall haue his share in it.

Hee calls a great Assembly in the City of Gramont, in the year 1296. at the feast of Christmas, where Adolphe the Emperour, Edward King of England, the Duke of Austria, John Duke of Brabant, the Earle of Iuliers, William of Iuliers his son, John Earle of Holland and of Haynault, Robert Earle of Nevers, William, Henry and Guy of Flanders, John Earle of Namur, and many other great personages meet, and with one consent resolute to make warre against Philip. The colour was to maintaine Guy Earle of Flanders, vniuilly afflicted by Philip, who had violently taken and stolne his daughter against the right of Nations, and detained her: refusing obstinately to restore her to her father. It was decreed that Guy should begin by force, and bee well seconded by the Emperour and the English, in case of necessity. But before they come to armes, Pope Boniface should make the first point by the iuster of his authority. All things threatened Philip with much trouble, but the end will shew that the attempts of man are all but vaine. Boniface (according to the iurent of their league) sends his Nuncio to Philip, which was James Bishop of Metz, to exhort him to doe iustice, both to the Earle of Flanders, and to the King of England, protesting that hee desired nothing more then peace betwixt Christian Princes. Hee sent the same Nuncio vpon the same subiect into England, but with an other intent then he made shew of vnto Philip, casting wood & oyle into this fire, in stead of water to quench it. But for that this Pope must appear in many acts of this Theater; we must obserue his disposition, by some sufficient and not suspected testimony. Platina the Popes Secretary. Being (saith he) a Priest, Cardinall of Saint Martin of the Mount, hee affected the pontificall dignity with such vehemency, as hee omitted neither ambition nor fraud to compass it: and moreover, he was pufft up with such arrogancy, as hee contemned the whole world. Hee reports also, that he vsed a notable policy to circumuent Celestin, being chosen to the dignity of the Pope, a simple man and vnfit for matters of State; hee suborned some one to talke to him in the night like an Angell, perswading him to leaue this charge if he would be saued: hee preuailes by his practises, and wrought fo by subtilties, as hee was chosen Pope in his place. Being Pope, he desired nothing more then to kindle the warre betwixt the Guelphes, and the Gibelins, then called blacke and white, by a name and marke of a faction. Platina quotes a singular prooffe of his disposition, nothing inclined to procure peace among Christian Princes. Prochet Archbishop of Genoa, affecting the Gibelin faction, kneeled at Boniface seete on Ash Wednesday: As the Priest is accustomed to say: Memento homo quia cinis es, & in cinerem reuerteris, hee said (changing the words) Memento homo quia Gibelinus es, & cum Gibelinis in cinerem reuerteris, casting the ashes into his eyes, whereas they are accustomed to cast them on the head, in signe of humility and submission. Boniface thus inclined to the peace of Christendome, that is to say (as the Lord of Haillan writes) more pufft vp with glory and vanity, then good zeale to the peace of Christian Princes, he commands Philip by his Nuncio, to restore to the English and Flemings what they demanded, and for not obeying, he cites him to appeare at Rome vpon paine of excommunication. Philip a wife and a valiant Prince, although hee were discontented with this course, yet he sent an honourable Ambassage to Rome, by the Archbishop of Rheims, and the Earle of Saint Paul, to lay open his right before the Deputies of the King of England and the Earle of Flanders, who were then at Rome to complaine as being wronged. All parties being heard, Boniface decrees that Philip (as the fountaine and cause of all the miseries and inconueniences which had happened) should yeeld to Edward and to Guy all they demanded, both in Guienne, and Flanders, charging the Archbishop of Rheims to signifie this Bull vnto the King, vpon paine of excommunication for not obeying. This was the first blow giuen by Boniface against Philip: The other Scene of this Tragedy shall represent another act. But what doth Philip after these great threats? He prepares for deeds, not suffering himselfe to be daunted with words, and tries his wit to find out meanes to maintaine himselfe against so mighty enemies, not holding it fit nor worthy of a King of France to bee terrified with these comminations from Rome, employed without reason against his lawfull authority. So seeking for all helpe, he resolves to be ready for all euents, holding words insufficient to calme this storme. He laies great impositions (which they call Maletost) vpon his subiects for the leauying of souldiers, and impositeth great tenths vpon the Clergy.

But in the search of this remedy, he was encountered with two difficulties: on the one side, his Subiects furcharged with the exaction of these great sums, being almost in despair, were ready to rebell in diuers places, especially in the greater Cities: And on the other side, Pope Boniface thundered against him by new Comminations and Censures: forbidding the Clergy to contribute any thing. This Prince crossed with these difficulties, continues his course resolutely, as great worke requires a noble and vndaunted spirit: but before he enters war against Guy Earle of Flanders, he sends the Archbishop of Rheims, and the Bishop of Senlis vnto him, to aduertise him not to enter into a voluntary war: That the King was as careful of his daughter as himselfe, to marry her honorably according to her quality: That he did nothing unworthy of a good King, or a good God-father, in not suffering his subiects to ally themselves to his capitall & deadly enemies, the which he spake not for feare of the Earles Forces, or of his friends, but for the care he had of his subiects, not to see them run headlong into ruine, and therefore hee presents him the choice of Peace or War. Count Guy answers, that hee is resolute to recouer his right by force from the King, seeing he might not haue it by reason.

Philip hauing tryed mildnesse in vaine, comes to force. He had a goodly Army, whereof hee takes the one halfe, and giues the other to Robert Earle of Arthois his cousin. He turnes the head of his army against Lille, and besiegeth it, whilst that Robert defeats the Flemings at Furnes, and takes the Earles of Iuliers and Albemont, with many other of great account, and sends them prisoners into France. So continuing his victory hee takes the townes of Cassel, Bergues, Saint Winoch, Furnes, and all the West part, with an incredible celerity. The King hauing taken Lille, he enters victoriously into Bruges. At this sudden checke, all the rest of Flanders stands amazed. This happy beginning did shake the designs of the confederate Princes, so as without any more delay they sue for peace. Ambassadors come presently vnto him from the King of England, demanding a Truce, the which he granted, comprehending the Earles of Flanders and Neucrs, vpon condition they should put their controuersies in compromise: and so he returned into France, leaving Raoul of Neche his Constable, Gouvernour of the Country of Flanders. This was the first voyage of Philip into Flanders, in the year 1297. All things seemed to be thus mildly pacified, but the progresse will soon shew, that Philip had no meaning to recieve the Earle of Flanders into fauour: for the Truce being newly expired, Charles Earle of Valois enters into Flanders with the same victorious army, where he takes Bethune, Douay, Cortray, and all the rest of the Country of Flanders, except Gant, whither the Earle Guy was retired with his children, being disappointed of succours from his allies and confederates. England is quiet, and the Emperour Adolphe is no more to be feare, who had made this poore Earle to weare the bable: and the Gantois make their peace with the King, keeping their priuiledges. But what shall become of the Earle? he yeelds himselfe absolutely into the hands of Robert Earle of Arthois, with promise, that by his intercession, he should be restored into the Kings good fauour, and so into the possession of his Estate. Vpon this promise of Robert, Guy (accompanied with his children, Robert, William, and Guy, and his Nobility that were most confident vnto him) comes to Paris, but his hope was soon turned into a languishing sorrow: for both himselfe, his children, and all his followers, were dispersed into sundry places vnder sure guards, as the Kings prisoners: from whom they could draw no other answer, but that he had passed no word to his brother, and that they were his prisoners by a iust warre. Philip without any further delay passeth into Flanders with a goodly troupe, to take possession of the Earledome: as proprietary and chiefe Lord, and to vnit it to the Crowne, by vertue of a sentence; whereby the person of Count Guy was found guilty of high treason, and his lands were confiscate to the King, as to his soveraigne Lord. He comes to Gant, where he is received with pompe, as Prince and Lord, he receiued their homage, and makes them many good lawes for the government of the Country, appointing James of Chastillon, Lord of Leuse and Conde, for Gouvernour and Licutenant General, and so returns to Paris. Then were Garisons presently placed, and Citadels made in all the townes, as conquered by the sword; they are charged with contributions, taxes, and impositions one vpon another, to finish the buildings, and to nourish the souldiers, with such other things as depended thereon. Such was the liberty and confusion of military discipline. On the other side, there were complaints and popular mutinies for the exactions made by the Kings command. These popular discontents did suddenly cause a new confusion. A people ought to be entreated with much mildnesse, be they either newly conquered, or reduced to their old obedience. This ill vantage gaue all the better townes occasion to reuolt. Bruges began, and is followed presently by the rest, but they must seeke meanes for their preservation, to maintaine themselves against the Forces of Philip, which vndoubtedly would fall vpon them. They assemble at Bruges. The first difficulty is to prouide a Commander. John and Guy of Namur brethren (sonnes to Guy Earle of Flanders) were jointly chosen by a generall consent, and come to Bruges. There all the Cities (Gant excepted) make an offensive and defensive league, against the King of France for their Earles deliuey. The Dice are cast, all breaks out into a furious sedition. At Bruges the French are slaine by their Hosts, Count S. Paul (who went thither to pacifie these troubles) escaped hardly. Fury had found them out Commanders fit for their humours. A wretched Weaver, suborned and counterfeit, mutinous and full of words (named Peter) is one of their chiefe Colonels, accompanied with like Ruffians: and the other Commanders a Butcher of like qualities to this Tribune. But as the baster sort begin these rebellions, so great men end them. Philip of Flanders (sonne to Guy) being a prisoner, flies from Apouille (where he was well appointed) to succour his Father and Country, being ready to suffer shipwracke. The Nobility of the Country

(who feared the fury of this mad enraged multitude) ioyne easily with him. The popular state (seeing how needfull the armes and direction of Gentlemen was for them) seeke all meanes to haue their fauour. The cause is plausible, the deliuey of their good Earle, and the liberty of their Country. Flanders being thus set on fire, Philip was in no lesse perplexity, resolving to employ all his Forces to suppress this mutinous nation. In few daies he leauies an army of forty thousand men, with exceeding diligence, and he himselfe is in field as General. And yet all this dies like a fire of straw, and breeds euents not foreseen by him, who in shew was the stronger, but in the end hee proues the weaker, and beares the blowes: for he was scarce entred into Flanders as farre as Boisduec, but hee talkes of his returne, pretending the vnsafonableness of the time, yet the cause was apparently knowne to be otherwise: and some thought that he feared a reuolt at home. So this great shew preuailed little in Flanders, and bred an infinite charge to France. This was the success of Philip's second voyage into Flanders, with much bruit and no fruit. This his sudden retreat incensed this mutinous people more, and gaue courage to their Commander, to be the more resolute against Philip, by the renewing of a mutuall alliance: and made Philip seeke to repaie the error which he had (in his owne conceit) committed, in not employing so goodly an army against the Flemings: hee raiseth another army of forty thousand men of the companies already leauied, vnder the command of Robert Earle of Arthois his Cousin, accompanied with Arneul of Neele, Constable of France, and many great personages.

The diuers humours of both parties, were a foretelling of the issue of these armies: for the Earle of Arthois marched against the Flemings, as against a bafe people, easie to be vanquished, and this humour of the General crept into the soldierys minds, as going to an vndoubted victory, and not to a doubtfull combat. Contrariwise, the Flemings marched carefully to defend themselves against great Warriors, for the defence of their liberty against them that were greatly incensed, and vnder a wife and graue Commander. They choose for their Leader John of Namur, with his brethren Guy and Philip, (sonnes to the Earle Guy prisoner) accompanied with many Noblemen, that were good soldierys, and swayne enemies to the French, leading a people very resolute for their owne preferuations. The armies met neere to the towne of Cortray, in a place called Groeminghe. The Earle of Arthois would by all meanes draw the Flemings to fight: who fought onely to defend themselves, and therefore had chosen a place to campe in, strong both by nature and art, lying close with their batallions. This their countenance not to fight, made Robert of Arthois the more resolute to force them, contrary to the Constables aduice. The great numbers of the French did at the first terrifie the Flemings, but (their minds seasoned with the former considerations) they were encouraged by their leader John of Namur. Robert therefore hauing commanded his Horse to charge their Squadrons furiously, the Flemings withstood them as courageously, and hauing disordered them, they forced them to retire vpon their owne Foot, who were placed with so great a contempt of the enemy, as if they were not to fight, but to gather the spoiles of vanquished men. The horsemen thus disordered, passe through their bands of foot, the which thus diuided abandon their ranks, and then their armes. Some fight here, others flye there, but the horse & foot being in rout, they could not ioyne againe. The disorder was general: some defend themselves courageously, but there remains no squadrons to fight in grosse. Their multitude is a hindrance vnto them: the Flemings encouraged with this success, are the more eager in killing, for that this defeat of our men was v unexpected, and this multitude being victorious, is fished vpon the French without mercy, glutting themselves vpon them whom before they feared. Of this great army there hardly escaped 300, all are past together great and small. Not one Commander escaped, & very few Noblemen. Robert Earle of Arthois cousin to the King of France, General of the army; Arneul Lord of Neele, Constable of France; James of Chastillon, Gouernor of Flanders; John King of Maiorca, Godeffroy of Brabant, and his son the Lord of Viczon, the Earles of Eu, La Marche, Damarin, Aumale, Auge, Tancarville, and many other great personages which were the offerings of these cowardly spirits. They number 12000. Gentlemen slaine in this battell by this enraged multitude. A notable president, not to contemne an enemy, which teacheth what a furious people well led may doe: and especially, that victories come from heaven: for here the lesser number vanquished the greater, and the weak the strong.

A This victory called of Cortray or Groeminghe, was followed with an absolute reuolt of all Flanders against the French. It hapned in the year 1302. the 11. of Iuly, John of Namur remaining their Gouernour in the absence of their imprisoned Earle. Philip receiued a great checke in this battell: but he had more bottomes to vntwist. All the threats of Edward King of England, and of the Emperour Adolphe vanished: onely Pope Boniface the 8. shewed himselfe obstinate in his hatred against Philip. A discourse worthy to be carefully described:

In the hottest of these Flemish afflires, Boniface did excommunicate Philip, and curst his Realme vpon this occasion: The Christians estate was lamentable in the East, the Tartarians increased dayly. Cassan King of Tartars, allyed with the King of Armenia a Christian, made a great profession of loue to the Christians: and for that the Mammelukes held Iudea and Ierusalem, he desired to draw the Kings and Princes of Christendome to their ayd. To this end he sends an Ambassador to Boniface the 8. and to Philip King of France, to entreat them both to employ their authorities and meanes in so good a worke. Boniface failes not to embrace this occasion; he not onely exhorts Philip to succour the Tartar, but also commands him proudly and imperiously vpon paine of excommunication. This Bull was giuen and deliuered to a sufficient man, named Stephen, an Arragonois, whom he had made Bishop of Apamiers, a town in the County of Foix, which they commonly call Pamiers, and had erected this new Bishopricke in the Archbishopricke of Thoulou, without the Kings priuity or consent: who acquitted himselfe of his charge so stoutly, that when as Philip represented vnto him the greatneffe of his affaires, so as hee could not obey the Popes command: he answered with a bold face, That if the King would not obey the Pope, he would deprive him of his Realme.

The subiect, the manner, and the person, (advanced thus against his will) did so moue and stirre Philip, (grieved and disturbed with this late losse and ouerthrow, as if the Pope would insult ouer him for his bad and vnforsunate successe) that hee imprisoned this Bishop. Pope Boniface transported with choller, sends so him againe one Peter a Romane borne, (Archbishop of Narbonne) with sharper Bals, to summon him to undertake this voyage of the East: to command him also not to touch the reuenues of the Clergy: to reprehend him sharply, for that he had presumed to lay hands vpon the Bishop whom he had sent: and to enioyne him to send him presently backe in full liberty. His charge extended to no other censures, in case he disobeyed not in the principall. The Archbishop executed his charge bodily. Philip shewed him with great modesty, the impossibility of this voyage, the reasons which had moued him to leaue this tenth of the Clergy, and so to entreat the Bishop, hauing spoken vnto him without any respect. The Archbishop replied with more arrogancy, That he was ignorant of the Popes authority, who was not onely the father of Christian soules, but also soueraigne Lord and Prince in temporal things. And therefore by that authority he did excommunicate him, declaring him vnworthy to reigne, and his Realme forfeited to the Church of Rome, to inuest whom hee pleased. Moreover, he brought another Bull, directed to the Prelates and Noblemen of France by the which hee did acquit and dispence all Frenchmen from their oath of obedience to Philip. And a third, by the which hee did cite all the Prelates and Diuines of the French Church, to appeare before him at Rome: disannulling all indulgences and priuiledges granted to the French, by any Popes his predecessors.

The Earle of Arthois disdainning this affront, takes the Bull and casts it in the fire, saying, That no such dishonour should euer befall the King, to submit himselfe to any such conditions. Philip amazed at these bold affronts, refers the whole matter to his Councell, who conclude to send backe the Popes two Nuncios to Rome, and to forbid the Prelates of France to goe, or to send any money to Rome: beseeching Philip to proceed in the affaires of his Realme, and not to stay in so goodly a course. This done, Philip raiseth new and great Forces to returne into Flanders. At his entry the Flemings were defeated at Arques neere to Saint Omer, in a strait passage. Guy of Namur besieging Xirixie, was ouerthrowne by the Kings Nauy, assisted by sixteene Gallies of Genoa, vnder the command of Renier Grimaldi: and being taken, is caried to the King, being in his army betwixt Lille and Douay. After this fortunate beginning, many Cities yielded to the French, the rest fearing the euent, stood amazed, the fume of their victory being euaporated, as if the first heat being cold, they entreat the Earle of Sauoy to be a mediator to Philip for a truce, truce, whereby they might obtaine a peace, after so many miseries. Philip of Flanders and John of Namur brethren, were great perfwaders thereof, for the naturall desire they had to free their poore father so long time a prisoner. But Philip thirsting after reuenge for his losse at Cortray, refused it. He aduanceth, and defeats the Flemings at Aire and at Tournay. There chanced in the end that notable encounter at Mons in Penelle, where they were wonderfully beaten, to make them lose the taste of the battell of Cortray, yet Philip was in danger of his life, and bought this victory dearly: and the Flemings (like men in despaire) assembled together from all parts, although vnder hand they did sue to Philip for peace: the which in the end they obtained, at the instance of John Duke of Brabant, vpon these conditions: That the Soueraignty remaining to the King, and the Flemings enjoying their liberties, the Earle Guy and all other prisoners, should be set at liberty, without ranfome: and the Flemings should pay eighty thousand pound sterling, for the charges of the warre; and the Castles of Lisle, Douay, Cassel, and Cortray, should be deliuered into the Kings hands as a pawne, untill the end of the payment: and that he might beat downe what hee had built in the Castles of Lisle and Douay, deliuering them to the Earle, as to their lawfull Lord: That the Flemings should raze the wals and forts of foue principall Cities, Gant, Bruges, Ypre, Lisle, and Douay, and neuer to build them againe: That the King should make choice of three thousand men at his pleasure, in Bruges and thereabouts, that were culpable of the seditions and murders committed, a thousand of them to be employed beyond the Seas, and two thousand on this side: and that the Flemings should furnish fixe hundred men at armes, to serue the King one whole yeare where he pleased. And for the performance hereof, the Cities should be bound, and should forsaite threecore thousand Liuers for non-payment: for the effecting whereof, Deputies should be appointed. During this treaty, the Earle Guy and his daughter Philip, (the subiect of this troublefome revolt) died, to the great griefe of Philip, who sees himselfe frustrate of all meanes to shew his clemency and bounty. But when these articles were brought vnto the Cities, the people did murine with great impatience, so as the Deputies perswaded Philip to moderate those which were most grievous. The demanding of the townes (except Bruges, where the revolt began, and the banishment of the men, conuerting it into a pecuniary fine, and a great summe to an annuall pension prefixt to easie payments.) Thus the accord was made: Robert, William, and Guy brethren, the sonnes of the Earle Guy of Flanders, were deliuered with all the prisoners, but we shall see that in the execution thereof there was much trouble. During these hard and rough proceedings, Edward King of England hauing receiued a checke in Guienne, was quiet, fearing Philips resolution in greatest dangers: whereof he could wisely free himselfe: in the end an accord is made by the mariage of Isabel, he left to his posterity a heauy pawne to pretend a title to the whole Realme. Philip had his reuenge of the Emperour Adolphe, who had so boldly braued him in the beginning of this quarrell, vnder colour of demanding the lands of the Empire, lying in the Countries of Bourgogne, Dauphine, and Prouence, being in old time the Realm of Arles, but then in the power of diuers Lords (as we haue said) vnder the Kings authority. The King of England, and Earle of Flanders had great cause to complaine of him, hauing receiued two hundred thousand Crownes to make war against Philip, the which he employed in the purchase of Thuringe, and taking possession of that goodly Country, so vnjustly gotten, being sold by an vnnatural father, who would disinherit his children. This filthy traffike (aggravated by the complaints of the King of England, and Earle of Flanders) made Adolphe of Nassau very odious and contemptible, being issued from a noble and worthy race, but this act against the poore children, made him vnworthy of the Empire, from which he was depozed by a decree of the Electors, and Albert of Austria seated in his place, who pursuing him with warre, slue him (as they write) with his owne hand, in an encounter nere vnto Spire.

But Pope Boniface the 8. (Philips greatest enemy) remained yet vn pacified, who stil continued his choller against him, in a season when as he thought him to be drawne dry, both of men and money: for they write that this warre of Flanders had wasted about three hundred thousand Frenchmen in eleven yeares, during the which it continued. We haue seene how he vsed him by his Nuncios: this last act will not onely shew the continuance of his spleene, but shall also represent a bad Catastrophe in this Tragedy, the which shall light vpon the head of Boniface, fought for by himselfe. Albert of Austria was no sooner chosen

A chosen and installed Emperour by the Electors, but Boniface applied his wit to winne him against Philip, supposing to preuaile against him, as Gregory the ninth had done against Fredricke the second. He proclaimes him Emperour, and inuelt him King of the Realme of France, giuing him both the title and armes: and taking occasion to sow diuision in the heart of the Realme, by meanes of the Clergy, who by reason of their reuenues, had great power in the State, and for the interest thereof, great will to preferre them. He did also write his Letters to Philip in this manner:

Boniface Bishop, seruant of the seruants of God, to Philip King of Frenchmen. Feare God, and obserue his Commandements. We will thee to vnderstand, that thou art subiect to vs, both in spirituall and temporall things, and that it belongs not to thee to giue any Prebend or Benefice. If thou hast the keeping of any of them being vacant, thou must reserue the profits of them to the successors. If thou hast giuen any, we iudge thy gift to be voyd, and doe reuoke all that hath beene done, and who soeuer beleeueth otherwise, wee iudge them hereticks. Given at Latran, the fourth of the Nones of December, in the 6. yeare of our Popedom. The King answers him thus:

Philip, by the grace of God King of France, to Boniface, calling himselfe the soueraigne Bishop, little or no health. Let thy great folly and rashnesse be aduertised, that in temporall things we acknowledge none but God for superior; and that the gift of Prebends being voyd, belongs to vs by our royall Prerogative, and the fruits that grow thereby, the which we will defend by the sword, against all them that shall seeke to hinder our possession, esteeming them fooles and without iudgement, that shall thinke otherwise. These are the very words drawne out of the original.

But Philip (to preuent the plots of Pope Boniface) assembled the Prelates of his Realm at Paris with all speed, and hauing represented vnto them the wrong which Pope Boniface had done him by his decree (from the which he had appealed as erroneous) he makes them to renew the oath of fidelity. He thanks the King of England, in that he yeeldeth not to the perswasions of Boniface, who would haue incensed him against him; and in the end beseeches to stay the violent course of his furious practices. There was a Gentleman following the Court, whose name was Felix of Nogaret (borne in Seuennes, a mountaine Country of Languedoc, of the Family of Albigeois, as in that Country there were many referred from father to sonne, since the grant made them by Saint Lewis) whom Philip held fit for the execution of this charge: there was likewise a guide found out very fit to accompany him. Boniface had ill entreated the Colonis; one of them named Sciaria (lying the Popes fury, and seeking some rest) had beene taken by Pirates, and redeemed by a friend of his at Marseilles, and so brought into France. They could not chooe a more fit instrument to tame his arrogancy, who presumed to controule Kings, and to deprime them of their Estates (as Platina saith.) The pretext of Nogarets voyage to Rome was apparent, to signifie Philips appeale from the Pope vnto a Councell, and to find the meanes to leaue him vnder hand, for at that time the Realme of Naples obeyed the French, whither Philip had conueyed 60. thousand Crownes, by the bancke of the Petrucci, Merchants of Florence, to furnish this leauey. The Pope was retired from Rome to Anagnia, a towne of Abruzzo, (where he was borne) by reason of the troubles at Rome, whereas the Gibelin faction was growne the stronger. There were likewise in Anagnia many corrupted by the siler of France, by such meanes as Sciaria gaue vnto Nogaret, so as hauing drawne in 300. Frenchmen well armed, and wonne many of the Citizens vnto him, the Castle (whereas Pope Boniface was lodged) was seized on, and at the same instant the City gates (with that terror which doth vntually amaze men) surprised. Then the French cry, The City is wonne: no man dares appeare. In this confusion the Castle gates being seized on by French souldiers, Felix of Nogaret being armed (accompanied with Sciaria, Colonis, and many others) enters the palace-hall with their naked swords, Boniface is not much amazed, but hastily attires himselfe in his pontifical robes, and presents himselfe vnto his enemies. Nogaret begins to say vnto him: The good and noble King of France hath sent me hither, to tell thee that he appeales from thee to the Councell. But the Pope hauing not the patience to attend the end, Thy grandfather (said hee) condemned for the heretic of the Albigeois, was iustly punished by fire, a worthy reward for his wickednesse before God and man: I doe not therefore wonder if I see thee thus traitorously surprised by thee an hereticke, but I willingly beare what hapned to that good Pope Silacrus. Nogaret replies, replies, I will lead thee then to Lions, where a Councell shall iudge of thy abuses. But Boniface would haue replied, Sciama more hardly then Nogaret, gaue him a great blow with his gantlet on the face, which made him to bleed much. The Pope cried, and he struck againe, so as Nogaret (hauing no commission to proceed so farre) drew him out of the Chapell Bonifaces pawes, and hauing retired him into his chamber, howling and blaspheming like a desperate man) he led him to Rome. But Boniface through this accident entred into so cruell a frenzy, as he gnawed and eat his owne hands, and so died pitcously the 35 day after, to whom the common report registred in Histories made this Epitaph:

He entred his Popedome like a Foxe, he reigned like a Lyon, and died like a Dog.

Platina adds this Commentary: Thus died Boniface, who laboured to keepe the consciences of Emperours, Kings, Princes, and generally of all men in awe, more by terror then by religion: who sought to giue and take away Kingdomes, to expell and restore Princes at his pleasure: most greedy to gather gold by what means soeuer. Let Princes therefore both (spiritual and temporal learne to gouerne their Clergy and Subjects, not arrogantly with infolency and outrage (as this of whom we speak) but holily and modestly, as Christ our King, and his Disciples and followers, who desired to be beloued, not feared: whence iustly proceeds the ruine of tyrants. He writes also of him: That he nourished diuisions among the Italians, and especially betwixt the Geneuois and the Venetians. Behold the testimony of Platina, and the Catastrophe of the Tragedy which Pope Boniface the 8. had plotted to ruine the King and his Realme. Philip aduertised of the heauy end of him who had praiged to ruine both him and his Estate, presently sends his Ambassadors to the Colledge of Cardinals, being much amazed at this accident, protesting that hee gaue no such commission to Felix of Nogaret, (to whom notwithstanding he gaue in recompence the Barony of Caluision in Vauange neere vnto Nismes) but onely to intimate to Pope Boniface his appeale from him to the Councell; desiring them to expect all friendship and succour from him. The Cardinals reuiued from their great amazement by this kind message from Philip, stood yet long irresolute in the election of a new Pope, fearing to doe any thing vnpleasing vnto the King. In the end they choose one Nicholas a Cardinal, who had assisted Philip cousins in the voyage of Hungary (famous among the Popes by the name of Benedict the 11.) He renokes the excommunication giuen out by Boniface against Philip and his people, and restores the priuiledges of the Vniuersity of Paris, whereof he had deprived them in disdain of Philip: but he liued not long, and the Cardinals desire was to accommodate themselves wholly to the Kings will: they therefore by a generall consent choose Clement, borne at Bazadois in Gascony, of the house of the Vicounts of Tartas, and Lords of Veste, where he built a goodly Castle called Villandrant, as the Lord of Hailan doth testifie (an vnreprouable witness) being of that Country. This Clement was the first of the seven French Popes which held the Sea one after another, vntill Vrbane the 6. vnder whom the Italians recouered it againe with much trouble. These seven Popes were Clement the 5. a Gascon; Iohn 23 of Cahors in Quercy; Benedict the 12. a Tholouian; Clement the 6. Innocent the 6. Vrbane the 5. Gregory the 11. all foure Limosins one after another. Such power had this proceeding of our Philip. Clement the 5. being chosen Pope, he came into France, and the King receiued him at Lions, accompanied with the Kings of England and Arragon in great pompe. The Pope was on horse-backe, and the King with his two brethren on foot, holding the reins of his horse. Hee was crowned in the Temple of Saint Iust, where they had built a great Theater for so goodly a spectacle: but the presse of people was so great, as the Scaffold brake, and the multitude fell one vpon another. The Pope, Kings, Princes, and Noblemen, were all on a heape, and the scaffold fastned to an old wall pulled it downe, so as the King was hurt in the head, the Pope in the foot, and the Duke of Britaine slaine, with a great number of Noblemen and common people that were smothered vnder these ruines. The Popes Crowne fell from his head into the presse, where he lost a Carbuncle valued at fixe thousand Florins of Gold: but the life of men was inestimable. Thus this feast gaue no cause of ioy, but was famous to posterity by this notable accident, and by the translation of the Popes feat from Rome to Anignon, in the year 1305. vnto the year 1379. vnder Vrbane the sixt. This was the first act of Clement the 5. being arriued in France. In the meane time the Flemings practise new troubles, refusing to performe the conditions of peace, and their Earle Robert gathered together men and money on all sides for the warre: whereunto

A Philip tired with the long miseries which had wasted his Realme) was vnwillingly drawne, Yet hee giues charge to Enguerand of Marigny Earle of Longueville, Superintendent of his treasure, to find meanes to leauy an army, appointing Robert of Valois his brother for General, accompanied with Lewis his eldest sonne, and a great number of the Nobility. But the difficulty to recouer money was so great, as the King was forced to grant Truce to Robert Earle of Flanders, the which was more available for him then France. This did greatly displease these two Princes (who had the chiefe places in the Army) complaining of Enguerand, as if he had purposely crossed this leauy, with a pretence of want of money: when as he himselfe was rather corrupted by the Flemings. They smothered this dislike vntill Philip death, who countenanced Enguerand (as his good and faithfull seruant) against the ordinary complaints of these Princes of the blood. But after long delays, Flanders continuing still more obstinate in their rebellion, and Robert seeking but to gaine time, necessity forced Philip to the warre, and want of money held him backe: yet both the one and the other were apparent. For the redress whereof, he finds an expedient, to call an assembly at Paris of all the Cities of his Realme, and there to represent vnto his subjects the great necessity of his affaires, to induce them thereby to contribute meanes for so important a warre, being both necessary and honourable. The Assembly was held in the Court of Parliament (a soleinne place) where the King assisted with all his Councell. Enguerand of Marigny made the speech, as the man which had the managing of his affaires. The Prouost of Paris made offer of any thing the City of Paris could doe, that the example of the capitall City might draw on the rest, who made the like offer. They grant a new imposition often Depuers vpon the Liuer, or Franke, of all Merchandise and wares: but when it came to the execution, there were daily seditions and mutinies in Picardy, Normandy, Orleans, and Lions, whither Philip sent Lewis his eldest sonne to pacifie them. But oh the vanity of this world! Philip had liued with much paine, he had passed his apprenticeship in his fathers troubles, crossed with the warres of Guienne and Flanders, he had giuen and receiued infinite losses, shaken with the pricking thornes of Boniface, who sought to ruine both body and soule in excommunicating him, and seeking to spoile him of his Estate. Was it not then time to rest after all these toyles? and yet behold he is more ready then before to embarke himselfe in new troubles, by the enterprise of a new and dangerous warre, whereof all his posterity could neuer preuaile. But God more wise then himselfe, did cut off these long discourses (cast in the mold of an infinite life) in this life so soone ended. So he dyes when his troubles began to liew, and goes to seeke rest in heauen, which he could not find on earth. He died at Fontainebleau in Gascony, in the year 1314. hauing reigned 28. yeares, and liued 58. His disposition and his children, are noted in the beginning of his reigne, and the estate of the Empire and the Church, throughout the whole discourse thereof.

The estate likewise of the Christians in Asia and Africke, and of the French in Sicily, Naples and Arragon, must necessarily bee described, both that which was past, and that which is to come. The Popes had embarked all Christendome in this action, goodly in shew, and very preiudiciall in effect, for those voyages beyond the sea, haue consumed an infinite number of men thoroughout all Christendome. Our France hath a great share of our Kings. Many Houses were cast away vpon this shiffe, whence grew infinite losses. And from thence likewise came the corruption of fees, by means of the sale of lands made by Gentlemen to peasants. To conclude, they employed 200. yeares to purchase much paine & infinit losse. We haue hitherto seene how things haue passed from reigne to reigne, from the year 1096. the date of the first departure of the Christian army into the East, vnto the year 1315. The ordinary practice of the Popes of Rome, was to free themselves of Kings and Emperours, the more easily to settle their authority ouer them, as the wife and vnfortunate Reader may verifie, by all the circumstances and order of the true History. I speake only in termes of State, and as mildly as truth will permit me. In those times the Turks (who had undertaken the protection of the Christians (the better to settle their affaires) obtained of Pope Clement a new Croysado, to the which Philip had vnto two Joannes, Philip and Charles, but it had no successe, although Clement did what he could to further the action. But a dog that is scalded fears cold water: and experience is the mistress both of wise men and fooles. So all these great shewes in the end came to nothing. The Countreys so valiantly conquered by the Christians, were seized on by the Infidels.

as after infinite toiles, there scarce remained any reliques of this shipwrecke, onely some Harbours to the Venetians, and Genuois, Cyprus, Corfu, Chio, and to all the Christians jointly Rhodes and Malta. The Templers (placed for the guard of Christendome) became so disloyall and corrupt, as they must be rooted out, the which Philip did in France, in whose place were instituted the Knights of Rhodes and Malta, the which continue vnto this day. Behold the end of the voyage of our Argonauts, which made so gressely a shew vpon this Theater in the first Scene. But the Carastrophe was so miserable as the Countries where the Gospell had bene preached, remained a shameful prey to the enemy of Christendome, and the Christian Church at his mercy. As for Sicily, behold the estate: Charles the Lame (heire to his fathers misfortunes, taken by Roger Admirall of Aragon, and held prisoner foure yeares) in the end was released, vpon condition hee should relinquish all his interest to the two Sicilies. And all which Philip had taken in Aragon, returned presently after his death to James of Aragon, the lawfull heyre of that Realme. Naples continued longer in the Frenchmens power, but in the end all was lost, as we shall see hereafter: so as the Aragonois retained to himselfe the possession of these goodly Estates, and left vs in our voluntary losses, the gages of our accustomed rashnesse, and an apparent testimony, that the Popes gifts to our Kings, haue not greatly enriched the poore Realme, as appeares by infinite examples. After that of Naples, Hungary was in no better estate, being giuen by the Pope to Charles Martel, sonne to Charles the Lame, these two quartels hauing drawn all Europe into a strange confusion. So there was euery where vanity for truth, bruit without fruit, and shewes without effect. The originals are my warrant for this truth, which I ought to the honor of the history without dissembling.

LEWIS the tenth, called HUTIN, The 47. King of France.

His reigne is short and of small fame, as the actions of this King are D not greatly commendable. He began to reigne in the yeare 1314 and dyed the yeare after, Iune 16. and so he scarce reigned a yeare and a halfe, which time was full of trouble and confusion, according to his turbulent and stirring disposition, whereof he bare the name, for a blemish to his posterity, for Hutin in old French signifies Mutine. A cholerick Prince, ingrate, indiscreet, outrageous, defacing his royall authority, by the insolent abuse of his power, couering his humane passions with the vaile of his authority. He first married with Marguerite the daughter of Robert Duke of Bourgogne, being detected of incontinency, she was confined to Chasteau-Gaillierd vpon Seine, where shee died in her ignominy. After her death he married with Clemence the daughter of Charles, brother to Robert King of Sicily, pretended King of Hungary. He made a great preparation against Robert Earle of Flanders, but could not passe with his Army for waters. He discharged his choler vpon Enguerand of Marigny Earle of Longueuille, Superintendent of the treasure, whom Philip had employed long and confidently. Charles Earle of Valois, brother to Philip the faire, accused Enguerand of extortion and robbing the Treasury, making him odious to the people, for that he had long managed the treasure of the Realme to his Masters good liking; but Lewis and Charles had hatched this hatred against him, to the losse of his life. Hee had caused the Palace to be built and he disposed of the publicke treasure, during the long wars of Flanders, the which had wasted much, to the peoples oppression and hindrance. And therefore it was a pleasing spectacle to see Enguerand of Marigny hanged by a solemne sentence vpon the gallows, which hee had caused to be made at Montfalcon, beating down his image in the Palace, where the place is yet to be seene with this inscription by it:

*Let euery one rest content with that he hath,
For he that hath not sufficient, hath not any thing.*

This iudgement was very famous, yet afterwards it was reuoked, but the body was not taken out of the graue, although he were freed from the ignominy of so shameful a death.

A The Earle of Valois was soone after taken with a languishing disease, which consumed him by degrees, and King Lewis Hutin died so suddenly, as hee scarce by sickle one day. These were the workes of heaven, which made the foolish people change their opinion, of whom it was rightly spoken, What the people sayes, a foole speakes: for euery one tooke these extraordinary deaths, as witnesses of Gods iustice; who punisheth great Princes, which abuse the ordinary power which he hath giuen them, to serue their owne passions. And it is to be obserued, that this iustice of God continued in the posterity of Lewis Hutin: for he left his wife Clemence with child, who was deliuered of a sonne, an imaginary King, hauing liued but eight dayes: and though he were royally interred with Kings, yet he is not numbered among them. Moreouer, he left one daughter by his first wife called Jane, for whom Eudes of Bourgogne (her Vncle by the mother) caused great Tragedies against the fundamentall Law of State, to haue her admitted Queene of France, wrongfully and vniuistly, for that women are excluded by the law, whereon the French Monarchy was grounded, as we haue said. So this miserable reigne was begun and ended by confusion and iniustice.

A notable example to obserue the vanity of the Court, in good seruants vniuistly afflicted: of the people, in their false and passionate indgements, rendering euill for good, and suffering themselves to be transported with the ebbing and flowing of their passions, speaking good and euill of the same action, and the same man, without rule, without measure, C and without truth: And of the vanity of great men, which thinke it to be the chiefe fruit of their greatnesse, to abuse their power insolently, to the ruine of their inferiors: not remembering (being blinded with their passions) that they haue a superior ouer them, to make them yeeld an account of their vniuist proceedings, forcing them to make restitution with interest. All that Lewis Hutin did worthy of commendation, was that he made the Parliament of Paris ordinary, which had but two sittings in the yeare, although this commoditie of pleading hath bred many suites, to the hindrance of the publicke and private good. He was called King of France and of Nauarre, and left the two Realms to his successor: who disposed thereof as we shall see.

PHILIP the fift, called the Long, The 48. King of France.

HE controuersie touching the Crowne was easily decided, by the euidence of realmes, and also for that Jane the daughter of Lewis Hutin, remained by the Will of Philip her Vncle, Queene of Nauarre, and Countesse Palatine of Brie and Champagne, and yet for the discontentment of some Princes of the blood, Philip went to Rheims with a strong army, to bee anointed there, where he was installed, the doores of the Church being shut and well guarded. Hee beganne to reigne in the yeare 1316, and reigned six yeares. He had foure daughters by Jane the daughter of Othelin Earle of Bourgogne, and no sonnes.

His children.

By meanes of his daughters he made his peace with his discontented Princes: for he gave the eldest to Odor Duke of Bourgogne (who had supported the daughter of Lewis against him) and gaue in dowry the County of Bourgogne, belonging vnto her by her mother, and to Lewis Earle of Euxeu his other opposit, he gaue Jane with the Kingdome of Nauarre and the Counties of Brie and Champagne, whereof he afterwards earied the title.

A Prince of a very tractable disposition, and by consequence easie to bee corrupted, rather enclining to euill then good. There is nothing memorable vnder his reigne, but that through his facility: all was tolerable to his bad seruants, who vnder his name did great exactions vpon the people, the which caused them to mutine in many places, notwithstanding he being great of body, and therefore called Long, but of little wile, his sonne Philip: Vnder colour of a voyage to the East, two seditious men, a Priest and a Monk of the order of Saint Benedic, assembled a multitude of mutinous people, which continued

An artificial plague.

The Iewes expelled before, were now admitted to returne for money: a wretched nation giuen to all kind of wickednesse, and therefore odious to the people, who exclaimed against the disorders gowne vp by the facility of Philip. This generall hatred bred such a rage in the licentious minds of the Iewes, as they brought the plague into diuers parts of the Realme, vsing the helpe of Lepers. Many were grievously punished by iustice and the rest banished out of the dominions of France. Flanders seemed ready to fall into new troubles, but in the end they were pacified, by the marriage of Marguerite the Kings second daughter, with Lewis Earle of Flanders, Neuers and Rethel, and the payment of certaine summes due by the sayd accord.

These are the most famous acts of that reigne; for to what end serues it to relate that priuate iustice was done vpon a Prouost of Paris, who was hanged, for that hee had put to death a poore innocent, for a rich man that was guilty, and condemned to dye: Or that Philip would make one weight and one measure throughout his Realme? but he could not maintaine his authority by the rule of reason. These things either too common, or not effected, are not worthy of a History. Thus Philip the fifth dyed with small fame, the fifth year of his reigne, in the year 1322.

CHARLES the fourth, called the Faire, The 49. King of France.

Charles crowned without opposition.

His disposition.

His first.

S Philip the Long had succeeded Lewis Hutin his brother, with some dispute, so Charles brother to Philip, (the last of the sonnes of Philip the Faire) succeeded without any difficulty, the question being formerly decided. He was crowned King with great solemnity, the Princes of the blood and Noblemen assisting, in the year 1322. and reigned sixe yeares. A wife and temperate Prince, louing iustice, and yet vnfortunate in his Family. Hee was thrice married.

His first wife Blanche was accused and convicted of adultery, during his fathers life, and was confined to Chasteau-gaillerd by Andely vpon Seine. His second wife was Mary the daughter of Henry of Luxenbourgh Emperor, by whom hee had one son, which dyed as hee was borne, and his mother soone after at Yffoudon in Berry. His third wife was Marguerite the daughter of Lewis Earle of Eureux, by whom hee had daughters onely, leaving her with child, as shall be sayd. But let vs make a collection of his life, which is not long. The facility of Philip the Long, the fury of Lewis Hutin, and the long warres of Philip the Hardy, had peruered all, and giuen liberty to every man to doe what he pleased, especially the Nobility: who being armed, committed many infolencies by this liberty and impunity. Charles being anointed, hee held a great Sessions in his chiefe City of Paris, to heare all mens complaints, and causeth many Gentlemen to be punished. Among the rest Jourdain of Lille a Gascon, who vnder colour of being Nephew to Pope John the 22. then resident in Auignon (having had his pardon for eighteen crimes, whereof the least deserued death) continued still in his wickednesse: In the end he was taken and brought to Paris: The remitting of what was past, made him presume of impunity: but the iustice of God, (which comes in time, euen when the insolent and obstinate sinner dreames not of it) preuented him: for Charles laying all respect aside, caused him to be hanged, as a memorable example, that respect is an enemy to iustice, which must be executed without sparing of any one that is guilty of any notable crime.

Edward the second, King of England, stood vpon termes for his homage of Guicne, and had sent his wife Isabel, the daughter of Philip the Faire, and sister to the King, to compound with him. Charles brought him to reason by his authority. And as Hugh the Lord of Montepesat in Agenois, would haue fortified his house without his permission, hee forced him to obey, razing the Castle of Montepesat, whence the quarrell grew, and made him to giue hostages for the assurance of that hee had promised. Amidst these generall

there chanced a jarre betwixt Edward and his wife Isabel, discontented with her husband, for that both she and her sonne had lost their credits with him, by the pernicious counsell of Hugh Spencer. Yet was he so supported by King Charles, as hee sent her backe into England without any countenance, commanding her to apply her selfe to her husband humours, the which shee endeauored to doe, being a wife and a courageous Princess: yet being assisted (as it is likely) vnder hand by the meanes of her Nephew Charles the Faire, she preuailed in her designs: causing Hugh to be apprehended and punished, as the leuaine of all their breach: and having brought her husband vnto reason, shee confirmed her sonne Edward the third, a Prince who shortly shall bee the cause of much trouble to this Monarchy. Charles likewise reduced Lewis Earle of Flanders to obedience, although hee was husband to his Aunt: and having called and condemned him by the Court of Parliament at Paris, he restored him to his Estates, the which hee had forfeited by felony; shewing in one subiect, both his severity to punish offences, and his clemency to remit the due punishment. The same Earle being fallen in some dislike with his chiefe townes, and seeking to reclaime them by force, Charles aduised him to winne them by mildnesse. A true remedy to reconcile subiects which are accustomed to oppose themselves against rigour, and in resisting to know their own forces, the which belongs to their Princes by obedience. Thus he pacified these discontents betwixt the Earle and the Cities of Flanders, by a common reconciliation, vpon condition, That the Earle should be acknowledged in his degree, and the King as Soueraigne.

This is all that chanced worthy of obseruation in the reigne of Charles the Faire. A Prince worthy of the French Monarchy, and to be numbred among the greatest and most famous men of State. His life was very short in regard of his great sufficiency: yet with more order and authority then his brother Philip the Long, who left none but daughters (whose names are buried in the confusion of times, troubled by the pretenses of males and females) and his wife with child, as we haue said. A wombe which shall breed many long and perillous controuersies. Charles dyed in the year 1328. leaving the Crowne to the second royall Branch of Capet, whereunto the order of the fundamentall law did lawfully call them.

From the yeare one thousand three hundred twenty eight, unto the yeare one thousand five hundred eighty eight.

PHILIP OF VALOIS,

The 50. King of France.

HE doubtfulnesse of the issue which was expected from the royall wombe of Iane, (widow to Charles the Faire) held the beginning of this reigne in great suspence and perplexity: euen for the Regency it selfe: for Edward the third, King of England, (the sonne of Edward the second, and Isabel of France, the daughter of Philip the Faire, and sister to the three Kings last deceased) pretended it as his right; and in case the child dyed (whatsoeuer it were) the Realme also, by the title of Royall Consanguinity, according to the Lawes of England. On the other side, Philip of Valois (the first Prince of the blood of France) maintained, that as well the regency of the male (if any were borne) as the Realme, (if it were a daughter, or the son dyed) belonged directly vnto him, without all controuerfie; holding the first place among the Princes of the blood after the decease of the three brethren, who had bene Kings one after another. For Philip the Hardy had left two finnes, Philip the Faire, and Charles Earle of Valois: of whom it is sayd, That he was the sonne of a King, brother to a King, vncle to a King, father to a King, and yet no King.

Controuerfie for the Realme betwix Edward the 3. King of England, and Philip of Valois

Lewis, Philip, and Charles, had succed to the Crowne one after another: so as after their decease, the right came to Charles and his children, according to the fundamentall law of State. To decide this controuerfie, the generall Estates were called at Paris, with great solemnity, where they decree, that Philip of Valois should be Regent of the Realm (if Queene Iane had a sonne) and King, if it were a daughter. Iane was deliuered of a daughter, the first of April, at Bois de Vincennes, the which was called Blanche. This quarrell thus decided, Philip of Valois was saluted and proclaimed King of France, and within few dayes after, was anointed and crowned at Rheims, according to the vsuall custome: And then (being well accompanied with his Princes, Peeres, officers of the Crowne, and an infinite number of his Nobility) he made his entry into his chiefe City of Paris, with an incredible ioy and pompe. This was in the yeare 1328.

Philip of Valois preferred to the Crowne.

Being thus in possession of the Realme, he studied to settle his Estate, much disordered by the ill government of the forepassed Kings: and likewise to satisfie the daughter of Leuis Hutin, in regard of the Countries of Brye and Champagne, lying too neere to his good City of Paris, to be diuided from the Crowne. So he treated with her, and held them by his prerogative, giuing vnto her as much in exchange as the sayd Earldomes were worth, lying farther off in the countries of la Marche, Rouergne, and Languedoc.

Philip settles his affaires in France.

But Flanders troubled him much more: the Earle and his subiects very greatly incensed one against another, by reason of some exactions made by the Earle, for the payment of his old debts due by the accord, so as they made warre against their Earle, and took him prisoner. Being the stronger, they controuled their Lord: but soone after they payed for their folly: for the Earle (being deliuered) had recourse vnto Philip, as to their Soueraigne. Philip takes the Earles cause in hand, raiseth a great army against the Flemings, takes, sacks, and burnes Cassel, where they had made the body of their army, after the defeat of two and twenty thousand Flemings in a pitched field. Having subdued this mutinous people, he aduised the Earle to vfe that aduantage modestly: to win them by mildnesse, and not to thrust them into errors by despight or despair, which are sooner prevented then repaired in popular tumults.

Being returned from this voyage, Philip found new worke at Paris. The Courts of Parliament, and all the foueraigne Iudges (assembled from all the Prouincets) made a general nerall complaint against the Clergy of France, they accuse them of sundry abuses, and namely, that against the due of their charges, they intermedd with the politike iurisdiction. The suite was vehement, and famous for the greatness of the parties. The King, to reconcile this quarrell, calls a general Assembly of his whole Realme at Paris. The cause was pleaded before him, with great liberty, by Peter of Cugiere (this is he who by derivation they called M. Peter Cugier, whom at this day they finde in the great Temple at Paris noted with a little Monke's head, placed betwixt two pillars, to put out the candles, being odious by reason of his pleading,) and as coldly defended by Peter Bertrand, both famous Advocates in those times. The issue was doubtfull, but Philip foreseeing the event of so important a business, after that hee had seriously exhorted the Prelates to reforme themselves, and in reforming the abuse, to avoid these popular complaints, hee referred the matter to a further hearing. But he had other worke in hand.

#Edward King of England doth homage for Guienne.

Edward the third King of England (for that he was not received King of France) practised great and new designs against him, studying only upon revenge. Hee had purposely refused to assist at his coronation, and makes no shew of any intent to doe homage for Guienne, whereunto Philip did call him. Edward having no colour to refuse so apparent a duty, came to Amiens, with so great and extraordinary a traine, as it seemed plainly, not to be done to honour the King, but rather to strike some feare or admiration into the French, of his great Forces. To check this bold brauado, Philip shewed himselfe a King at his first enteruew with Edward, who euen then champt vpon the bit, and smothered his choller. Edward appears at the place and time prefixed, royally attired, with a long robe of crimlon velvet, powdered with Leopards of gold, a Crowne vpon his head, a sword by his side, and golden spurs on his heeles. Hee presents himselfe standing before Philip sitting in his royall throne, attired with a long robe of purple velvet, powdered with flowers-de-luces of gold, a Crowne on his head, and a scepter in his hand, holding a Royall Maiesty, accompanied with his Constable, Chancellor and great Chamberlaine. The Vicount of Melun, great Chamberlaine of France, commands Edward to take off his Crowne, sword, and spurs, and to kneele downe: the which he doth.

The oath of Edward King of England to Philip.

Then hee tooke both his hands, and hauing ioyned them together, he spake vnto him in this manner, Thou become a Liege man vnto the King, my Lord, who is here present, as Duke of Guienne, and Peere of France: and you promise to be faithfull vnto him and loyal. Say yea. And Edward answered, yea. In like sort hee did him homage for the County of Ponthieu, intreating Philip to restore him all those places in Guienne, which his Predecessors had inioined. Philip answered him with great grauity, that he would consider thereof. This was the homage which Edward King of England did vnto Philip the French King, the which I haue particularly noted, as the first act of a notable tragedy. The event will shew, that Philip had done farre better (without preiudice to his authority, lawfully purchased by the law of State) to pacifie Edward by all ciuill meanes obseruable betwixt Kings, and not to braue him vpon an inferiour quality, the which is no blemish to the other, for in the end he shewed himselfe his equall in dignity. A furious bait of hatred among Princes which cannot be reconciled.

The cause of Edward's discontent against Philip.

Edward departed discontented from Philip, resolute to attempt all meanes to crosse him, and to ruine him. Hee seeks out all instruments fit for this designe, both in Flanders, Brittain and Germany, whereof followed mournfull euents, both for the King and his Realme. I will note euery thing in order, referring the Estate of the Church and Empire to the end of his reigne, lest I should interrupt the order of this discourse. Philip was otherwise affected then Edward, (as commonly desire makes shew of that which is not; pleasing men with vaine imaginations) for supposing that he had tamed Edward with his imperious homage, he presumed that he had well sealed his affaires, to be obeyed by him without any contradiction, and to haue his Realme enioy an assured peace, without any disturbance, vnder his command. Vpon this conceit he intends a voyage to the East, desirous to be nothing inferior to the glorious and renowned zeale of his predecessors. In this deuotion he easily yeelds to the perswasions of Pope Benedict the cleuenth, borne at Tholoufa, then resident at Auignon.

Philip resolves to goe into the East.

His fleet was then preparing at Aiguesmortes, (a sea towne of Languedoc) whilft that he provides for the regency of the Realme, giuing it to John Duke of Normandy his eldest sonne (being foureteen yeeres old) leaving him a graue and learned counsell. And seeking

the King.

A seeking to found Edward's mind, if he would accompany him in this holy war, imitating the example of his predecessors, he learns by certain intelligence, that he watched his departure, to invade France. This new occasion gaue him a reasonable subiect to change his resolution, and not willingly to expose his new inheritance to his enemy. But this satisfied not Pope Benedict, who grew so bitter vpon this alteration, that (exclaiming generally of Philip's disloyall), he fought all meanes to annoy him. There was capitall hatred betwixt the Emperour Lewis of Bawaria, and the sea of Rome, hauing excommunicated him as an hereticke. Benedict absoules him, and becomes his friend, seeking to oppose him against Philip: who (disliking of this proceeding) sends Entragues a gentleman of Viuzare to Auignon, to let Benedict vnderstand, that if hee did not forbear to speak ill of him, he would force him to silence, after the example of his predecessor, whose name he bare, and who had left so famous a remembrance of his rathnesse to posterity.

Edward resolves to make warre against Philip.

Edward being returned into England sleeps not. A Prince of an excellent iudgement, great courage, and of a resolute and active spirit, high minded, and a fatal instrument to chastise France. His repulse, his homage, and his great meanes, were both the bait and the spur to this generous resolution, which thrust him on to disquiet the possession of that by force, which hee could not obtaine by reason. But for so great a proiect hee needed a great Councillor, to direct and fortifie him in the execution of an enterprise of so great import. Robert Earle of Arthois, a Prince of the blood of France, (descended from another Robert son of Lewis the eight, and brother to Saint Lewis) had a great suite with his Aunt Mahault Countesse of Bourgogne, for the Earldome of Arthois. Robert had laboured much for Philip in his great question for the Crowne, against Edward King of England before mentioned, assuring himselfe, that Philip would requite him in his vniust pretention: but Philip preferred the Countesses right before Robert's wrong: so as leaving the course of Iustice free, the County of Arthois was adiu'dged to Mahault, by a decree of the Court of Parliament of Paris. This losse did so discontent Robert, as hee presumed to brag openly, that he would dispossesse Philip of the Crown, by the same meanes that he had raised him vnto it. But this presumptuous threat, deliuered rashly before many witnesses, cost both the Realme and himselfe deare, who in the end smarted for his malicious and vnreasonable discontent. Hee flies into England, carying nothing with him, but a mind transported with passion, and armed with policy. Philip proclaimes him guilty of high treason, and seizeth vpon his lands. Edward receiues him with all shewes of loue, and giues him the first place in his councill.

War begun in Guienne and Scotland.

Behold, these two great Kings banded one against another, entring into a dangerous warre, which shall much afflict their Estates: as commonly the subiects pay for the follies of Princes: The first breach began in the easiest places. Guienne was the first checker of this long and dangerous game. The Earles of Foix and Armagnac were for the King in Guienne, the Earle of Albret for Edward. The King of Scotland is a formal partaker for France against Edward. Edward begins to spoile Philip's Country, and Philip takes from Edward the Castle of Xaintes, by Charles Earle of Alanfon his brother. Edward on the other side, makes warre against David King of Scots, and Philip sends him succours. These were the first drops of that cloud which darkned the Heauens, attending the storme which shall fall after these thunder-crackes: but what is all this in regard of that which shall presently succeed? By the aduice of Robert of Arthois, Edward makes a proclamation against Philip of Valois, as a vnterper of the Realme of France, and labours to stirre vp both the French and the Flemings to maintaine his tide as the lawfull heyre, being the sonne of a daughter of France, against an vnlawfull King, pretending the Realme to appertaine vnto him.

Edward sends Ambassadors
into Flandre and Germany.

Moreover, he sends an honorable and stately Ambassage into Flanders and Germany, to incense those Princes against Philip. These Ambassadors went with a goodly and an honorable traine, great expences, shew, bankers, and presents. They beganne in Hainault, to take directions there from Count William father in law to Edward. The Earle doth caule them to be accompanied throughout all the Cities of Flanders and Brabant, and doth countenance them with the fauor of his friends in all those Cities. They spare nothing in good cheere, nor goodly presents, according to the popular humour of this nation. One of the chiefe Tribunes, or Colonels of this people, was James of Artois, a brewer, but in effect he had more credit with the Flemings then the Earle himselfe.

selfe. They begin to vndermine the flanke of this fort, by the meanes of this Artisan. Hee becomes an Englishman, by vertue of the Angels of England. He shall act his part in this tragedy, but in the end he shall leaue his skin in this peoples hands, whom he had incanted; as after many turnes the keeper is deuoured by his Lion.

Lewis Earle of Flanders stood stiffly for the King his souereigne Lord: but he prevailed nothing in exclaiming against this ringleader of the multitude, who were the more incensed by Lewis his choller against his capitaine. For Arteuille making it knowne to all men that he was hated, tooke occasion to demand a guard, the which hee chose among the most seditious, being entertained by him at the charge of England: and so he maintained and augmented his seisure of this confused authority, the which hee had vsurped ouer the Flemings, in Edwards fauour. There was an occasion which made this popular humour to breake forth (being yet somewhat restrained by the respect of souereigne authority, a bridle for the most audacious.) A French Gentleman being at Gant, was too familiar with this multitude. The Earle suspects him to bee a Traitor: and without any other proofes, but only the deuotion he had to the Kings seruice, hee curs off his head. The common people were so incensed with this execution, as the Earle could hardly recouer France, to auoide the outrageous cruelty of this furious multitude, which pursued him to the death without any respect. Arteuille being then without controule, sets vp his ensigne openly for Edward, who presently lends a flecte into Flanders. He comes himselfe to Antwerpe with his wife and children, and giues his sister in mariage to the Duke of Gueldres, the better to confirme his loue. And leauing his wife in Flanders for a gage of his faith, he comes to Cologne, where he is honourably receiued by Lewis of Bawaria, Emperour: by whom (hauing made an offensive & defensie league) he is declared Vicar of the holy Empire, both in Germany & France, to haue thereby a title to force the Vassals & subiects of that Empire to succor him, both with men and money, against Philip of Valois, as an vsurper of the Realme of France, and sworne enemy to the Empire. In his absence the Queene his wife had so politickly managed his affaires, as at his returne he did but passe, and with an incredible celerity sent an Army (the which he found ready) vnder the conduct of the Earle of Salisbury.

But it chanced, as this Earle (hauing ioyned with the Flemings) went inconsiderately to the siege of Lisle, he was defeated by the Lord of Rombais, who surprisid him in disorder, being drawne into an ambuscadoe. This first checke did import Edwards affaires very much, euen with the Flemings, being subiect to alterations. To repaire this error, he departs presently from England with his flecte: yet hee must fight for the passage with Philips Navy, the which attends him with great forces, and with a resolute intent to stop him. The English army was not lesse, neither were their courages any thing daunted with this first losse. The combat was fierce, but the victory remained to Edward. Who notwithstanding bought it dear, by a great losse of his Nobility, and an honorable hurt which hee receiued, for a testimony of his valor. Philip lost 30000. men, French and Flemish, and his Admirall Hugh of Quiquet, with the aduantage of a good beginning. This battell was out in the year 1337. in the month of May, noted by the name of Scuse, where it was giuen. It was seconded with a greater losse, the which made the way open to Edwards signes, who (being receiued with great ioy by the Flemings) resolved to try his fortune, to invade France, by Tournay & S. Omer, measuring the courage and not the number of his victorious army, ordained to greater and more famous exploits. Philip was nothing amazed at this first check, but relying in his great Forces, he thought himselfe assured of a victory against Edward, to the end that hee might haue no competitor in his hereditary Kingdome, nor France any English Prince to trouble it againe: He had leauied an army (worthy the possession of this new inheritance) of 100000. fighting men, and many great personages: The Kings of Bohemia, Nauarre, and Scotland. The Dukes of Normandy, Brittain, Lorraine. The Earles of Alanfon, Sauoy, Flanders, Armagnac, Eu, and others, the number of 26. with an infinit number of the Nobility. He diuides his army into three, to answer the enemy in all places. One part for Tournay, vnder the conduct of the Earle of Eu, Constable of France, and the Marshall of Montmorancy: the other for S. Omer, vnder the Duke of Bourgongne, and Earle of Armagnac: and he himselfe remains with the battell, betwix them and Arras. The English Army had neither so many men, nor so great personages, being but threecore thousand men: but the tryall made prooffe, that that it was nothing inferior to the French, neither in courage, nor valour. It consisted of English, Flemings and Germanes: this was the fruit of his Bonitadage and voyage. The Imperiall Eagle appeared in the foremost ranks in great shew, and the title of Vicar of the sacred Empire, sounded out in all their military proclamations. Edward desires nothing more then to fight. All his men had the same will, being nothing amazed with the number, nor brauery of the French Army, nor with the fame of their commanders. Such is the force of the great God of Armies, who disposeth of the hearts of such as shall be Conquerors or conquered, and draws the motions that are in them to his wife and irrevocable decree, the which neuer failes to execute things in their due season. Philip had the like desire to fight, although his counsell was other wise affected. The like aduantage was giuen from all parts, and reason it selfe, did wish him not to expose his new Crowne to the hazard of a generall and doubtfull battell. So the armies stand some daies at the gaze. In the end Edward (to draw him to fight) besieged Tournay. Some skirmishes were made, in the which, the English were beaten. The place is victualled by Philip: but the English Army stands firme in the same quarter, watching a fit opportunity for their designe. All Europe stoodgazing at this great and dangerous spectacle. The friends of both parts were greatly perplexed with so doubtfull an event, the which brought the estate of two Realmes into question. But God who reserved the victory, and leuied to another season, dispersed this storme, being in shew ready to fall, by this occasion. Jane of Valois, sister to Philip, widow to William Duke of Hainaut, and mother to Marguerite the wife of Edward, a Princess of excellent vertues (hauing since her widowhood willingly giuen ouer all affaires of State) had professed her selfe a Nun of Fontenelles, to attend her deuotion and fasting. She resolues to imploy all her credit (as sister and a mother in law) with Philip and Edward, to keepe them from so dangerous a battell. She runnes to the one, and to the other, but findes them both so resolute in their designes, as she is often reiectid: Yet is she nothing daunted. In the end she incommeneth their violent passions with such patience and dexterity, as shee obtaines a day and place for a parlee: although Jane of Arteuille (a dangerous bye in a State) tickled Edwards eares, to crosse so commendable a resolution: An example of a woman worthy of great all praise, euen in this iron age, whereas women haue become miserable instruments of civil dissensions, and hellish firebrands to consume France with the fire of confusion and misery.

A parlee being concluded, deputies were chosen on either side to treat: and by their a truce was made. Tournay is deliuered, and the armies dismissed, and so the storme preserued for this time, the which threatened both Realmes. All good men reioyced, none but Jane of Arteuille, and his faction were grieved. So as (not able to auoide it) yet to feed Edwards humor, he aduiseeth him to take vpon him the name of King of France: by the which both he and his complices should auoide the infamy of Rebellion, and the punishment of high treason: as hauing done nothing, but by the commandement of their Souereigne. The date of this title of France was in the year 1337. The which England holds to this day, and our Kings the Realme in effect. Edward left his wife at Gant, to keepe the Flemings at his deuotion, being a wife & a vigilant Princess: and he himselfe returned into England, extremely grieved: for being vnable to satisfie his Germanes for want of money, who expected a great bootie by this warre, from which they scarce returned with their pay; there sprung vp a new combustion from this discontent, the fire being onely smothered in the embers, but not quenched. Philip makes his proff of the Germanes discontent, and by the meanes of Jane, the wife of Lewis of Bawaria, Emperour, being his neece, hee winnes them to leaue Edwards part, and to embrace that of France. Edward in like sort, strives to haue his reuenge on Philip. But to what end? All this, but to disquiet their Estates, the which they ought to maintaine in peace. Thus the passions of Princes are bad Counsellors for the good of their subiects. This was the occasion of this new breach betwix the two Kings. Arthur Duke of Brittain, (sonne to that John second Duke of Brittain, who, as wee haue said, had beene slaine at Lewes, at the coronation of Pope Clement 3.) had two wiues, and by either of them children, of the first named Beatrice, Vicountesse of Limosin, he had two sonnes, John and Guy, and of his second wife Yolande, Countesse of Montfort & Amalric, hee had John of Montfort, who contended for the Duchie of Brittain. John the third, the sonne of Arthur, dying with-without issue, he made his neece Iane the daughter of his brother Guy, (who died before him) his heire in the succession of the said Duchy.

In regard of this prerogative giuen to Iane, Charles of Blois, nephew to King Philip, married her vpon condition, That those children which should be borne of this marriage, should be lawfull heires to the Duchy of Brittain, whereof Charles was inuested, after the consummation of the marriage: all homages done vnto him, and he was put in recall and full possession of the said Country, in the life of Iohn.

After whose decease, behold Iohn of Montfort, halfe brother to Iane (as we haue said) pretending to the said Duchy, surprizeth Nantes, and then Rennes, Vannes, Brest, the Castle of Aulroy, with many other places: and hauing receiued the homages of the Brittons, hee comes to Paris to doe his souereigne homage to the King for the said Duchie, and to be inuested therein. Charles of Blois opposeth in the right of his wife, and hereupon they are both sent by the King to the Court of Parliament at Paris, to doe them Iustice.

The Court with the Kings authority, sitting in his seat of Iustice, and in the presence of many Princes, decrees that Charles of Blois, in the name of Iane his wife (the lawfull heire of the Duchie of Brittain, as succeeding the second sonne of the first bed,) should be receiued by the King to fealty and homage, for the Country of Brittain, and Iohn of Montfort the third sonne of Arthur, of the second bed, should be acknowledged in his degree, to enioy his right when it should fall vnto him. Iohn of Montfort disliking this order, resolues to win that by force, which hee could not recover by reason: and in this humour, he goes into England, craving aide from Edward, who receiues him very graciously: but from thence he returns into Brittain. Philip aduertised of these practices, pursueth Iohn of Montfort with such successe, as hauing taken him prisoner with the Castell of Nantes, (whither he was retired) he confined him to the Loure. While these difficulties fall out in Brittain, there growes a new trouble, by a strange accident at Naples, in the family of our Princes of France, of whom we haue spoken. Wee haue said, that Charles the Lame had many sonnes, Charles, Robert, Lewis, and Philip. Robert after this losse of Sicily had for his part the Realme of Naples, and the Earldome of Pouence: and left one sonne named Charles, who had two daughters, Iane and Magdalen. Iane by the death of her sister, remained sole heire of these two great Estates, and was married to Andrew the son of Charles King of Hungarie. The subject of our discourse will not suffer me to speake of the other children. Philip the yongest son of Charles the Lame, had one sonne, named Lewis Prince of Tarentum, very faire, but of a violent spirit. Iane began to loath her husband, and preferring the filthy loue of her Cousin before the honour of marriage, she caused her husband Andrew of Hungarie to be slaine, cloaking this horrible and tragick deed with an impudent hypocritie: for shee takes vpon her the habite of mourning after the death of her husband, whom shee herselfe had slaine: and writ letters to Lewis King of Hungarie, brother to Andrew, full of lamentations.

Lewis knowing the detestable dissembling of this maistie, prepares his Forces against these fained reares: and without any dissembling, he marcheth towards Italy, with a mighty army, selfe to take an exemplary punishment of these wretched heads: but Iane and Lewis flee into Prouence before the forme. Lewis (fauoured by the reuenging Iustice of God) takes the Realme of Naples easily, with Charles duke of Durazzo, left for the guard thereof, and Lewis, Robert, and Charles, Princes of the blood. The first he beheads, the best he sends into Hungarie to perpetual banishment: and leauing Stephen Vauquidar Governor of his new conquest, he returns victorious to his Realme.

In the meane time the hatred betwix the two Princes growes violent, both by force of iustice and by open force. Philip makes diligent search, both in Normandy, Picardy, and Guienne, for all the Nobility which fauoured Edwards faction. Hee caused Thomas Clifford to lose his head, whose son shall be Constable vnder Charles the 6. with Bacon, Percy, and Tessroy of Maki-troict, Knights of marke, in whom hee notes no other crimes, but that they were Englishmen. Tessroy of Harcourt was summoned, but in stead of appearing at Paris, he retired himselfe to London, to kindle the fire in France. Yet in these preparations of warre, Edward gaue scope to his loues, for in the beginning of this warre, he instituted the order of the Garter, with this Motto, HONORI SIT QVI MALI PRINCES, in honour of the Countesse of Salisbury, honouring in her the chastity which hee could not

A vanquish by all his amorous practices. He armed on both sides, in Guienne and Normandy. The duke of Lancaster, Generall of the Army in Guienne, takes Villefranch of Age, Angouleme, Rions, Saint Basile, with many other Townes and castles, to whom Philip opposeth his eldest sonne, Iohn Duke of Normandy, who recouers Angouleme and Villefranch from the English. But the greatest burthen of the warre fell vpon Normandy, whither Edward led the flower of all his Nobility, landing in the country of Carentan, with about a thousand Sails. At his entry he puts all to fire and sword, takes the towne of Carentan by force, kills all hee finds armed or disarmed, spoiles, burnes, and razeth the towne. In the champion country hee puts all to the sword, saying, that hee did offer those sacrifices to Bacon, Percy, and his other seruants, being vniuilly massacred by Philip. The reason was, for that the heads of these men stood vpon the chiefe gate of Carentan. Then he takes and spoiles Saint Lo, and (after a great fight) he becomes Master of Caen, with such a terror, as Falaife, Liseux, and Honfleur yielded vnto him without any resistance. These townes being taken, hee marcheth into the Ile of France, to draw Philip to battell, proclaiming generally that hee called him to fight in the view of all France, at the great Theatre of his chiefe Citie of Paris. At the same time, by the like practices, Flanders rebelled, by means of Janes of Arteuille, who was more then a passionate partaker of Edwards. So the disordered passion of this desperate seditious man, was a trap for his own ruine. For as hee not onely laboured by all means to shake off the French yoke, but also grew so audacious, as to perswade the Flemings to leaue their naturall obedience to their Bate, and to receiue a new Lord, such as one as the King of England should appoint: the Flemings much displeased with this insolent proposition of Arteuille, (as the blood of a faithfull subject can neuer deny his Prince) they fall furiously vpon him in an open Assembly, & without any further processe, they kill him, reuenging vpon him the mischiefes they had committed by his pernicious counsels. Thus in the end, this tribune receiued the guerdon due to such as abuse the fury of an enchanted multitude, making them the instruments of their passions against their Superiours. This iust execution crossed Edwards designs in Flanders, and gaue the Earle means to repaire to Philip with his Forces, and to consecrate his life to him, the which hee lost in this voyage.

Philip slept not during these proceedings of Edwards: hee had gathered together one of the goodliest armies that euer was seene in France, consisting of French, Louaines, Germanes, and Genouois: the which he led towards Meulan, where Edward laid he attended a fight with him. Edward retires vpon this alarm: they imagined that he fled for feare, but the issue will shew that the great God of armies had appointed his victory in another place. He retires, and Philip followes, who in the end ouertakes him at a village called Avenches, a remarkable name, to shew, that all the trust of humane forces, and all the designs of mans policy are like vnto a quicksand. Philip great army hauing the aduantage, being at home, presumed of an assured victory. Edward retired to get the riuier of Somme a Blanquetaque, but hee must fight for the passage. Philip had already seized thereon by Gondemar of Fay, with a thousand Horse, and 6000 Foot, the most part of them crosse-bowmen: yet Edward resolued to passe, or dye. With this resolution he leapes into the water, and cries out, He that loues me, let him follow mee. At this speech they all plunge into the riuier without any stay, so as presently the English recouer the bankes. Gondemar was troubled at this gallant resolution, amazeth his men with his terrified countenance. All give way to the English, who (incountering our men in disorder) charge the rare-ward, where the retreat was neere, at Abbeville, and S. Riquier, places vnder our obedience. The losse was not so great as the disgrace, yet was it a presage of a greater mischief which followed France. These poore men ariue at Abbeville in a throng, all dispersed with the amazement of this shamefull and vnfortunate flight. Philip exceedingly transported with this disgracefull retreat, resolues to be reuenged of Edward, to follow him, & to draw him to battell. His Councell aduised him rather to rest his troops some time, & to take breath, that they might recouer their spirits, and in the meane time to let Edward alone, and to observe his countenance: but hardly had hee the patience to stay one day at Abbeville, to repaire the bridge, ouer which his army was to passe, but his drummes found a march, going to seek Edward (like a Stagge that flies) and to giue him battell at what place hee list: put vp with a certaine hope of an infallible and triumphant victory. But hee had not made his account with God, who is not called the God of armies in vaine, who who rules combats, and disposeth of the victories of great Monarches, notwithstanding all their counsels, designs, courage and endeavours.

The Armies were in view one of another. Edward had lodged his army, and stood upon his guard, with a wonderfull care, being in the Countrey of Ponthieu, (a Countrey belonging unto himselfe, by the right of his mother) incamped in a village named Crecy, the which he intrenched and fortified carefully, both with trees cut out of the neighbour Forest, and trenches, wherewith he had strengthened his campe. His Army was about thirty thousand men, but their order, industry, and resolution made them double. Hee gaue the fore-ward to Prince Edward his sonne, being yet very yong, and for a guide, that Jeffrey of Harcourt, who (as we haue said) was retired unto him: to whom he had giuen the office of Constable of England. The battell he giues to the Duke of Suffolke, and reserved the reere-ward to himselfe, hauing placed his crossebow-men in the front, and next ranked his horse, putting in the foremost ranks his battell-axes and maces, and behinde his lances: so as euery part of the Army should fight, when as they came to ioyne, to their best aduantage. So much may order and foresight doe vnder that great God of battels, without whom it is in vaine to order Armies. Philips Army was farre greater, of a goodlier shew, and more aduantage: consisting of about threescore thousand fighting men, well armed with an infinit number of Noblemen, as Charles Earle of Alanfon, brother to the King, Lewis King of Bohemia, and Duke of Luxembourg, Charles Earle of Blois, Nephew to the King, Raoul Duke of Loraine, the Earles of Flanders, Neuers, and Sancerre, the Dauphine of Viennois, and many Barons and Gentlemen, in number about three thousand, who were come at the call of this new King, to the first fruits of his new possession, against him who contended for the Crowne.

His aduantage was farre greater than that of Edwards, who fought in another man's Countrey. But in truth the commodities and titles he had in France, did balance this aduantage, but with a different consideration. Vpon the Eue of this battell, Amr Earle of Sauoy arriues with a thousand men at armes: as if all things had conspired to make Philip a conquerour.

Philip full of hope of an assured victory, desires to fight, placing his army in this order. He giues the fore-ward to his brother Charles Earle of Alanfon, the reere-ward to the Earle of Sauoy: and he himselfe commands the battell. But his desire to fight was so greene, he held euery little stay for a great delay. They gaue it out in the army, that the English fled: so as they now vaunted of a victory, euery one disposing of the English, according to his humour: but in searching out the reason of this brute, Philip thinks it good to discover his enemies countenance.

Behold suddenly he receiues a contrary aduice. His scouts report, that Edward had already taken the field, and ordered his Army, attending the battell. Then there was no hold; Philip will needs fight, hardly can they hold a counsell standing about him, to advise what they had to doe in so notable an occurrent: and euen haste (the stepdame of better affaires) would not suffer them to resolute. For at the same instant, as the King had aduertisement of Edwards readinesse to fight, Philip (without any breathing) would haue led forth his army to battell.

Disposition of the battell of Crecy.

The King of Bohemia aduised him to refresh his men before the fight, and that his foot (consisting of crosse-bowes, and a good part of them Geneuois, which were held to be resolute men) should make the front, and the horse should follow according to the appointed order. At the last they obtained so much respite of the King, as to feed their men with all speed.

Remarkable circumstances in this great battell.

This done, they all prepare to another feast. The fore-ward made the first head, when Charles Earle of Alanfon the Kings brother commanded. But behold presently an vnexpected occasion of a ruinous disorder. The Earle of Alanfon (against the order decreed by counsell) mistook that the Geneuois footmen were in the first ranks, and makes them to change their places with some disgrace, saying that it belonged not unto them: and yet this push depended all on their side. The Geneuois discontented with their repulse, and only fainting in courage, but also set into a rage, so as changing their places, they cryed out for anger, as giuing a signe to the enemy of their bitter discontent. This was seconded with another accident, as if heauen had fauoured the English. Suddenly there fell a great shower of raine, and then the burning sun appeared out of a cloud with a rainbow.

A In this forced & despitfull changing of places, the Geneuois couered not their bows, so as the strings being presently wet, they yielded: and to increase the mischiefe, this alteration made them to change the order of their battell, so as the sunne lay in the Frenchmens faces, and on the Englishmens backs: and to make their misfortune absolute, euery one was more incensed against his commander then against the enemy, as a signe of some check at hand. Dangerous imaginations, they being ready to fight. Philip was sufficiently aduertised of the armies disdain against his brother, yet must he needs fight: he held himselfe lost, if all were not lost. Edward (who stood vpon a high eminent place, as it were in sentinell, to discover with iudgement the countenance of the enemy) sees this change; heares the shout, and markes the place, resolving to charge it as the weakest part. The euent fauours his designe, he embraceth this occasion, not suffering them to take breath, or to repair this error: he sends forth a troope of crossebow-men, chosen out of the foremost ranks: they suddenly discharge a shoure of arrowes, so thick and violent, as at this first charge the Geneuois (who were transported with choler, and surprised with this sudden storme) brake their ranks and gaue way to the enemy: their wet strings being vnfit to serue, and their minds not yet pacified, could not resist so great a force.

Crecy.

The Earle of Alanfon, incensed much against the Geneuois for thus giuing back, doubles his choler against them, crying out like a desperat man. Go, go (saies he) my friends, let vs charge these English horse, making our way ouer the bellies of these Geneuois, who doe but hinder vs. And without any longer stay he gallops through the Geneuois foot, who began to gather themselves againe together, according to their discipline. The Geneuois finding themselves wronged with this new affront, cry out againe, like desperate men, being impatient of any disgrace, so as striving to break their bowes in a rage, they make way for the horse, who passe through them. The Earle of Alanfon (being followed by the Dukes of Loraine and Sauoy, and by the Dauphine of Viennois) ran with such fury and haste, as they were out of breath, before they came to charge the enemy: whom they found in better order, his horse being flanked on the one side, with a good troope of foot, with bowes and crossebowes, whose strings had not felt the raine like to the Geneuois. This troope of French horse (being very violent at the first charge) was to be feared, but they were suddenly stayed by a storme of English arrowes, which galled both horse and men: and for a supply, behold anew troope of English comes to succor them that were engaged in the fight; and to increase the mischiefe, young Edward chargeth the French with another band of horse-men, and his crossebow-men in flanke, being placed on the one side to fauor their horse, and to ioyne their arrowes (which played continually) with the courtleaxes, maces, and lances of their horse-men.

The which, not only prolonged the fight, but also encreased the losse of the French being charged on all sides. The combat grows hot, being very equal in valour & courage, but not in force, by reason of the troopes of reserve, which Edward kept for the last charge. Philip seeing his brother engaged among so many enemies, runs to his rescue. At this arriuall the fight is doubled, the English bending their Forces against Philip, and the French against yong Edward. Philip is ouerthrown vnder his horse (the which was slaine with many arrowes) but he was presently rescued, by John Earle of Beaumont: and then all the French cry out, that the King should retire himselfe out of the battell.

This cry (proceeding from loyall and well affected Frenchmen) gaue courage to the English being in fight, seeing the King in this danger. Yong Edward was in no lesse perill, being compassed in on all sides, by the French, and assisted by his owne: so as they (feearing the euent of this charge) send to his father to succor him: who presently demanded of the messenger, What blow, what wound hath my son receiued? hath he bene ouerthrowne? But Edward (saies he) unto him, with this charge. Let him either vanquish or die: and I will be a witness of his valour, to second him when need shall require.

Prince Edward & his men encouraged with this message, doubled both their courage and their blowes, & behold they are relieved with a fresh supply. Then the party became unequal: these men being fresh & lusty, charge the wearied, and tired, who see no hope of succors, but discovered a great groue of horse of rescue: wherein Edward the father beheld the sport, and kept the stakes. Despaire should haue made our French troopes re- blue to hazard all (as it hath chaunted in other times) but their hearts fauoured with their bodies. For this last battallion (where Edward remained) coming from the hill, and charging our men without any great resistance, gave the last blow, as cheeke and mate to our men already much disordered. Then they all giue way, all are disordered, all dispersed. The slaughter is general without respect of persons, the butchery is so bloody, as in the end Edward (having compassion of so great effusion of blood) cries out to spare the rest: yet he was not able by these first cries to stay the fouldiers from so easie an execution; who cut in peeces those poore runaways here and there, like scattered sheepe. In the end Edward sounds a retreat, and riding vp & downe, he doubles his command to kill no more, although in effect, the night and the wearinesse of the victors made an end of this execution. So all were no flaine, but all overcome. Some troopes saved themselves in this general ouerthrow, hauing neere places for a fauorable retreat. Philip after this unexpected defeat of so goodly an Army, being false from his hope, followed with a small troope, saved himself at Bray: whither coming by night, & approaching neer the wals, the Gouernor (being in Armes vpon so notable an occasion) cries out, Who is there? Philip answers, The fortune of France. Being known by his voice, the gates were presently opened, but not without terrible cries and lamentations of his poore subiects, flocking about him like his poore children. Shall it in like fort be lawfull for me to weep in the remembrance hereof, being moued by the bitter apprehension of our present losses? O my Country! is it not at this day alone that we mourne for thy miseries. King Philip then comfort them with a resolute countenance, and intreats them to hope for better. Hee was to be commended in this, that he despaired not in the apparent despaire of his affaires. Having stayed at Bray some houre to take breath, he retires with all speed to Amiens. The number of the dead was great, they hold for certain, that there were flaine about 30000. men vpon the place: and the floure of all the French Nobility died or was taken there: as Charles Earle of Alanson the Kings brother, Lewis of Luxembourg King of Bohemia, Charles Earle of Blois the Kings Nephew, Raoul Duke of Lorraine, Lewis Earle of Flanders, James Dauphin of Viennois the son of Imbert, the Earles of Sancerre and Harcourt, with many Earles, Barons and Gentlemen, to the number of fiftene hundred. This miserable defeat happened in the yeare 1346. the 26. of August. A moneth famous by the euent of many miseries within this Realme.

Edward King of England had all the tokens of an absolute victory, as the place of battel, the ensignes, many of the greatest commanders his prisoners, and in a manner all, except the Soueraign (whom the bounty of God referred for this Realme) the campe, the spoiles, the bodies of the vanquished, which could not be buried but by his mercy.

Some examine the causes and motives of this great defeat, the which they attribute to the choler, haste and rashnesse of the King and his brother. Truly hasty and rash heart is the stepdame of great actions, especially in warre, where the Captaines judgement is more auailable then the fouldiers force. But why ascend wee not from these second causes (true in that which doth concerne vs) vnto the first and soueraign cause? The arme of the Eternall, purging this Realme, full of vicious and corrupted humors, letting it blood, but not suffering it to die, this blood-letting shall be the beginning of a stronger medicine prescribed by the same Physician, and ministred vnto France, in the following reigns, but in the end we shall finde the operation, to the recovery of our Estate. Let vs now see the progreffe of our miseries.

Edward did all he could to manage this victory wisely, and Philip to prevent him: Edward without any stay passeth on, and without attempting the great Cities of Amiens, and Abbeville, although neerer, he makes shew to set vpon Montreuil and Bologne, but he posted to Calais, a fit place for the passage of England. John of Vienne Marshall of France, and with him the Lord of Andreghan, great personages in those daies, commanded there, with a strong French garison, being assisted with the faithfull resolution of the inhabitants. Presently after the battell of Cressie, Edward did bessege the towne of Calais. A long siege, painfull, and of remarkable successe. Philip amazed with these bitter crosses false out beyond his hopes of ease, slept not; although it were with much paine, and lesse fruit. But his whole care was not for the ouerthrow at Cressie, hee had a further reach, following the trace of this vnfortunate losse. Hee was entered in a new inheritance: this new losse was to him a new checke. Affliction is a great crime both in great and small, and opens their mouthes which haue their hearts ill affected. The people

A of France were in extreame poverty, and yet the necessity of the kings affaires forced them to a new charge. The ill government of the publike treasure, the fallshood of Treasurers (enriching themselves by the poverty of the miserable people) the fall of money imbedded, the decay of trafficke, the increase of taxes, imposts, and subsidies, were the causes of this general want, the which drew the people into despaire in this surcharge of troubles falling vpon the King. This burthen grew the more heavy by a great Famine, being followed by a strange general Plague throughout the whole Realme, as if heauen and earth had conspired to the ruine of France.

Philip enuioured with so many and so great difficulties, continues constant with a valourous resolution against them all. He prouides for the guard of the Cities of Picardy, lying neerest vnto danger, and (to driue off the time vsfor for armes) he calls a great Assembly of his Estates, to take counsell, aid, and comfort in the perplexity of so many dangerous occurrences.

In this Assembly it was decreed, to call the Treasurers to an account, and to referre the government of the Treasure to Clergy-men and to the Nobility, thereby to free the people from all icalousie of ill employing it. The Abbots of Marmoutier and Corby are chosen for this Intendancy, & to assist them there are ioined foure Bishops, and foure knights. Peter of Essars Treasurer of France is committed to prison, and condemned in a great fine to the King. Many Treasurers being condemned (justly or vniustly) yeeld that at once

C which they had been long in gathering, the sponge being then pressed by necessity. The Bankers, Lombards, and other vsurers, are then called to strict account; by reason of their vniust exactions. The interests are proued to exceed the principall, the which is forfeited to the King. The interest is remitted to the debtor, which paid the principall. But the chief fruit of this Assembly was, that the whole body was well inclined to succour the King in so vrgent a necessity, without any alteration for the new difficulties of State. Thus the winter was spent without any memorable act on either side. In the Spring, Philip goes to Field with a great army, and approacheth neere vnto Calais, to draw Edward to fight; but it was in vaine: for Edward contenting himselfe with his victory, and not willing to run the hazard of a second battell, kept himselfe within his trenches: and to manifest his resolution vnto Philip, he built houses about Calais to lodge his army dry, and sends for his wife, protesting publicly by a solemne oath, not to rise vntill hee did see an end, and make the inhabitants pay for their obstinate resolution. On the other side, Philip laboured to crosse Edwards designs, but with small successe. To worke a diuersion of this siege, hee makes warre in England by the King of Scotlands meanes, and in Flanders by his sonne John, then Duke of Normandy, and afterwards King of France: but all this succeeded ill.

David King of Scotland (having by Philips perswasion, entred and spoiled England) was defeated, taken and brought prisoner to London, through the happinesse of Edwards fortune, and the diligence of his Officers. John Duke of Normandy having left Guienne by his fathers command, comes into Flanders, besiegeth the towne of Cassel, held by the English faction: but hee is forced to rise by them within the towne. Then hee falls vpon Lile, where he hath a new repulse, so as hardly could hee retire himselfe to his father Philip, who sees his subiects in danger of shipwracke, yet could hee not releue them.

Guienne abandoned by John, for the action of Flanders, suffered much: for Henry of Lancaster, Lieutenant for Edward in Guienne (seeing the Country left weak by Johns departure) issues out of Bourdeaux with an army, and finding no enemy, hee doth easily surpise many townes of Xantonge and Poitou, and laden with spoile, hee retournes home.

In the end Calais yeelds to Edward, standing to his mercy, after a long and cruell famine, and almost a whole yeares siege: for the siege began the 30 of September 1346, and the towne was yeelded vp in August, 1347.

The French Garison was put to ranfome, and so set at liberty. The Inhabitants were worse intreated, the baser sort onely were suffered to depart with what they could carry about them; and in their stead Edward sends a Colony of English, to whom he distributed all the goods of the vanquished, and fortified the towne, especially towards France: to leave this place hereditary to his posterity, who held it 200 yeares; that is, from the yeare 1346, vnto the reign of Henry 2. father to King Henry 3.

The integrity of these poore Inhabitants is remarkable in their extreame affliction.

Edward had referred fixe of the chiefe Citizens, to be at his disposition, for the satisfying his oath : having vowed to make the blood to flow in Calais. He demands them for this end, according to the conventions. This charge being deliuered in the Towne-houle, (where these miserable Burgeses were assembled, by his permission, to give their Country their last farewell) they gaze one on another, terrified with so pittifull a condition. As they all stood mute in this common calamity, one of the troope breaking his mournfull silence : Saying (saith he) I haue so often employed my life for my Countries good, should I now feare to sacrifice it for my last oblation? O my Countrymen! I doe cheerfully offer my head to the King of Englands victory, and will liue no longer in my Countries miserie. This he spake without teares, and with so resolute a countenance, and a brow so manly big, as he moued the whole company : so as all with one generall voice cry : Let vs goe to the death, it is the last duty we can performe to our poore Country. Immediately there was pressing among this great multitude, who should be of the fixe, to carry their heads to Edwards triumph. They were chosen out, drawne, bound and led to execution. The Queene hauing notice thereof, desired to see them, who were brought bound into the executioners hands. This spectacle moued her to weepe, and compassion caused her to beg a pardon of the King, beseeching him to giue liue to these men worthy to liue after so constant a loyalty. She obtains her request, and leaue for them to remaine still in Calais, esteemed to continue faithfull to their deliuerer, who had shewed themselves so constant in the faithfull loue of their lost Country. The History did owe this digression to so commendable an act. The same Summer brought Edward a wished successe in Brittain, touching the quarrell of the Duchie. Hee had taken John Montfort, and Joane the wife of Charles of Blois, whom he led into England, and still weakeneth Philips authority in Brittain, and seales his own. Thus passe the affaires of this world, every one hath his turne. The two Duchesses of Brittain, Joane the wife of John of Montfort, and Joane the wife of Charles of Blois, did wonders in keeping those places they had in their possessions, during the imprisonments of their husbands : without entering further into the discourse of the female warres of these Amazons, worthy yet of eternal memory, hauing so courageously relieved the afflictions of their imprisoned husbands, & neuer yeelded to necessity. Flanders likewise grew mutinous by Edwards practices, being then greatly respected for the successe of his victorious armes. The Flemings received their Earle Lewis of Male without any opposition, being sonne to that Lewis which was slaine at Cressie, but the Kings of France and England contended who should winne him. Lewis was in heart a Frenchman; the Cities were generally affected to England : The marriage of this young Prince was great : Edward desired him for his daughter; but especially the opportunity of this rich County for his affaires. He comes himselfe to Gand to compass his desire, but the queene was not answerable : for although the Earle made shew to embrace this alliance, at the great instance of his subjects : yet his heart was otherwise affected, who (under color to go fly at the Heron) goes out of Gand with a small traine, and fliesto Paris. Philip, who hauing receiued him graciously, perswades him to espouse Marguerite the Daughter of the Duke of Brabant, thereby to cut off all hope of marrying with England. Thus the hatred of these two Princes continued : which in the end must breake forth into hostile effects: Picardy was the stage of their lamentable tragedies : & from thence the misery was dispersed ouer the whole Realme. Philip giues the government to Jeffrey Earle of Charnie, and the Lieutenancy to Anthony of Montmorency. They fortifie the townes, and bridle Calais, being assisted by a great number of voluntary Nobility, louing the command of these two great Captaines as a schoole of military Discipline, to shew that the French did not faint in their afflictions. These losses were then repaired by the gaine of the Country of Dauphine, one of the noblest and goodliest Provinces of the Realme. And this was the occasion. Imbert or Imbert, Dauphine of Viennois, hauing the eldest son in the battell of Cressie, (as I haue said) and his youngest being two or three yeares old, by a strange accident, they say that himselfe let him fall out of his armes, as he played with him at a window, thinking to feare him) and moreover hauing Amé, the 6. Earle of Sauoy, an irreconcilable and deadly enemy, being two weake to resist him, nor able to make choice of a kinsman to repaire his estate (being weary of the world, & decaying in iudgement) he resolues to cast himselfe into the King of France his protection, to oppose him against his enemy, and to put this goodly inheritance into his hands, there-

A thereby to preuent the Earles greedy desire. Forthwith hauing aduertised Philip of his intention, and being graciously entertained by him, he giues all the country of Dauphine to him and his successors Kings of France, vpon condition, that the first son of the house of France should cary the name of Dauphine of Viennois, and the Armes of the Country of Dauphine should be quartered with the armes of France, and that the Nobility and whole Country should be receiued with their priuiledges. Amé Earle of Sauoy (otherwise a deare friend to Philip) sends his Ambassadors to make his benefit of this exchange, but it was not for him : all that he could obtaine, was to exchange some land with that which lay intermixt within his territories adioyning, the better to liue in quiet afterwards. Dauphine was thus incorporated to the Crowne of France. For we cannot without any reason doubt, but in old time it was a member of this our Monarchy, as likewise Sauoy was : but in these diuersities of portions, vnder the children of Lewis the Gentile, as we haue noted before, the Realme and Empire, swallowing vp both the effect and the name of the Realme of Arles (in the which these Estates were comprehended) haue maintained themselves by a remarkable distinction : and so vnder the authority of the Empire, they haue since held their souerainty, not acknowledging any Emperor but their Princes. Dauphine is returned to his first original, and Sauoy maintaines it selfe vnder the obedience of his soueraine Prince vnto this day. As for the name of Dauphine giuen to the first sonne of France, the execution of Prince Imberts Will was not put in practice, before Charles the fift sonne to John then Duke of Normandy, in the life of his father Philip, and not giuen to John in the year 1348. The year following, the City of Montpellier, one of the goodliest of the prouince of Languedoc, was purchased by Philip, of James King of Maiorca, to whom it belonged. The obseruations of this first authority of the Kings of Maiorca are yet remarkable in the priuiledges of the Commonalty of this goodly City, delectable for the fertile situation, and famous, being the goodliest Theater for physicke in Europe. Thus in the affaires of this world, there is time to lose, and time to winne, that men might season their spirits with this temperature, neither to be drowned with aduersity, nor drunke with prosperity.

In the flowing and ebbing of these gaintes and losses, one balancing another, Joane Queene of France, wife to Philip, dyed, leaving him two sonnes, for gages of her loue, most worthy to be noted in the mariages of our Kings, John Duke of Normandy, and Philip Earle of Valois, whereof the first (already of yeares) gouerned the affaires of the Realm in his fathers life, and shall succed him in the Crowne, and Philip shall be Duke of Orleans. This issue might haue contented Philip, being very old and broken : yet before the year was ended, he married Blanche the daughter of Philip of Euxreux, King of Nauarre, who had another daughter, Marguerite, married to Gaston of Foix, from whom shall spring Charles of Nauarre, the scourge of this Realme, in the succeeding reignes.

But Philip did not long enioy this vnecessary marriage : the which was a second burden to his yeares and toyles, so as he fell extremely sicke at Nogent, and having recommended concord and the care of his Realme to his two sons, leaving the Crowne to John his eldest, he yeelded vp his soule to God, the 65 yeare of his age, and of Grace 1350. in the moeth of August, hauing reigned 23 yeares. A Prince whose great vertues were balanced with great vices : for he was deuout, quick, hardy, valiant, resolute in danger, courageous in affliction, losing order, iustice, and the people. But the presumption of his rauiour, and his resolution, often inclining to rashness, chollier, and impatientie, counterpoysed these vertues, and were the causes of great miseries, both to him and his subjects, truly he could not auoid it, but in taking possession of so great and enuied an inheritance, and hauing so strong an aduersary in front, he must endure many crosses : but those inextinguishable imperfections caused him to suffer much more then he had done, if he had sedled his authority with iudgement and patience, and encountered his aduersary already vanquished, with modesty and wisdom.

During the forepassed reignes, since the yeare 1300. neither the Empire, nor the Church of Rome were in any better estate, by the strange alteration of diuers changes which happened in these two States : seeking to ruine one another vnto the end of this reigne. We haue left this discourse at the Empire of Alberr, the tenth Duke of Austria, to whom Pope Boniface the 8. gaue the title and the Armes of France, in disdaine of Philip the Faire, who caused him to be inuested after another sort, by Felix of Nogaret, then he would would doe the Emperour of his Realme. Albert liued not long after the imagination of this new Royalty, for he was slain soone after by his nephew John Duke of Sucuia, whom he had spoiled of his Duchy, vnder colour that (being too prodigall) he could not gouerne it as was requisite. Henry the 7. Duke of Luxembourg, succeeded Albert, being chosen with great affection of the Germane Princes, when a Frenchman, both by nation and disposition, and resident at Auignon. But hauing vexed himselfe with those inueterate dissensions of Guelphes and Gibelins, in the end he was poisoned by a Monke called Bernard, a Iacobin, vnder colour of giuing him the Sacrament in the Communion, at Beneuice in the year 1313. To encrease this confusion, Lewis of Bawaria, and Fredericke of Austria the son of Albert, contend for the Empire by open force: but they agreed to hold it by equall authority. Yet this dissention was soone reuiued by the meanes of Pope John the 22 borne at Cahors in Quercy, resident likewise at Auignon: who (seeking to hold a soueraigne authority ouer both, and to dispose the Empire to whom he pleased) entertained this hatred betwixt these two Princes, which burst out into open warre. Fredericke was taken by Lewis in the year 1323. who (supposing to be now absolute in the Empire) suddenly fals into new troubles by the same Pope John, who did excommunicate him, for that he would not resigne the Imperiall dignity into his hand to dispose souerainly thereof at his pleasure. This new affront gaue Lewis of Bawaria occasion to examine the Popes authority, by the learned, and to raise a mighty army to suppress him. So hee came into Italy to oppose the force of the Empire against the Popes excommunications, and to giue a law to the Sea of Rome, which sought to controulle him. John fled at this Alarme. The Colledge of Cardinals assemblé, and vpon the Emperours complaint they depose John as a fugitiue, and create Nicholas the 4 in his place. But there follows a strange perteration. John retournes, and doth dispossesse Nicholas, but in the end death surpriseth John, whom Benedict the 12 doth succeed, a Tholouan, and to Benedict, Clement the 6, a Limesin, who begins more violently against the Emperour then his predecessor John: for hee caused Charles Marquis of Moravia, to be chosen in his place, being sonne to Lewis King of Bohemia, and Duke of Luxembourg, of whom wee haue spoken in this reigne. So the world was tumultued with a general confusion in this age, which drawes after it a long traine of strange calamities.

JOHN, The 51. French King.

Very considerable observations in this reigne.

THE difficulties following in the reigne of Philip of Valois, (which we haue represented) are but trifles in regard of the horrible tragick confusions, where with the following reigne haue beene afflicted, vnder John, Charles the 5, Charles the 6, and Charles the seventh. I will adde also vnder Lewis the 11 into the warre of the Common-wealth it selfe, the last of this intestine disafe, the which shall cease for that time, wee will reckon a hundred and twelue yeares, of the most wretched time, that ciuill warres could breed in the bowels of this miserable State. The which begins not in our time, but to doe penance, either for the weaknesse of Kings, or the folly of subiects, or by the means of such as haue abused both the one and the other to serue their execrable passions. By effects, we shall obserue what a good King is in an Estate, and how pernicious the command of many is in a Common-wealth, who (hauing power in the soueraigne authority) abuse the people with a shew of the common good, an ordinary cloake for such as are troubled waters.

We shall see by the vnruly euents of the contempt of royall authority (the King being either a prisoner, or sicke in iudgement) what a body is without a head, a Realme without a King well obeyed, and a multitude governed by it selfe: a subiect susceptible of impressions (but of bad rather then good, though alwaies couered with a shew of good) an instrument of all mischiefs in an Estate, when as (transported by violent and disorder

A ordered passions, couered with a shew of common good) it is not restrained with the reines of a lawfull authority: I meane a multitude, a dangerous beast with many heads, doing commonly more harme then good. We shall see here what Councillors of State, the ambition and couetousnesse of great men bee: especially when women intermeddle, armed with the shew of publike authority: and to conclude, we shall confesse by a sound iudgement of this discourse, that all things done in our age were done before. A briefe preface for the greatnesse of the subiect, yet necessary for that which is represented in their reignes, which we will note according to their occurrences.

John the eldest son of Philip of Valois, succeeded his father in the year 1350. and reigned fourteen yeares. He had made a long apprenticeship in managing the affaires of the Realm vnder his father Philip: but he neither ruled better nor more happily. His manners shall be knowne by his actions. He had 4 sonnes by Joane Countesse of Bologne: Charles, Lewis, John, Philip, and one daughter named Joane. Charles his eldest sonne was Dauphin of Viennois in his fathers life, and Duke of Normandy, and after him King of France. Lewis Duke of Aniou, John Duke of Berry, and Philip called the Hardy, first hee was Earle of Touraine, and after (through his brothers fauour) Duke of Bourgogne, and Earle of Flanders, in the right of his wife. Joane was married to Charles King of Nauarre and Earle of Burcux: Princes which shall play their parts vpon this Theater, in euery Scene of the Tragedy that I am to represent, and for this reason they are to bee obserued in the beginning.

This Charles King of Nauarre, was sonne to Lewis Earle of Eureux, and of Joane daughter to King Lewis Hutin, who by the sufferance of Philip the Long, her vnckle, succeeding to the Crowne, remained Queene of Nauarre, and by this right Charles her sonne caried both the title and effect of the Realme, with many other great inheritances: A Prince of the blood Royall both by father and mother, and sonne in law to King John, hauing married Joane his only daughter. A man of a subill spirit, eloquent, active, vigilant, but ambitious, vnfaithfull, malicious, reuengefull, armed with the prerogative of his blood, and the great meanes he enioyed, to be a pernitious instrument to trouble the King and his Realm beyond all measure, but in the end hee shall receiue a due reward for his actions, by a death worthy of his life.

After *John*s coronation at Rheims, with his wife Joane, being returned to Paris, he beganne his reigne by a famous act of an vnfortunate preface: for hee caused Raoul Earle of Eu and of Guines to bee beheaded in prison, vpon light accusations, as hauing intelligence with the English, and that hee betrayed his affaires, for that hee had passed and repassed into France vpon his faith giuen during his imprisonment. Hee was Constable of France.

John aduanced Charles of Spaine to his place, grandchild to the King of Castile, and son in law to the Earle of Blois, and so allied to the King, and exceedingly beloued of him amongst all his greatest Fauourites. Hee shall be the first fruits of many miseries, when as this reigne promised some rest, vnder a King of age and experience, fit to gouerne a Realm: For as John was busie to institute the order of the Knights of the Starre (in the end growne so common) as it remains a badge for the Knight of the Watch and his Archers vnto this day) there chanced a great misfortune to this Constable.

Charles of Nauarre complained that the King detained from him the Countie of Champagne and Bry, belonging to his mother by the same title that the King himselfe of Nauarre did. This was true, but by reason of their nearnesse vnto Paris, the Kings Countie had vnto these Earledomes vnto the Crowne, and giuen in exchange the townes of Montre and Meulan, with a Pension answerable to the reuenues of the said Earledomes, without any prejudice to the Nauarrois. But he sought an occasion for a cause, in which his miserieous pretence in his heart, the which hee discovered by many effects. Not being to complaine directly of the King, hee quarrelled with the Constable, as the chief of the Countie, of whom hee was exceeding zealous, for the private fauour the King did beare him. Hauing taken counsell with his passion, hee caused the Constable to bee hanged in a bed, at Aigle in Normandy, but with so great a presumption, as hee himselfe came vnto the place accompanied with his brother Philip of Nauarre, John Earle of Harcourt, and his brethren, and with many Gentlemen his followers. This murder thus audaciously committed, hee retires himselfe easily to Eurcux (where of hee was Earle) from whence hee he writes to the good Cities of the Realme, avouching this murder as done by his command, & iustifying it as lawfull and reasonable. King John found himselfe much wronged, but not able then to redresse it, he promised to remit the fact, so as he would aske pardon with the respect due to his royall Maesty. The which Charles is content to doe, but vpon good gages, holding the Kings word insufficient to secure his person: so as John gives him Lewis his second son for hostage.

The Nauarrois comes to Paris, he presents himselfe to the Kings Councell, and seeks to give some reason for this murder: yet the Councell condemnes him as guilty of high treason, and decrees that he should be committed to prison. Lames of Bourbon Earle of March (newly advanced to the office of Constable) layes hold on him, and puts him in guard; but all this was but for a shew, to maintaine the publike respect, for presently the three Queenes goe to the King, (Joane daughter to Lewis Hutin his mother in law, Blanche widow to Philip of Valois, and Joane daughter to King John, Queene of Nauarre, his wife) Charles likewise came himselfe, and fals vpon his knees before the King: both he and they seeme to weepe, and to sue for mercy of King John; who had already granted his pardon, vpon good assurance: John grants his request, yet could hee not command his heart to leave this malicious ieaousie, which made him seek new occasions daily to crosse his father in lawes actions. He then offers his seruice to the King of England, who fails not to embrace this occasion, hauing the heart and hand of a Prince of the blood, whose power was great in the State. Vpon this assurance he sends Edward his eldest son Prince of Wales into Guienne, with a goodly army: a yong man of an exceeding hope, and gives him for Councell, John Sbandos, Robert Knowles, Francis Hul, and John of Arondele, great men in their times, and which shall be famous in those actions which shall follow.

New warre by the King of Nauarre practices

He attended the end of the truce, the which being expired, he enters Guienne, and passes into Languedoc, to Tholous, Narbonne, and ouer all, he spoiles, sacks, kills, and finds no resistance, and returns without difficulty to Bourdeaux, being laden with spoiles.

At the same instant another cloud of Englishmen breakes out of Calais, and spoiles the Country of Picardy; but John by these Alarmes foreseees the tempest of a greater warre, measuring the forces of England by the will of King Edward his assured and tried enemy. He therefore seeks a remedy by an ordinary course: hee calls a generall Parliament, to take counsell and comfort from them in these new occurrences. Charles of Nauarre assists, but with an intent to crosse the Kings proceedings by indirect practices, and to withdraw the subjects affections from assisting the King with their means in this necessity: but it was in vaine, for in regard of John's promise to better the coyns, they granted him a reasonable ayd to rayse and entertaine a great army. This faithfull resolution of the French, did for that time suppress the violence of the English, but not the furious malice of the Nauarrois: for hauing laboured in vaine to disswade the people from their promised succours, and hauing raised by these practices, seditions in diuers parts of the Realme, hee lands at Cherbourg with 2000. men, robs and spoyles the country, and takes the Castle of Conches in Normandy from the King. An intolerable presumption of a subject against his Prince, after the murder of a Constable.

But John dissembles this affront, and by the mediation of his sonne Charles, Dauphine of Viennois, he remits this second fault, and receiues the King of Nauarre his son in law againe into fauour: but in effect hee doth it to frustrate his purposes, and to punish such as had assisted him.

John did then give the Duchy of Normandy to the Dauphine for his portion: so as he must take possession thereof. An apparent cause to draw him thither: but in effect John's intention was to draw the Nauarrois into a place of easie surprisall, to make him and his adherents giue an account of their wicked actions, and to prevent them hereafter. The Duke of Normandy arrives at Roan, whither all the good townes of the country runne to doe him homage. The King of Nauarre (who held Barreux and many great Lordships in the country, with one of the greatest dignities in the Realme) comes to doe him homage well accompanied, but better receiued by Charles his brother in law.

The King aduertised that the Nauarrois was at Roan with his son, goes speedily into Paris, accompanied with his brother Philip Duke of Orleans, Lewis his second son Duke of Anjou, the Earle of Tancarville, and Arnaud of Endreghen Marshall of France, and posts to Roan with this great traine:

Arriving

A. Arriving about dinner time, he presently goes to his sons lodging, where he finds him at table, accompanied with the King of Nauarre, and the most of them which had assisted him at the Constables murder, where (without any more deliberation or delay) he causeth them all to be apprehended. And then (not pausing any longer) hee made choice of foure out of this number, the two brethren of Harcourt, the Lord of Manbuc, and Colinet Doabler, chief actors in the forefaid murder, and without any other forme of proceeding, (as a matter long before determined) hee causeth their heads to be cut off, setting them vpon stakes, and drawing their carcasses to the gibbet. The next day he made choice of prisoners, and sends the Nauarrois with Friquet and Bonrabu, his domestick and most trusty seruants, to Arras, with a good guard, and presently dismisseth all the rest to their houses, enioyning them expressly vnto fidelity and loyalty to his seruice, binding them by a new oath.

This unexpected execution amazed the whole Country, like to a cracke of thunder; but it rouzed vp the Nauarrois faction, especially Philip of Nauarre, brother to Charles, and Jessy of Harcourt Vncle to the two brethren beheaded, the which opened the gates to a strange confusion, which shall cast John into miserable captiuitie, and draw the Nauarrois out of prison, with a flaming Torch in his hand to fire the whole Realme. Behold Philip and the House of Harcourt presently in England, crying out against murder. They entreat Edward to stretch forth his hand to be reuenged of so notable an iniustice and disloyalty. They offer him their hearts, persons, goods, townes, and hauens, to land in Normandy without any difficulty, and there to make warre commodiously against so treacherous and truell a Prince.

Edward a wife and vigilant Prince, who had his eyes open to all occasions that might annoy his enemy, embraceth this offer: hee assembles his troopes to send them speedily into Normandy. And, to doe nothing by halves, he employs all hee can to leaue a great army, which he sends into Guienne, to make worke for John in diuers places, and not to suffer this first heat of the discontented French to coole, he then without any delay sends the Duke of Gloucester into Normandy with 4000 choice men, who lands easily and safely with Philip of Nauarre, and so they ouer-runne and spoile the Champion country. The terror of these new Forces spreads presently ouer all. The townes of Lizieux, Orbes, Bacheloin and Ponteau on the Sea, yeeld presently. And (not staying to besiege any great Cities) he goes to Breteuil and Tuillieres, and from thence to Verneuil in Perche: whither he takes easily, giuing it out in all places, that it was to reuenge the wrong done to the King of Nauarre and his seruants: a duty of humanity which Kings ought not to refuse one to another in their greatest necessity.

King John hasteth thither with his Army, and recouers Breteuil and Tuillieres, and had easily repossessed all the rest, if a new occasion had not drawne him elsewhere, and the secret decree of God, to his ruine. Edward Prince of Wales, the eldest sonne of Edward King of England, was then in Guienne to gouerne the Country vnder his fathers authority. Edward sends him two thousand horse, and eight thousand English Archers, with commission to assemble all he can in the Country of Guienne, vnder his obedience, where he was followed by a great number of the Nobility, and Houses of marke. The chiefe were Capal de Buch, and the Lord of Grail; (some thinke that out of these two Houses vniued, the race of Candale is issued) with the Lords of Espaire, of Mucidan, of Montfermeil, of Duras, and of Segur. All prepares for a great hurly-burly; John hauing leasued a goodly army, turns head to the place, whither the greatest burthen of the warre did call him: Hauing therefore left sufficient Forces in Normandy to make head against the Duke of Gloucester, he marcheth towards Poitou, whither the Prince of Wales was now come. Pope Clement the 6. a Limosin, resident at Auignon, sends the Cardinall of Peregorst his Legat to these two Princes (being ready to fight) to calme this storme. But the preparation of John's great Forces, was the chiefe motive to make Edward willing to giue ouer: who began to stay and to thinke of his retreat, and of a reasonable composition by the Legats means, who goes from one to another to make this accord: John demanded, That Edward should giue him sure hostages, and as one vanquished should remaine at his mercy and discretion: Edward was content to yeeld vp all that hee had taken from him, but without any blemish to his honour, whereof hee said he was accomptable to God and his country. John would not accept of this offer (notwithstanding all the entreaties and perswasions the the Legate could vfe) finding himselfe farre stronger then his enemy: saying, it was his aduantage to prescribe him lawes. But his fathers experience, so dearly bought, should haue taught him wit, and not so willingly to runne into a mischief. Oh miserable France! which art neuer wife but too late!

This King flouts his eyes to Presidents, stops his eares to all admonitions of reason, seeing his owne ruine wilfully, as if the time had beene too short for his perdition. He defies any hand to fight presently, to whip this young warrior, hauing forgotten that hee had plaid his prize at Crecy; and learned not to bee rash in a matter of so great consequence. But what followed? The onely meanes to preferue the vanquished, is to hope for his helpe.

So Edward seeing himselfe reduced to this extremity, either to lose his honour or his life, hee resolues to employ his life courageously, to save his honour veruiously, and the enent fauoured his resolution. John had all aduantages ouer Edward, both of number, force, shew, country, and conceit, (which is commonly a consideration of no small importance in worldly affaires) and withall the choice of all his horsemen (chosen then the best in Europe) with the greatest and wisest Capitaines of his whole Realme. Being well aduersed of the number and estate of the English army, (which consisted for the most part of footmen) his meaning was to draw him to battell: presuming easily to defeat this troop of English bowmen with so great a number of Lances and Battle-axes well armed. Some putting all hope of victory in his horse, he makes the forme of his battell according to his designe. But he had forgotten, that neither horse nor horseman saues the man in the day of battell. He resolues therefore to charge onely with his horse, and to giue his Nobility the honour of the victory, the which he held confidently in his hands, before the battell. Vpon this proiect he arranges his foot apart in one battalion, and diuides his horse into three squadrons, whereof hee giues the first to his Constable (some name the Duke of Arthenes, the steele of the house of Tremouille, and some write, that he was of the house of Breime) accompanied with two Marshalls of France, Arnould of Endreghen, and John of Clermont. The second was giuen to Charles his eldest sonne, and the third with his son Philip, he reserves to himselfe. In this confidence of his horsemen, he beuinkles himselfe of a new stratagem: out of euery Squadron he chooseth an hundred horse, and so make one body of three hundred, meaning therewith to breake the first ranks of the enemy's army, which for the most part were foot.

The Prince of Wales prest by necessity, had another designe. Standing vpon his defence, he resolues to encourage himselfe, and by courage to animate his army with another stinate resolution, to fight desperately against so strong an enemy, and so to gouerne his Forces, as the combat might proue difficult to the enemy, whom he sees ready to charge. He lodgeth his Army in a place of aduantage for defence against the horse, hauing both behind them, and on their flanks, Vines, Bushes, Hedge-rows, and Vnder-woods, all of hard approach for the horse. But he adds industry, and makes the place more inaccessible, causing the souldiers to cast vp great trenches with wonderful expedition. Hauing provided for his camp, he doth place his archers vpon the approaches so politickly, as they might succour the horse, and bee relieved by them, and likewise resist the enemy: when they should be charged. But about all he labours to animate his souldiers, so as the courage of his small troop did equal the number of the greater, in this firme resolution, either to yinquish or to dye together, to maintain their honours and good fortunes: and in this order the English attend the French army confidently, whom they see preparing to fight. Whilest that Edward provides thus for his defence, there befall a great contention in the French Army, the which sways much in this dayes fight: For coming to make choice of an hundred horse out of euery battalion, there were some discontented, (the place being giuen rather by fauour then merit) so as such as were left behind, finding themselves grieved as with a repulse, were more ready to double their despight, then their courage to fight. Impressions which import much in these great occurrences, when the mind is still be present with that we doe, and not be distracted with any other affections: but when they are ready to fight. Behold this troop of 300 horse aduanceth, commanded by English of Ribemont. The Trumpets sound to battell, they all runne to the easiest approach of the English trenches, to draw forth their footmen, and to prouoke them to fight. This was anothers error of John, that being stronger then Edward, besieging him in the vines, and cutting

A cutting off his victuals, in few dayes he might haue vanquished him without blowes. But our weening impatience and haste, drew him to his ouerthrow. This great Squadron forceth into the Vines, and enters fight with the English foot: but the issue of John's new stratagem was contrary to his expectation: for in this first charge they find resistance.

The Archers planted in the Vines with aduantage, galled them in the first ranks, with their arrowes, whilest that others (lying vncene in the rows adioynning) ayne at them at their pleasures, shooting forth a dangerous storme of arrowes, and vpon their flanke riseth another shower, which passeth through these horsemen, whereas neither lance nor battle-axe could preuaile. Hauing made this first charge with so great losse, they seek to retire, and to charge the enemy in some other place; but they fall into a greater perplexity, for the horses sinke in this miry ground, and are entangled among the stubs, stakes, and trees: some fall, some rise againe, all are in confusion; they lye plunging in the ditches and trenches, and the English arrowes flye from all sides. This troope hauing drawne downe the rest by degrees, like to a current of water which disperfeth it selfe by a channell, the more men, the more disorder: and our Frenchmen grow amazed at this repulse.

The English seeing them giue backe in confusion, cry victory, and follow their aduantage, striking on all sides, as they lay wallowing one vpon another. King John runnes to repaire this disorder. He performs the duty both of a good Capitaine, in gathering together his disperfed men, and of a valiant Souldier, in fighting courageously: but the blow was already giuen, all was lost. The Duke of Athens Constable, and John of Clermont Marshall, were slaine at the first charge. The Standard Royall appears no more, by the fall of the Earle of Charnie, who caried it in this dayes fight. The greatest part of the commanders, and of this braue Nobility (who sought to be in the front) are vnhorfed.

This rampart ouerthrowne, and the rest shaken and broken in pieces, the Prince of Wales preuailes the more easily. King John is farre engaged in the conflict. The English cry, To the King, to the King. Being charged on all sides, he defends himselfe admirably, and his sonne Philip (being neerer him) surmounted the ordinary courage of the most resolute souldiers, in defending his father from blowes, (his generous valour did first purchase him the name of Hardy, and the course of his life did confirme it in diuers worthy actions) but in the end they are prisoners.

Wherevpon there grew some controuerse (not without extreame danger to his person) for hauing yielded vnto Denis of Morbee, his owne subiect, (borne in the Country of Archois, banished for some fact) he was halied by other souldiers, who pretended an interest in this prize. But the Prince of Wales vnderstanding thereof, sent him an honorable guard of some of his most trusty seruants whilest that he made the victory absolute. The head being taken, all are surprisid with feare: all are disperfed, and the slaughter is general without resistance. Edward content to haue the head, sounds a retreat, and forbids them to pursue the victory. Many saue themselves in Poitiers, which stands vpon her guard, lest the enemy should enter with them that head.

The victorious Prince remaining vpon the place of battell, sends a troope of Noble men Falcons, to receiue the King prisoner, and to conduct him to his pavilion, the which they doe with great respect. Edward seeing him approach, meets him with great reuerences, honours him, comforts him, entertaines him with a louing discourse, and promisseth him all the good visage a great King could expect in his aduersity: A young Prince twice a conqueror, hauing vanquished his enemy, both by valour and courtesie, leaving an honorable trophee of his humanity and wisdom to posterity. John (seeing his countenance shewed a courageous mind in his misfortune. A notable example for Princes to shew an inuincible constancy, against the most dangerous losses, amongst which the losse of liberty holds the most mournfull rank, and is of the bitterest digestion).

Our losse was very great, and the sequell very pernicious. They number fiftene hundred Gentlemen slaine in this battell, amongst the which there were fifty two Lords. The chiefest of name were Peter of Bourbon, the Duke of Athens Constable of France, John of Clermont Marshall of France, George of Charny great Chamberlaine, Antoine of Champeil Bishop of Chalons, the Lords of Pont, and Fayette; and of the common sort five or six thousand. A hundred Ensignes were brought away in triumph, the spoile was red away, the place of battell free, the dead bodies at the conquerors merry. The King was taken (the chiefeft part of the victory) and with him he drawes into the fame prison A Philip his fourth fonne (afterwards Duke of Burgogne) James of Bourbon Earle of Ponthieu, John of Arthois Earle of Eu, Charles of Arthois his brother, Earle of Longueville, Charles Earle of Tancarville, John of Melun, and his sonne Archbishop of Sens, the Earles of Vendome, Salbruch, Nassau, Dampmartin, la Roche, and many other of account. This ouerthrow hapned in the year 1356, the 19 day of September, continued with many confusions, whereof I tremble to discourse.

But let vs continue the order of our History. John (falling into his enemies hands is brought to Bourdeaux, and from thence safely conducted into England to Edward, who shewed himselfe as courteous to his capitall enemy being his captiue, as glad of his sonnes victory. Some say, he commended him more to haue receiued John with humanity, then to haue conquered him by his valour. A lesson for great Princes to learne, that vertue doth equall valour, and that he is rightly a Conqueror, that can vanquish himselfe. Hee doth lodge him honourably in the City of London, in the Duke of Lancasters house, with his sonne Philip vnder a sure guard. The other prisoners are disperfed into diuers places, according to their qualities, to draw a reasonable ranfome from them; the which as they paid, he sent them free to their houses with much honor, and at that instant he gaue liberty vpon the Kings word, being captiue, to all such as he would answer for. In this great calamity, God looked vpon France with his eye of pity, willing to chastise it, but not to ruine it. For he refused (during the Kings captiuitie) royall heads, to saue this Estate from shipwracke, being almost ruined, both by the great afflictions passed, as also by the imprisonment of their foueraigne head, and the death of so many great personages, necessary instruments for the preservation and greatnesse of the State. As Charles eldest sonne to John, Dauphin and Duke of Normandy, Lewie Duke of Aniou, and John Duke of Berry escaped in this defeat. Charles was of so wise and temperate a spirit, as he seemed capable to gouerne this great Barke in the most horrible stormes of confusion, which hapned in this Realme during his fathers imprisonment. John continued five yeares a prisoner, for he was taken in the year 1356, in September, and was deliuered in the year 1361 in the Moneth of May. But let vs describe in order the disorders which chanced in his captiuitie.

Estates assembled for the Kings deliuey.

As soone as the Dauphine (so called vntill hee be Regent) came to Paris, he employes all his wits to procure his fathers liberty, and to maintaine the Kings free authority in the Realme, which was as much restrained as the Kings person. But in this good and commendable resolution he found strange difficulties. He presently calls a generall assembly of the Estates at Paris, in October following; an expedient remedy for the greatest affaires of this Monarchy, profitably practised in the most vrgent causes of our Kings. There Charles layeth before them, not onely the misery wherunto the King his father was brought, but also the whole Realme in his person: he entreates them to giue him counsell and assistance in this so great an extremity. The cause spake of it selfe: his person was an excellent Orator. Moreover, hee failed in no point of his duty: for his mournfull countenance expressed his sorrow naturally, and he did well vrge the necessity of his demand, with so wise and modest an eloquence, as it would haue moued and dissolued even the hardest Rockes of the Pyrenean mountains. But the answer which was then made him, and the long continuance of crosses giuen him in so commendable an action, shew well what an ill counselled people is, and how dangerous it is to let slip the reines of restraint to so furious a beast, which grows then most outrageous, when there is greatest need of mildnesse and modesty. Without doubt there had beene many disorders in former reignes; and in this new controuersie for the Crowne, Philip had made great breaches. But it is now time to complain of the sicke, when he lies at the point of death, and to represent vnto him his forepassed errors, in stead of applying fit remedies for his griefe. So do the people (bring witty and eloquent) complain of the errors of their superiours, and are more ready to increase the disease (by remedies worse then the disease it selfe) rather then to cure it; as shall appeare by the popular actions, during King Johns imprisonment, who from complaints haue exceeded to audacious seditions: and then in the end to cruell and tragick massacres; not onely to tread vnder foot, but to ouerthrow the lawfull authority of this Monarchy.

The peoples insolvency during King Johns imprisonment.

The Parliament consisted of all the best Cities of the Realme: but as Paris is the chiefe,

As to hauing among the rest the first degree and greatest meanes, it was also the chiefe in credit. So as when order is well obserued, it brings the greatest benefit to this Estate: but when as disorder reignes, the greatest confusion comes from thence. The Church holds the first ranke in Parliament: and then the Prouost of Merchants in the City of Paris, whereas the Vniuersity had then great credit. All parts shall play vpon this Theater, either for good or euill, by strange accidents. But let vs returne to our Dauphin. After that he had made his proposition, the Estates being assembled in one body resolu'd; That to auoid confusion, there should be fifty chosen out of all the Prouinces, to determine of things necessary, according to the instructions & remembrances deliuered to them. These fifty Deputies assembl'd in the Gray-Friers, where by a common consent they resolu'd what to say vnto the Dauphin: who being entreated to come vnto their assembly, and set to hear some notable offer of assistance, conformable to the necessity of the time, Robert le Cocq Bishop of Laon, spake thus vnto him in the behalfe of the company; That the Assembly beseeched him to sweare to keepe secret what should be deliuered vnto him by the Estates. This young Prince being nothing amazed in this perplexity, answers them presently with a resolution: That he should greatly forget the degree he held in the State, in receiving a law from his fathers subjects: and therefore he did command them, by the natural authority he had ouer them, to speake freely what their hearts conceiued. Then the Bishop in all their names made knowne vnto him the ill government of the Treasure, demanding reformation thereof, with a commission to call the Receiueurs to an account; that all such as had managed the Kings money, should be displaced; and that hereafter both the treasure, and the affaires of State should be gouerned by foure Prelates, and twelue Bourgeois, among the which the City of Paris should haue the first degree and credit, and that without this Councell the Dauphin should attempt nothing. And for the conclusion of all their demands, they require him most instantly to set the King of Nauarre at liberty. And vpon this condition they promise the Dauphin ayde and succour for his fathers deliuerie.

The Dauphin noting plainly both the intention of this ill-aduised people, and that it was now out of season to take exception at the violence of these popular furies; demands respit to giue them an answer: the next day passeth in this sort, without answer to the deputies, who entreat him to resolu'd. He makes his excuse vpon the importancy of these affaires, and demands a new day to consider thereof. And as they pressed him daily to make his answer, so he still prolonged the time by many subtill delays, grounded vpon sundry excuses, of purpose to disperse them, and to dissolue their Councels: the which he sees were practised by his enemies. And hauing caused the deputies to attend many daies, this plot (so hotly pursued) grew cold, and (tired with tediousnesse) they returne home to their houses, without any other fruit, then great fiewes: leauing the King languishing in prison, and the Realme in pitifull disorder. But they parted not without leauing the chiefe leuaine of their intended mischief at Paris, and too many hands to worke in this masse of confusion, to the great preiudice of France.

An ill-aduised people hath this humour: To complaine still of the present estate, and to seeke the future with hope of better. The Parisians who had seized vpon authority, (more careful for the deliuey of the King of Nauarre, then of their lawfull King) summon the Dauphin to set the Nauarrois at liberty, according to the decree of the Estates: and taking his delays for a denial; they practise with John of Piqueny, Gouernor of the Countrey of Arthois (to whom King John going to the vnsfortunate battell of Poitiers, had giuen it in keeping) to deliuer him out of the Castell of Allex in Cambresis, where hee had remained nineteene moneths a prisoner. This young Prince, enuironed with all these difficulties, had yet one which exceeded the rest. The Bishop of Laon the chiefe of his Councell betrayed him, being a priuate and passionate partaker of the Nauarrois. Charles of Nauarre is deliuered, meaning to come to Paris, and therefore hee demands a safe conduct from the Dauphin, who grants it, will hee or no; that is, hee puts a sword into the hands of his most malicious and furious enemy; and lodgeth him in his owne house. These were bitter pills, but hee must digest them, even the Dauphin and all good men that did assist him. But many of them looth to allow of these confusions by their freed consents) restore themselves to their houses.

The King of Nauarre set at liberty comes to Paris.

The Nauarrois hauing his passport from the Dauphin, not onely as a gage of the publike like faith, but as a sentence against king John being prisoner, goes to Paris with a stately train, where they all prepare for his entertainment. The Bishop of Laon, and the Prouost of Merchants, with a great troope of his Parisians meet him, who went to lodge in the Abbey of S. Germaine. He lets the people vnderstand, that he desires to speake publicly vnto them. A scaffold is built, and the people throng in great troopes, bringing both hearts and eares. The Nauarrois (a subtil and an eloquent man) represents vnto them the wrong of his imprisonment, and his interest to the Crowne: hee desires iustice might be done him according to his desert and quality, but about all, he spares not to touch the string which should advance him to the Royalty. The people applaud him, and give charge to the Prouost of Merchants to make the Dauphin acquainted therewith: which he performs with insolency. The Bishop of Laon (a trecherous seruant to his master) answers for him (being silent in this necessity). That the Dauphin should shew grace and fauour to the King of Nauarre, as one good brother ought to another. Hee makes the Dauphine so humble, as he prevents the Nauarrois (who kept his lodging but to preach to this seditious multitude) and doth visit him first, whom he doth scarce meet at the doore with a cold welcome. He requires audience of his demands. They are read in Councell, which consisted for the most part of men corrupted: where it was decreed, That all which the King of Nauarre and his complices had done against the King and his Realme, should be forgotten as neuer done: his goods seized and in the Kings hands, should be restored both to him and his, with their honours, which had beene beheaded by the commandements of King Iohn: their bones should be gathered together, and honourably interred: all acts of condemnation disannulled, and an act of their iustificacion authentically drawne, to free them and theirs hereafter from all ignomy. The demand of the King of Nauaires pretended title was remitted to another time.

The Bishop of Laon a traitor to his Maiesty.

The Dauphin yields to the Nauarrois.

But the Nauarrois brings in the King of England, of whom the Dauphine demanded a truce; the which he grants vpon condition, that he might succour the King of Nauarre and Iohn of Montfort Duke of Britaine in their pretensions. Thus the seeds of warre were sowne during the confused calamity of this poore Realme, by the meanes of Charles of Nauarre. At the same instant Edward makes rigorous demands of his prisoner John, on whom (for all his good countenance) he meant to make a benefitt by his captivity. He required homage of him for the Realme of France, as holding it of the Realme of England, and vpon this condition he would set him at liberty. King John being of a courageous spirit, though a prisoner in his person, answers him freely, That he must not speake to him of that which he neither ought nor would doe, so alienate a right inalienable. That he was resolved at what price soeuer, to leaue it to his children, as he had receiued it from his Ancestors. That affliction might well ingage his person, but not the inuolable right of the Crowne, where he had the honour to be borne: ouer the which neither prison nor death had any power, and especially in him, who should alwayes hold his life well employed, sacrificing it for the immortall preferment of France.

The generous answer of King Iohn to Edward's demands.

This generous resolution of King John, gaue as great occasion to pittie his calamity, as the strange conditions of the English (being victor) ministred matter of griefe and disdain to all true-hearted Frenchmen: but all this could neither temper the malice of the Nauarrois, nor the furious impudency of this inchanting people. Hereupon the Dauphin incites the Parisians, to take pity of his poore father, who not able to auoid the inevitable crosses of fortune, common to all degrees, could well shew his constancy in greatest afflictions. But these brutish minds, will not be moued by any apparent reasons: so as after this poore Prince had vied all the submissions necessity could inuent, to win the people, in the expectation the losse of his paines, he fought to his other Cities of France.

The Dauphine solicits the other Cities for the Kings liberty.

Having left Lewis Duke of Aniou his brother at Paris, to supply his place, and to maintain some shew of authority, the effect whereof crept hourly into the Nauarrois power, he went from City to City, craving ayd of the French, for the deliuey of his father and the restoring of his Estate. The History doth much honour the Prouince of Languedoc to haue made great shewes of duty to their King being prisoner: for it obsequies. That the three Estates of the Country (assembled in one body at Tholouse) vnder the authority of the Earle of Armagnac their gouernor, did freely grant a great ayd to the King, for the performance whereof, they would not only employ their revenues, but their most precious moueables, yea their viues Jewels: And to stiffe their generall heauiness, they aban-

Champaigne followed this commendable example. But examples did no more moue the Parisians hearts, then reason had done, who answer the Dauphin roughly, when he entreates them most humbly, that he should call another Parliament, where they would aduise what was to be done. Their intent was to take all authority from the Dauphin, and to vlturp it themselves: to dispose of the treasure, of honours and dignities, of peace and warre, and of the life and death of the Kings subiects at their pleasures. To this end they made this young Prince contemptible and odious, assembling together both without his priuaty and against his will, in Churches and publicke places, in priuate houses, in great and small troopes, without any feare or respect of the royall dignity.

The Dauphin more a prisoner then his father, durst not repine against these disorders, which increased hourly, like to a violent streame which falls from a high mountaine through the force of much raine. This furious multitude (puffed vp daily by the practices of the Nauarrois, who employed both heart and hand to ruine the Dauphine) falls in the end from threats to blowes. The Apostume is ripe, it must needs breake. An Exchanger named Peter Maré pickt a quarrell with the Dauphins Treasurer, and kills him in Saint Maries street. Having slaine him, hee flies into Saint Iames of the Butchery, and no man pursues him. The Dauphin seeing his authority too much blemished, in suffering himselfe to be thus braued, caused the murderer to be drawne out of the church, and to be executed: his hand to be cut off in the place where the murder was committed, and from thence to be drawne to the gibbet and hanged. And to the end the people should not mutine, he went accompanied with a guard of Souldiers, led by Robert of Cleremont Marshall of France.

The same day arriued the Ambassadors of King John, being prisoner, to sollicite his deliuey, after many voyages made for the space of two yeares, that is to say, two ages for a poore prisoner, to whom delay is a double languishing. But they were too true witnesses both of the fruitlesse reares of this poore Prince, and of the barbarous cruelties of these Cannibals. They beheld the Bishop of Paris, in the Dauphins sight, and in the view of all the world, to take this murderers carcase from the gibbet, and to carry it to the Church, from whence he was drawne, and there to be honourably interred. But this was not all, Iohn of Piqueny comes to the Dauphin from the Nauarrois, to summon him to hold his promise concerning the demands which were granted him in Councell. And as the Chanceller replied, that they had beene performed; he answered (the Dauphin being present, and the two Queenes) That whoeuer would maintaine the contrary, had lyed. And to heape one mischief vpon another: the Prouost of Merchants, with some of the Vniuersity, come vnto the Dauphin, who by a Iacobin Orator called Simon of Langres (for it is not at this day alone that Monkes haue beene meddlers in State) require him to performe the promises made to the King of Nauarre, or else the people would rise against him, if he refused so apparent and reasonable a duty.

The insolency of Iohn of Piqueny in the Dauphins presence.

A Parliament was likewise called for the Kings deliuey, whereunto the blood of France, (which cannot degenerate) caused the Cities to be encinded, so as things seemed in the end to promise some redresse. Being assembled at the Augustins, the Prouost of Paris gathered together three thousand men of the basest artizans, and comes armed to the house of Saint Pol, where the Dauphin was lodged; having seized vpon the gate, and stoppt all the passages, hee ascends to the Princes chamber, being followed by his armed men. The Dauphin was therewith much amazed. Feare not (sayes the Prouost) for any thing you shall see: for what shall be done, hath beene decreed, and it must be so. The watchword being giuen, behold Iohn of Constans, and Robert of Cleremont, Marshalls of France (two trusty seruants to the Dauphin) are slaine before his eyes, and so neare vnto him, as the blood rebounded vpon his face. Ha (cries this poore Prince) what is this? will you attempt against the blood of France? No my Lord (sayes the Prouost vnto him) feare nothing, it is not against your person wee pretend, they be your disloyall seruants wee seek, who haue ill aduised you. Then he tooke his hood, and put his vpon the Dauphins head, being halfe red, and halfe skye-coloured, the City Luty; and hee did weare the Dauphins all that day being of a browne blacke, embroidered with gold, in token of his Disgrace.

Horrible murders committed in the Dauphins presence.

This done, their bodies are drawne to the Marble table, and from thence cast into the Palace yard, for a spectacle to this furious people, which flocke thither from all parts, with shouting and clapping of hands. He presently sends to the Dauphin cloth both red and sky coloured, to make him a hood, and calls the people to the towne-house at the Greue, where he makes them to approue this massacre: and afterwards both the Dauphin and the Estates to doe the like, which were then assembled for very contrary effects. And to confirme and iustifie his vnbridled impudency, he writes Letters in the name of the City of Paris, to all the good townes of the Realme, exhorting them to ioyne with the chiefe Cities, and to take their liuery as the Dauphin had done, the better to reforme the disorder of the Realme. As these confusions increased daily and hourly, William of Mounten, Bishop of Terouenne Chancellor of France, with many other officers of the Crowne, fled from Paris, and for the most part retire into Germany, as a shelter to auoid these stormes, expecting a better season.

The Chancellor had left the great seale with King John, being prisoner, so as then they used none but the small seale of the Chastellet, as well in the decrees of Parliament, as in all other publicke acts. The Parisians likewise erect a Councell of State, composed of Steuco Cocq Bishop of Laon (the cocke of this confusion) of Renauld of Corby the first President, Steuco Marcel Prouost of Merchants, (who in the end shall receiue the reward of his wickednesse) John Rouillac, John Lisle, with many of the Vniuersity, who had not the least voice in this new Common-weale. Affliction is good for something: As the Parisians (whom their furious ring-leaders had fed with an imagination of the soueraine government of the State, to dispose of all things at their pleasures) had assured themselves of a willing obedience from all the Cities of the Realme, to whom (as we haue said) they had written, to ioyne with them in a common league: so greatly were they amazed, when answer to their imperious Letters, they received a generall deniall from all parts of the Realme; the Cities refusing to hearken to any priuate league, and detesting the execrable example of so audacious a rebellion: standing more carefully vpon their guard, for feare of a surprisall by the Nauarrois, whom they confidently beleeued to be the cause of Parisians frenzy and confusions.

The Dauphin
leaves Paris.

The Dauphine being thus vnwillingly entreated by the Parisians, retires himselfe out of this great furell of Paris, into Champagne, to the towne of Vertu, where he assembles the Estates of the Country, and according to the honourable offers they had made him, he obtained all he could desire, answerable to their meanes and faculties. But the greatest benefit he did receive, was the good example they gaue to other Prouinces, who employed all their meanes not to yeeld to Languedoc or Champagne, in the honour of their loyalty, whereunto God and Nature bound all good subjects to their King, especially being in necessity. Thus the Dauphines courage beganne to reuiue, seeing by effect (in his extreame danger) that all good Frenchmen were not dead. A lesson for great men, neuer to despair in most desperate extremities.

Nauarrois.

The Nauarrois had no other care but to ruine the Dauphin. Not satisfied with his practices in Paris, he solicits the King of England instantly, and represents vnto him by sundry messages, that a fit opportunity is now offered to make himselfe master of this goodly Estate. There was great likelihood the King being a prisoner, and the affaires brought to that extremity, that the English should soone haue preuailed ouer this Realme. But God had otherwise decreed, who shewed the rood, but staied his arme, holding in his hands, both the hearts of men, and the euent of things. Edward obserued well the meanes to effect his designs in this confusion, but knowing the ambitious and disloyall humour of the Nauarrois, he could not trust him. Yet not to contemne so plausible an occasion, he affits him with some helpees, by degrees, onely to balance what force should be offered, expecting some better and more safe opportunity, the which he promised himselfe rather by treaty with his prisoner, then by all the intelligences and practices of this Prince, importunately disloyall against his owne blood and the State: which he should haue maintained with the hazard of his life. This turbulent spirit, not able to containe it selfe within the limits of duty, assembles all his forces, to begin the game by open hostility against the Dauphin, and to this end labours to corrupt the Capitaines of places; but he could no more moue their loyalty, then the Parisians had done the Cities.

The Dauphin seeing the Nauarrois in armes, vnder the command of his brother Philip, doth likewise arme, and very lawfully against so vnjust a violence. But herein hee did wisely draw profit from his enemy, & maintaine his authority, not duely respected without force of armes, nor pleasing, if armes had not bene taken by necessity: And fro hence there grew a great occasion to confirme his authority, in the reasonable and necessary employment of his Forces. The disorder and confusion of times had wonderfully incensed the Nobility against the people, by reason that the Nauarrois (hauing employed them two yeares to make himselfe redoubtable and fearfull, and keeping certaine troopes in field, which were abandoned to all licentiousnesse, for want of pay:) they had no other enemy, but the Oxe and the Asse of James the Good man (for so did these fouldiers of confusion call the countryman in derision,) whom they had long tormented with all impunity. But patience too much moued turnes into fury.

The poore countryman thus tortured, in the end resolues to shew his teeth to this deuourer of the people, and to fall on them with open force, who had so often oppressed them without any resistance. Vpon this occasion they make a popular league in the country of Beauuois: the people being armed in great troopes skimmish in diuers places, and fall vpon the gentlemen, by whom they had bene wronged: they kill them, their wives and children without respect: spoile, sack, burne, and pull down their houses. This armed multitude in the beginning did much harme, like to a fire suddenly kindled. A dangerous course and of great consequence, but it was happily suppressed by the Dauphine, repaying the fault, for the which the Nauarrois was blamed.

This popular frenzie quencht in the breeding, was called the Jaquery, of Jaques, or James the Good man, too common in the fouldiers mouthes, as we haue said, more ready to deuoure the countryman then to looke vpon an armed enemy. Thus it was suppressed by the Dauphines diligence, who opposing himselfe of war to this seditious multitude, vanquished them easily: as the peoples rage moued against reason cannot long continue: dangerous fits of ciuill warre, when as such a haue the government in hand, neither can nor will do iustice to the subject vnjustly oppressed, who haue reason alwaies to demand it, and can complain when it is denied them. But they seeke a remedy worse then the disease, when as being culpable of the insolencies they reprehend in such as oppresseth, they will take vpon themselves to seek reuenge, the which they may not expect but from the hands of such as may lawfully take it, that is, from such as haue the publicke authority vnder the law. The Dauphine (hauing repaired this confusion) assembles the Estates at Compaigne, to the great dislike of the Parisians, being partisans to the Nauarrois. They sought (as it were by especial priuiledge) to hold the possession of the Estates still at Paris, and were much discontented they should bee held in any place else. But the Parliament proceeds without regard of their complaints and decrees, That Charles the Kings Sonne, Dauphin of Viennois; (who till then had been called but lieutenant to his father being prisoner) should be acknowledged and called Regent of the Realme of France, and that all good Frenchmen should obey him as the King himselfe. This new title purchased great authority to this young Prince throughout all France, and (making him to appeare in these obscure times of afflictions, as a lanchorne during the tempest of a cloudy night) it reuiued his courage: seeing himselfe at liberty without the wals of Paris, whereas Marcel should not braue him, nor murder his seruantes in his chamber, yea in his bosome. Thus did he settle his authority by degrees, wonderfully shaken by the audacious credit of the Nauarrois, who hauing another intent, did runne a contrary course. For as the Nauarrois designe was to vsurpe the State against all order, so he troade it vnder his feete, hauing recourse to vnjust violence. So as in the field he had armed troopes, in the City of Paris a seditious multitude, and generally passion and fury. The two pillars of his designs were iniustice and violence, supported by the peoples fauour, who may doe much being well aduised: but what mischief can we imagine in an Estate, which a multitude will not attempt, being bewitched by such as abuse them, like a brute beast which goes where hee is driuen? The proiect of this Prince (otherwise great both by blood and meanes) had an vnfortunate issue, as wicked attempts must haue a ruinous end. The mischief fell first on him by the people, in whom he had relyed, and after by him vpon the people, whom hee had deceiued, to make them an instrument of many disorders, yet was the people lesse punished then himselfe, as lesse culpable.

But he who hath disloyally abused this brutish multitude, felt in the end the reuenging hand of God, not only in seeing all his practices proue vaine, but also feeling in his body the fire of Gods wrath iustly kindled against such as confound the society of mankind, and the lawes of States vnder which they are borne. Without doubt had counsell is alwaies dangerous to the giuer. This Prince preached peace, and made war: reformation of State, and nourished confusion: liberty, and yet brought those Cities which obeyed him, into cruell slavery. He abused the people with a shadow of liberty, and sought to win them by deuices, but the contrary effect made him so odious, as hauing plaid the bankrupt of his credit, he fell into the hatred and detestation of all the world, as the following discourse will testifie. To teach all men, That the greatest policie is to be an honest man.

The Regent countenanced with this new title, and the faithfull loue of the French, testified by the former effects, not fought for by practices, but bred in their hearts, and increasing daily in experience of affaires, began to amaze the Nauarrois, and to terrifie the heads of this Parisian multitude: he seized vpon Bois de Vincennes, and Pont Charceton. And not to lose any opportunity, hee accompanied the City of Paris, and burned and sacked the Parisians houses, in reuenge of that which the Nauarrois had done to the Kings seruants. Thus both armies were in field, and doing much harme generally, they multiplied the losses on either side vnder colour of reuenge. The Parisians thus tyred, chose the King of Nauarre for their Capitaine, suffering him to bring souldiers, yea Englishmen, into the City, of whom the most of his troopes consisted. The armies approach: the Regents Forces incampe at Conflans, and those of the Nauarrois at Saint Denis. The Parisians heat began to coole amidst so many miseries, and without their commanders it had beene quite frozen.

Isane the widow of King Charles the Faire, and by that meanes Aunt to the Nauarrois, desired infinitely to see these two Princes at peace. Her degree and age gave her free access to both. She visits them, and perswades them to concord, with all the best reason she could. In the end, after many journeyes, she obtains an enteruiew, to parlee themselves of their affaires, without any mediators. The Regent (a young Prince, wise and temperate) would not at the first be intruded, but in his heart he desired nothing more, foreseeing it to be the onely meanes to bring the Nauarrois in ialousie with the Parisians, who relented daily, growing weary of his actions. The successe was answerable to his designe, for behold the people are presently incensed against the King of Nauarre, and the prouost, who had accompanied him to this parlee. They suddenly make publicke and priuate Assemblies to prevent the practices of these two traitors (as they terme them) which would make their peace without them. John Rouillac and others (jealous, for that they were not employed) run from shop to shop, to set fire to this flax, shewing that priuate treaties are very preiudiciall to the generall good of the City.

The Nauarrois amazed at these newes, he leaves his Army, and runnes to Paris with the Prouost of Merchants, to pacifie these new tumults, the which hee found to be practised against him. Being arrived hee employes all his Partisans to prevent it; and by their meanes he renews the league with the Parisians, protesting to liue and die together. He sweares the Regents death with them, and perswades them to admit a new supply of Englishmen for the safety of the City. And to shew that he had his heart free from all intercellence with the Regent (as they had suspected) hee makes a braue fall, vpon his troopes by Saint Anthoines Gate, but hee soone found a stop, for as hee charged boldly, so was he repulsed valiantly, being charged and beaten by the Regent, so as with difficulty he recovered the Gate. Within few dayes after, hee tries by the other gates if he might speed any better, in diuers resolute attempts, but all is in vaine; hee is chafed, shot at and beaten with losse and shame. This charge did so alter the mind of this inconstant beast with many heads, I mean of this Parisian multitude, who of late had so much loued, honoured and supported him in all his wrongs, as now there is nothing but cries against him, as against a disturber, an ambitious and disloyall man, a prater, a deceiver and teller of lyes. That it is no longer time to depend on him, but the City must provide seriously for their owne affaires, and ioyne with their lawfull Lord. During these popular humours, the Nauarrois appears not, nor any man for him, being so odious to the Parisians, as it was very dangerous euen to talke of him. It was in vaine to hide himselfe at Saint Denis, during the heat of this popular rage. But to bring words to effects, the Parisians by a common consent in their Towne-house,

A resolute to treat with the Regent: and to this end they send a messenger vnto him, beseeching him to grant a safe conduct for their deputies to come vnto him. The Regent imbraceth this occasion, and giues them an ample passport, vpon which grant and assurance, the Parisians send a troope of their grauest Citizens to the Regent with this petition.

That it would please the Regent to pardon the Parisians (being ill aduised) what was passed, and to grant them free trafficke, vntill a peace might be made to his content. The Regent hauing receiued them gratefully, grants their requests, and makes his troopes retire from about Paris, to the Contesses Vallee, expecting this peoples course, being newly reclaimed to their duty, the which might as suddenly returne to their fury, suffering them to taste of peace, and to see the rod ready, being like vnto a furious beast, not to be trusted but vpon good warrant.

The Nauarrois and the Prouost of Merchants labour to repaire their credit at Paris, supposing (if this fury were once euaporated) they should returne into credit, hauing both the Bastill and the Louure at their deuotion. But they are deceived. The chance was cast, and the hour of their ruine was at hand, the people being resolute to giue an apparant testimony of their intent; and a fit occasion was offered. The English nation was the chiefe support wheron the Nauarrois relied, hauing lodged them in great troopes both within and without the City, for his owne strength; the which did much harme in all places. The Parisians cry out, that there was no more need of any souldiers, seeing that a peace was concluded, and then they began with them within the City, which were in their power. The occasion was small.

Behold a troope of English come from dinner at the King of Nauars lodging: the multitude (without any other cause, but that they were English) falls furiously vpon them, they kill 25. at the first, and take 47. whom they drag into prison. Then every man seized on his guest at one instant, so as there were 400. cast into the prison of the Louure, without Magistrate and without order. Onely a tumultuous cry was heard in the streets, That they must punish these wicked Englishmen, which had committed so many disorders, and that the prisoners should answer the spoiles their companions did abroad. The Nauarrois, the bishop of Laon, and the prouost of Merchants, accompanied with their followers, run to this alarm: they intreate the people to assemble and to doe things by order and reason. The multitude comes to the Greue. The Nauarrois (hauing wherted his natural eloquence, with a long and artificiall discourse) makes knowne his loue, and the good succors the English had giuen him in his necessity. The multitude at this name of English, cries out. That they must kill them without any further speech, and then goe speedily to Saint Denis to dispatch the rest.

So without any more speech they command the prouost to leade them thither. The assembly being thus confusedly dissolved (the Nauarrois, nor prouost nor daring to reply) every man runs to armes, especially such as were best furnished, so as in few houres there were sixteen hundred horse, and ten thousand foot resolute to charge the English, which spoiled the Country with all impunity. The Nauarrois and the prouost make a good shew at this sudden mutiny of the people, and seeme more buie then the rest, to remaine still commanders of this multitude: but they dispatch sundry messengers vnder hand, to wish the Englishmen to stand vpon their guard, & to attend resolutely this multitude of Parisians, which came against them without all order. The troope is in the field, the drummes sound, and the ensignes are displayed; but the King of Nauarre made a stand betwixt Montmartre and the windmills, to giue the English breath, who did lay a strong ambuscado at Bois de Bolongne, and sent forth some of their best horsemen to draw this ywarlike and ill gouerned multitude into danger. These scouts appearing, they are hotly pursued by the Parisians, but with such disorder, as is incident to people couragious in the streets, but cowards in the sight of an enemy that vnderstands his profession. They runne into this ambuscado, who charge of all hands vpon this disordered multitude, and followes them flying euen to the gates of Paris: in sight of the Nauarrois and the prouost, who are beholders of this defeat, and relieue them not. The Nauarrois retire himselfe to Saint Denis, where the body of this army was lodged; and the prouost of Merchants to the City, the which is filled with cries, lamentations, and iniurious speeches against them both. The prouost fearing the peoples fury goes guarded with a troope of two hundred men : and left all should be lost, hee seeks to assure himselfe of the Louvre and Bastile. The maske is now vncovered, and the people runnes to armes. Iohn d'ailard (Capitaine of a quarter at Saint Antonie gate) takes a banner with the armes of France, and running through the City, cries Mourray Saint Denis. At this cry, and the sight of standard, all flock together on heaps. The prouost seeks to saue himselfe in the Bastile, to auoid the fury of this multitude, whom he had so often imploied to shed innocent blood : and with him Simon Palmier, and Philip Guyphart, two torches of popular sedition. They enter, but (oh the iudgement of God ! which the wicked cannot flye, at such times, and by such meanes as he hath prescribed for their ruine) the place they had chosen for their safety, was the pitfall of their misery : for being entred, they will be masters, vnder colour of certaine letters from the King of Nauarre, who gaue the chiefe command of that place to the prouost.

They fall to great words with them which commanded the place : and from words to blowes : where without any great difficulty they are all massacred, to the peoples great content, who flock to the Bastile to see the end of their prouost. They require the carcasses, the which are presently deliuered vnto them, and drawne from thence with all sorts or ignominy before Saint Catherins Church : whither the prouost had dragd the bodies of the Marshalls of France, by him so vnworthily murdered : to the end we should honour God, who appoints the punishment according to the offence, with an equall ballance : & punisheth faults with answerable paines. Thus the citie of Paris was freed from the seditious leuaine of confusion, and restored to the lawfull obedience of their King, in the yeere 1358. the second day of August, remarkable for so notable an act.

This iust execution thus made, the citie (as it were recovered of a deadly disease) sends deputies to the Regent : beseeching him to come and take possession of the authority due vnto him. The Regent comes, and is receiued with as much affectionate ioy, as before he had bene odious and contemptible. Such are the people, such they haue bene, and such they shall be, that great men may learne by these examples, how to gouerne a multitude. This happy successe troubled the Nauarrois, who imagining the crowne of France vpon his owne head, did (to his great griefe) see him settled in the State, who had bene almost ruined. Vntill then he had the Kings seruice alwayes in his mouth, as his good Kinsman and subject, but now passions driue him into such fury and despaire, as he resolues to cast off the maske of humility and obedience, and all other ciuill respects : and to make warre against the Regent with all violence, not onely by secret practices, but by open force. The Nauarrois seeing the Parisians to grow affectionate to the Regent, fought by all meanes to torment them, making strange spoiles of their houses, especially of such as were his most deuoted seruants, but in general all that belonged to Paris was abandoned to the spoile. The Regent assembles his army, the which he had retired to ease the people. But the remedy proues often very hurtfull to the Champian country, vpon the first application. Behold two French armies are in field in the heart of France, committing that which we haue seene with our owne eyes in the bosome of our miserable country : for what better commentary can there bee then our owne experience ? Thus harmes grow both from the enemy which assailes, and the friend that defends : so as we may truly say, that in ciuill warres, the cure is oftentimes more hurtfull then the disease. The Nauarrois finding himselfe too weake alone, calls in the English to the sack of France, without a heart, and almost without a soule. Edward aduertised from the Nauarrois, by sundry messengers, of the Estate of France, and the Regents happy successe, condemned himselfe, at hauing failed his owne good fortune, taking the King of Nauarres complaint in no better part : who sayd that he had not bene assisted as the cause required, applying all his wit to the ruine of his country, holding it a gaine to take from his owne blood : so blind are passionate counsels.

Hereupon Edward sends new forces to the Nauarrois : who fortified with these succors, and with his goody promises, begins the war more fiercely then before. He takes the castle of Melun with halfe the citie by the meanes of Queene Blanch, whilst that the Kings souldiers fight for the rest : he burnes the abbey of Lis, and all other places along the forest of Brie and Gastennois. Then crossing the Isle of France (to annoy the Parisians, and to strike a terror by his forces) he takes Saint Germaine in Laie, Creil vpon Oise, Poissy and many other places, with great booties and many prisoners, running daily to the gates

A gates of Paris. Having staid some daies at Mans, hee goes to meet with the succours fro England (taking Chastre vnder Montehery as they passe, the which he spoiles, sacks, and burnes) led by Capit de Buch in Medoc, a Country in Bérudelais, a great and mighty Lord : who resignes them to his brother Philip of Nauarre. With these Forces he takes Clermont in Beauuoisin. On the other side Robert Knowles, a valiant English Capitaine, with a troop of theues, rather then souldiers, runs vp the riuier of Loire into the Country of Auxerre, spoiling, sacking, burning, and carrying away both men and beasts into his forts, bringing the Country to a miserable desolation. This was rather a robbing then a war, as commonly ciuill warres be : the which with more reason we may call vnciuill. The cattell taken, houses burnt, men being dead or beggered, the land remained desolate, vntilled and vnplowne. So as there fell so great a famine, as halfe the people died for hunger, lamentable troopes of poore families wandred vp and downe, creeping into townes, like desperate folkes, to beg bread of them which had it not.

The desolate estate of France.

The Parisians seeing that this alteration did nothing repaire their estates, grew mad : and as the common sort values no friendship but for their profit, they abated much of the loue and respect which in the beginning of their reduction they did beare vnto the Regent : who was not onely troubled to encounter armed men in field, but also with mens humors growne bitter by affliction, especially in Paris. A sea, subiect to the ebbing and flowing of mens sundry humors and affections.

The Parisians
mutine againe.

The Parisians (who was still watchfull to embrace all occasions to annoy the Regent) seeks meanes to nourish the seeds of his ancient credit with the Parisians, by some of his faction, giuing them to vnderstand by diuers writings spread abroad, that hee lamented to see France vndermined with this desolation, whereof the Regent was the originall cause. He sounded forth the vaine name of libertie and reformation of State, vexing the Regent more by his practices, then by open force, although he were supported by the succours of England. The Regent was thus perplexed with many difficulties, finding himselfe as it were besieged not onely within the wals, but also within the humours of this great City, being ignorant how to counterbalance force with mildnesse, in the perplexity of so many miseries, and the diuersity of such contrary humors, wherein hee fees himselfe ingaged.

Amidst all these difficulties, the wisdom and courage of this Prince is very considerable, for he seemed to the people of a resolute countenance, and in the managing of affaires hee had alwayes a care to their reliefe, so as they could not but loue him for his amiable and sweet behauiour, yet for the maintenance of his authority (being come within the City) he causeth some notable executions to be done, of certaine desperate and seditious men, and committed others to prison. This was done with the peoples liking, incensed against the Nauarrois : but seeing themselves to fall out of one mischief into another, the Parisians began to returne to their old waywardnesse. The Regent hauing works for both hands, encounters his enemy in field by force, and in the City by cloquence, causing the people to assemble at the Grene, sitting vpon that crosse which wee see this day. His tongue preuailed more then his souldiers armes, whereof we obserue no great successe : but his eloquence was so happy, as the people regarded it as an Oracle, giuing him the title of wise, hauing ioyned a wise cariage to his admirable eloquence : as appears in those goodly discourses.

The Dauphine executes some within Paris.

Three yeeres passed thus, during the imprisonment of our King Iohn, whom it know time to visit in England. Edward had caused Iohn to be conducted from London to the Castle of Windsor, with his sonne Philip. There he propounded vnto him new conditions of peace, not so rigorous as the former, but yet so hard, as (being deliuered to the Regent, and by him to the Estates then assembled at Paris) al the Kings good subsidies (though very desirous to redeeme him) did not allow thereof, for that they did import the honour of the King and Realme too much, making too preiudicial a breach in the Souerainety.

Conditions for the Kings deliuery not grated.

The extremities were notable in the Kings languishing, being a prisoner, and the present warre : but lest they should suffer all to runne to ruine, in so great a suspence of affaires, the Estates resolve to comfort the King by aduice, to attend another time for his liberty, and to labour by all meanes to maintain the warres.

The Provinces did their best endeouours to furnish money for this necessity : and euen Paris

Preparation to defend the Realme.

Paris promised to maintaine 600. Lances, 400. Archers, and 1000. Corselets, that is, 1000 foot armed with Brigandines, a kind of armour then much vied. The Nobility, notwithstanding their priuiledges, offered to contribute toward the charges, and restored the orders for martiall affaires, in a manner forgotten through the indulgency of our Kings. The Clergy shewed a notable zeal, and all those officers which had managed the publicke treasure made a great and extraordinary summe of money, by means whereof they were discharged from further accounts, and the Realme much eased. This prouision came happily for the preferuation of France, against the which Edward made then great preparation, on at the instance of the Nauarrois. The truce expired, hee did forbid the French to traffike into England: in the meane time his army lands at Calais, and himselfe followes in person with a goodly traine. Being landed and resolved to take possession of the Realme of France, or by force to ruine it, he marcheth directly to Arras, the which hee takes in 14 daies: hauing assured it with a strong garison, he goes towards Champagne, where passing onely, he besiegeth Sens, which yeeldes without resistance, and by their example Nevers. All Bourgongne was strooke into such a terror, as they redeemed their Country from spoile with a summe of money. Hauing thus found meanes to entertaine his army at his enemies charge, and enriched his souldiers with an insatiable booty, hee marcheth towards Paris, as the head City of the whole Realme, and the chiefe end of his designe, the certaine triumph of his conquest, and the goodly Theater of his victories. Our Regent was nothing amazed at these threats of Edward, for (having leaued a goodly armie with great expedition) he attends him at Paris, where the whole burthen of this warre did lie. He lodgeth his army in the suburbs, and fortifyeth against his approaches, being taught by the examples of his grandfather and father, not to hazard any thing, resolving onely to defend himselfe within his trenches. This resolution succeeded happily, for Edward seeing the impossibility to draw the Regent to fight (notwithstanding all his alarms) setteth his siege, and marcheth into Britany, to refresh his armie, to the great content of the Parisians, who could not sufficiently commend the wisdom of their Regent, hauing so politickly auoyded this storme. The Regent imbraceth this occasion, he furnished Paris with abundance of victuals, and commands the souldiers to liue orderly without oppression of the inhabitants: he fortifies the weakest places with all speed, & doth so incourage the people, as they are ready to sacrifice themselves for the preferuation of the State. Edward (supposing the great waste caused by the men of war resident in this great city, would haue taken from them all meanes to continue, and haue bred an impatience in the minds of this vnconstant people, giuing him the better meanes to enter it) hee returnes with his Army being strong and lusty, by this good refreshing of Britany. Being returned, he findeth things better ordered then before: so as pretailing nothing, but walking about the City, and beholding a far off the great towers, and the admirable masse of so many buildings, as a brieffe of the whole world, hee resolues to leaue the siege and returne no more. This experience teaching him, what the strength of our chiefe City was, he packes all vp, and goes towards Chartres, meaning to besiege it. But whilest hee lodged there, his Army making a horrible spoile of the whole Country, there chanced an occasion (as the word of heauen) which suddenly quailed his ambitious designe to ruine France, for beholding a horrible & extraordinary tempest of haile, thunder and lightning fall with such violence as many horses and men in the army perished, as if that God had stretched forth his hand from heauen to stay his course. This amazement causeth Edward to vow to make a peace with King John, and the Regent his son, vpon reasonable conditions. He which had thundered, did likewise open the Duke of Lancasters mouth; shewing how reasonable it was to limit humane attempts within restrained bounds: and not to attend an infinite and perpetual prosperity in worldly affaires, being more safe to content himselfe with a moderate successe, then to bee transported with the violent course of humane hopes, cast in the mould of indiscreet desires. He likewise layed before him the impossibility of extraordinary designe, as to make himselfe master of all France, a notable example for Princes to behold their owne infirmities, and the greatnesse of God to whom they owe the bottom of their enterprises: being then most happy, when they are most sober and temperate, without imagining an infinit power in the short weaknesse of this mortall life, where they are subiect like other men. This lesson mollified Edwards heart inclining to the deliury of King John his prisoner, and to a generall peace: the which was concluded at

The Articles.

At Breteigny, in the yeare 1360. the 8. day of May, vpon these conditions; That the Countrey of Poitou, the Fiefs of Thouars and Belleuue, the Countreys of Gacony, Agenois, Percegot, Limosin, Cahors, Tarbe, Bigor, Rouergne and Angoulmois, with the homages of the Signieuries lying in them; Monstruail vpon the sea, Ponthieu, Calais, Guines, Mers, Sangar, Bologne, Humes, Vales and Onis, should remaine in souerignty to the King of England. To whom moreover should be paid three millions of Crownes (euery two being worth an English Noble) that is to say 600000 ready downe, and 400000, the year following, and the rest within two next yeares after, at reasonable payments. And for this consideration, the said King of England, and the Prince of Wales his son, both for themselves and their successors, should renounce all rights pretended to the Crowne of France, the Duchy of Normandy, the countreys of Touraine, Aniou and Maine: the souerignty and homage of Britany, and the Earldome of Flanders, and within 3 weekes they should deliuer King John at Calais at their charge, the expences of the Kings house only excepted. For assurance of which agreement, there should bee deliuered into the King of Englands hands, these hostages: Lewis duke of Aniou, John duke of Berry, sons to the French King: Philip duke of Orleans, the Kings brother: Philip duke of Bourgongne, the Earles of Blois, Alanfon, Saint Pol, Harcourt, Porcian, Valentinois, Grandpre, Brenne, and Forest, the Lords of Vaudemont, Couilly, Pyennes, Saint Venant, Preaus, Montmorency, Garencieres, Rochequien, Estouteville, the Dauphin of Auvergne, Andrejel and Craon. A choise of well selected personages, to bee a sufficient caution for the money and conditions that were to be performed. The deputies for King John, were John of Dourmans Bishop of Beauuois, and Chancellor of France, John of Melun Earle of Tancarville: the Lord of Bouciquart Marshall of France: the Lords of Montmorency & Vigny: John Groslee, Simon of Boffly, John Marets Lawiers, and John Maillard, and Stephen of Paris, Bourges of Paris. For the King of England were, John Duke of Lancaster, the Earles of Northampton, Warwick & Suffolke, Renauld of Celestin, Gualter of Mauny, Knights, with certaine learned men for their counsell. This treaty of a generall peace, signed by the two Kings, was ratified by their two eldest sons, Charles & Edward, and proclaimed by Heralds: first at the windowes of the Kings & Princes lodgings, and then at the corners of the streets in great solemnity. The hostages were deliuered to Edward the father, who imbarqued at Homsleur, and led them into England, leauing the Earle of Warwick in France, to see the execution of the peace.

King John (hauing long expected the time of his deliury) parts from England with a strong guard, and is conducted to Calais, attending the money promised, the first pawne of his liberty. The Regent his sonne labours earnestly: the City of Paris did contribute willingly a hundred thousand Royalls, and after their example all other Cities payed the portions. Of such power is our head City both to do good and euill: so by this they made amends for all former errors. The money is brought to Saint Omer, whither the Regent comes to see the deliury: Edward returnes to Calais, he is wonderfully kinde to John, and they sweare a league of friendship, and comprehended Charles King of Nauarre (being absent) in this peace; his brother Philip undertaking for him, to the end that all quarrells might be troden vnder foot, and all men liue in peace, vinity and concord. So John being set at liberty, after a languishing imprisonment of foure yeares, he takes his leaue of Edward with all the shewes of loue that might bee betwixt brethren and confident friends.

Being parted from Calais, hee finds his sonne Charles comming to meet him, with a great and stately traine. I cannot well expresse the ioy of this first encounter: this good King embracing his sonne (as his redeemer) with ioy mixt with teares, and full of fatherly affection, with the content of his sweet recovered liberty, seeing himselfe in his sons armes, who had giuen him so many testimonies of his faithfull loue in his necessity, and set in the middle of his subiects with his first authority, depending no more vpon anothers will. And contrariwise, what ioy was it for this wife sonne to enioy his father, so precious a gage of the authority, order and obedience of a State, and a great discharge for him of this painfull burthen.

Thus discourfing of what had beene done during his imprisonment, and of what was to be done, they ariue at Hedin: whither not onely the whole Countrey repaires, but also the Deputies of Paris, and of all the prouinces of the Realme, to congratulate their good good Kings delivery, where hee disposed of the government of his house.

The King of Nauarre meets him at Champagne, hauing first sent backe his hostages, to shew that he relied only on his word, and put himselfe into his power. Thus passeth the world; and after a storme comes a calme. King John made his entry into Paris with this goodly traine, being receiued with an incredible ioy of all his subiects. The Parisians going to kisse his hands, offer him their hearts, with a goodly cubbord of plate, worth 1000 markes, for homage of their fidelity and obedience.

The Parliament had surceased aboue a whole year: John, for the first fruits of his recovered authority, would honour the opening of the Court with his presence: being in the seat of Iustice, in the midst of all his officers, to the incredible content of all men who beheld the cheerfull countenance of this Prince, like the Sun-beames after a troubled skie. Such was the returne of King John into his Realme after his imprisonment, as the Catastrophe of a Comedy, in the which after mourning they reioyce. This hapned the beginning of the year 1361.

Some moneths were spent in these publike ioyes, but they must seeke to recover their hostages in the effecting whereof, they found many difficulties: for neither the priuie Lords (whose homage he had bound to the King of England,) nor the countries (whose fouerainties he had yielded by this accord) would obey. They argue with the King in Councell, and demand an act, shewing, that the King cannot dispose of the fouerainty of his Realme, no alienate the reuenues of the Crowne. John on the other side (feareless Edward should reproach this vnto him, as a practice betwixt him and his subiects) made them sundry commandements to obey. He went to Auignon, to visit Pope Innocent, who died at this time, and Urban the sixth succeeded in his place, both Limosins. He hailell John recovered liberty, and to ease him minde, afflicted with long imprisonment, Urban exhorts him to vndertake the voyage of the holy Land, as generall of the action. John (not remembering the examples of Kings his predecessors, Lewis the seventh, and ninth, nor apprehending the present burthen of his great affaires; nor the danger of so mighty and watchfull an enemy, who had so long, and with so great paine kept him prisoner) accepts the charge, and makes a solempne promise: and to hasten the execution thereof, hee returnes into England. Some say, the loue of the Countesse of Salisbury (whose husband had the guard of the King being a prisoner) was the principall motive of his returne. The which I cannot beleue vpon the report of the English: being vniuersally that his age, his afflictions, his great affaires, and the voyage whereunto hee prepared, should suffer this Prince to follow so vnseasonable a vanity. But whatsoever moued him therunto, he dyed there, leauing his life in England, where had so long languished, the preface of his death.

Thus John dyed in England, in the year 1364. the eight day of Aprill, leauing Charles his eldest sonne heire to the Crowne of France. A good man he was, but an vnfortunate Prince; wise in ordinary things, but ill aduised in great affaires: iust to all men, but too wary how or whom he trusted in matters of consequence: temperate in priuate, but too violent in publike. To conclude, a good Prince, but not considerate: more fit to obey than to command. Truly these heroicke vertues are the proper Jewels of Crownes, and wisdom is a companion to the most excellent vertues, especially in Princes, who are vnto the Theater of mans life, to gouerne the rest.

We haue noted that Bourgongne had bene giuen to Robert the grand-child of Henry Capet for his portion. A little before the decease of King John, it was vnto the crown of France by the death of Duke Philip, a yong man of the age of fifteene yeares, sonne to that John which died in the battell of Murais. He was bequeathed to the heire of Flanders, but both the Duchy, and the daughter were for another Philip, the sonne of John: to whom the father gaue this new succession, in recompence of the faithfull seruice he had done him the day of his taking, and had continued it in prison.

CHARLES the Fifth, called the Wise,

The 52. French King.

HIS Charles, during the life of his father John, had giuen so many testimonies of his sufficiency to gouerne well, that hee was held for King before hee tooke the Crown, the which he receiued at Rheims the 19 of May 1364, hauing before his coronation provided honorably for his fathers funerals.

Hee reigned fixteene yeares, being called and knowne by the name of Wise. In his youth he did taste the bitter rootes, and in his age the sweet fruits of vertue, beloued, honoured, feared, and respected, both of his owne subiects, and of strangers. A deuout Prince, wife, temperate, chaste, vigilant, louing Iustice, order, and the people, hauing as great authority as any Prince that euer reigned ouer this Monarchie, accompanied with other vertues fit for those times, to preferre a State, the which had more need of counsell then of force, too ventrourly hazarded by his Grand-father and father. He was well assisted by the Princes of his blood, and the officers of the Crowne: very wished and worthy aduantages for a King, who being the head of an Estate, ought to be well serued by the principall members, to guide and gouerne the whole body.

We haue said, that he had three brethren: Lewis Duke of Aniou, John Duke of Berry, and Philip Earle of Touraine: to whom according to his fathers testament, hee resigned the Duchy of Bourgongne, with a marriage of great aduancement. He gaue to Lewis the Duchy of Orleans, and to John he gaue Auvergne, Poitou and Xaintonge, (besides Berry) for his portion, and Languedoc for his gouernment. He was likewise well serued for Military actions, by Bertrand of Guesclin a Britton, an excellent Captain, whom he honored with the dignity of Constable, in the place of Mauriel de Fierres (hauing disposed him for sundry crimes) and for affaires of the State, he had John Dourmans bishop of Beauuois, and Chancellor of France, and in the end Cardinall, whom his brother succeeded in the same charge. With these helps of counsell and force, hee soone restored the Realme, being distressed by the strange confusions of the forepassed reignes. In his youth (during these former broiles) he was poisoned by the practices of the Nauarrois, of whom we haue so often spoken. This was prevented by counterpoisons, yet left it a great infirmity in his body, the which forced him to a quiet life, more profitable both for himselfe and his whole Realme, then if hee had bene a man of action: for hee dispatched affaires in his closet without danger, and incourted his enemies with a happy successe.

In the beginning of his reigne, hee married with Joane the daughter of Charles Duke of Bourbon: a Princesse of excellent beauty: the which he preferred before the great wealth of the heire of Flanders, and the benefit of his owne Realme: he had three sonnes and one daughter. In the former reigne there was nothing but war, desolation, teares, cries, lamentations, despaire, and generally the mournfull image of death. After these long and insupportable calamities, the wisdom of Charles (reducing things to their first beginning, by his happy dexterities) gaue France a new forme: like vnto a man who hauing a long and dangerous sicknesse, recouers himselfe by careful keeping. But there remained an insupportable number of men accustomed to liue dissolutely, through the licentiousness of the war, the which if hee had sought to reforme by any good order, it had bred some tumult in the State, according to the violent and head-strong or restless humour of the French, who must be doing at home, if they be not employed abroad.

The English provided worke for these warriors, in Britany, in Flanders, in the heart of France, and in Castile: but the wisdom of Charles prevented all. I will note what happened, rather according to the subiect, then the order of times, for that matters are so con-

Preparation to defend the Realme.

Edward enters France with an army.

He besiegeth Paris, but in vaine.

Edward amazed with a thunder, resolves to conclude a peace with King Iohn.

A peace concluded at Breteigny.

Paris promised to maintaine 600. Lances, 400. Archers, and 1000. Corsiclers, that is, 1000. A foot armed with Brigandines, a kind of armour then much vled. The Nobility, notwithstanding their priuiledges, offered to contribute toward the charges, and restored the orders for martiall affaires, in a manner forgotten through the indulgency of our Kings. The Clergy shewed a notable zeale, and all those officers which had managed the publike treasure made a great and extraordinary summe of money, by meanes whereof they were discharged from further accounts, and the Realme much eased. This prouision came happily for the prerseruacion of France, against the which Edward made then great preparation at the instance of the Nauarrois. The truce expired, hee did forbid the French to traficke into England: in the meane time his army lands at Calais, and himselfe followes in person with a goodly traine. Being landed and resolved to take possession of the Realme of France, or by force to ruine it, he marcheth directly to Arras, the which hee takes in 3. daies: hauing assured it with a strong garison, he goes towards Champagne, where passing onely, he besiegeth Sens, which yeeldes without resistance, and by their example Nevers. All Bourgongne was strooke into such a terrour, as they redeemed their Country from spoile with a summe of money. Hauing thus found meanes to entertaine his army at his enemies charge, and enriched his souldiers with an inestimable booty, hee marcheth towards Paris, as the head City of the whole Realme, and the chiefe end of his designe, the certaine triumph of his conquest, and the goodly Theater of his victories. Our Regent was nothing amazed at these threats of Edward, for (hauing leauied a goodly armie with great expedition) he attends him at Paris, where the whole burthen of this warre did lye. He lodgeth his army in the suburbs, and fortifyeth against his approaches, being taught by the examples of his grandfather and father, not to hazard any thing, resolving onely to defend himselfe within his trenches. This resolution succeeded happily, for Edward seeing the impossibility to draw the Regent to fight (notwithstanding all his alarms) raiseth his siege, and marcheth into Britany, to refresh his armie, to the great content of the Parisians, who could not sufficiently commend the wisdom of their Regent, hauing so politickly auoyded this storme. The Regent imbraceth this occasion, he furnished Paris with abundance of victuals, and commands the souldiers to liue orderly without oppression of the inhabitants: he fortifies the weakest places with all speed, & doth so encourage the people, as they are ready to sacrifice themselves for the prerseruacion of the State. Edward (supposing the great waste caused by the men of war resident in this great city, would haue taken from them all meanes to continue, and haue bred an impatiency in the mindes of this vnconstant people, giuing him the better meanes to enter it) hee returnes with his Army being strong and lusty, by this good refreshing of Britany. Being returned, he finds things better ordered then before: so as preuailing nothing, but walking about the City, and beholding a far off the great towers, and the admirable masse of so many buildings, as a bricfe of the whole world, hee resolues to leaue the siege and returne no more. Thus experience teaching him, what the strength of our chiefe City was, he packes all vp, and goes towards Chartres, meaning to besiege it. But whilst hee lodged there, his Army making a horrible spoile of the whole Country, there chanced an occasion (as the worke of heauen) which suddenly quailed his ambitious designe to ruine France, for behold a horrible & extraordinary tempest of haile, thunder and lightning fells with such violence, as many horses and men in the army perished, as if that God had stretched forth his hand, from heauen to stay his course. This amazement causeth Edward to vow to make a peace with King Iohn, and the Regent his son, vpon reasonable conditions. He which had thus thundered, did likewise open the Duke of Lancasters mouth; shewing how reasonable it was to limit humane attempts within restrained bounds: and not to attend an infinit and perpetuall prosperitie in worldly affaires, being more safe to content himselfe with a mean successe, then to bee transported with the violent course of humane hopes, cast in the mould of indiscreet desires. He likewise layed before him the impossibility of so extraordinary a designe, as to make himselfe master of all France, a notable example for Princes to, binydary their owne infirmities, and the greatnesse of God to whom they owe the homage of their enterprises: being then most happy, when they are most sober and temperate, without imagining an infinit power in the short weaknesse of this mortal life, whereunto they are subiect like other men. This lesson mollified Edwards heart inclining to the deliuey of King Iohn his prisoner, and to a generall peace: the which was concluded at Breteigny,

This was prevented by counterpoisons, yet left it a great infirmity in his body, the which forced him to a quiet life, more profitable both for himselfe and his whole Realme, then if hee had bene a man of action: for hee dispatched affaires in his closet without danger, and incountred his enemies with a happy successe.

He augmented his brethrens portions.

In the beginning of his reign, hee married with Isabe the daughter of Charles Duke of Bourbon: a Princesse of excellent beauty: the which he preferred before the great wealth of the heire of Flanders, and the benefit of his owne Realme: he had three sonnes and one daughter. In the former reign there was nothing but war, desolation, teares, cries, lamentations, despaire, and generally the mournfull image of death. After these long and insupportable calamities, the wisdom of Charles (reducing things to their first beginning, by his happy dexterities) gaue France a new forme: like vnto a man who hauing a long and dangerous sickness, recouers himselfe by careful keeping. But there remained an infinit number of men accustomed to liue dissolutely, through the licentiousness of the war, the which if hee had sought to reforme by any good order, it had bred some tumult in the State, according to the violent and head-strong or restless humour of the French, who must be doing at home, if they be not employed abroad.

His marriages &amp; his children.

The English provided worke for these warriors in Britany, in Flanders, in the heart of France, and in Castile: but the wisdom of Charles prevented all. I will note what happened, rather according to the subiect, then the order of times; for that matters are so confused, as I cannot represent the dates distinctly, without repetition and tediousness. Britany was the first hit to try our men of war: there might they make war without breach of truce, and the quarrell betwixt Charles of Blois, and John of Montfort, continued more violent then before: for that John of Montfort had married the daughter of the King of England, and Lewis Duke of Anjou, the daughter of Charles of Blois, who imbraced their private quarrels, by these new occasions.

Bertrand of Guecllin a Gentleman of Britany (of whom we haue before made mention) had done the King good seruice, during the war with the Neuarrois. Charles relying vpon his fidelity and valor, giues him the charge of the war, to assist Charles of Blois, being old and broken; who was pressed by his enemy, being supported with Forces from England. Guecllin being aided, the Nobility of Britany (which were of Charles his faction) repaire vnto him, to the number of 1500. lances. The History names the houses Rohan, Laual, Leon, Dinan, Rieux, Chateau-Briand, Tourne-mire, Raiz, Malefroit, Quintin, Auagour, Lohcaz, Ancenis, Pont, and many others.

This notable occasion was ministred to employ these Forces (seeing that Joane the heire, the Duchesse of Britany, would not end this controuersie by composition, as her husband Charles of Blois desired.) John of Montfort besieged the Castle of Aulroy, well defended by the contrary faction. John Chandois an Englishman, a wife and well experienced captain, commanded the English troops. He had an aduersary in front, no lesse valiant then himselfe, Guecllin, who fought for his Countie, and the despair of Charles of Blois (much grieved with the tediousnesse of so painfull a proccesse,) was a new spurre to animate him to fight. They ioyne with their troops, the encounter is furious, well charged, well defended. The two commanders made great prooffe of their valour. Guecllin and Cliffon are noted to haue omitted nothing of their duties: but God, who holds victories in his hand, gaue it to John of Montfort, and the English Army. The overthrow was great, for Charles of Blois, (the head of the army) with John his bastard brother, the Lords of Dinan, Auagour, Lohcaz, Malefroit, Pont, Quergourlay, and many others were slaine: the Lords of Rohan, Leon, Raiz, Mauny, Tonerre, Rouille, Frainville, Reneual, and Rochfort, were taken prisoners, and so were John and Guy the sonnes of Charles of Blois, with Bertrand of Guecllin, the which did greatly preiudice our Kings reputation. The place of battell, the engines, and the dead bodies, remained in the power of John of Montfort, who sent the body of Charles of Blois, with an honorable conveyoy to his widow. The Castle of Aulroy (the cause of this battell) yielded to the conqueror. This happned the 29. of September, 1364.

This great defeat troubled Charles, as a thing beyond his expectation. John of Montfort sends his ambassadors, beseeching him (as his Soueraigne) to receiue homage of him and his for the Duchy of Britany, won by rightfull armes, by the defeat of his enemy, as God adiudging vnto him this right and possession.

Charles imbraceth this occasion: hee assignes him a day for the performance thereof, and to do right and iustice to both parties being heard, the widow of Charles of Blois being called, and the matter debated, he reconciles them vpon these conditions: That for the interest which Joane pretended for her and hers, to the Duchy of Britanie, he should haue the Earldome of Ponthiue, the Seigneuries of Auagour, Guello, Gincamp, Rochedorie, Lannou, Chasteaulin in Cornuaille, Duall, Vbelgost and Rospreden, to the value of twenty thousand liuers or frankes of rent: and if John of Montfort died without lawfull heires, the Duchy of Britanie should returne to Joane and her issue male or female.

This accord drew John of Montfort to Paris, where hauing done his fealty and homage, as well for the Duchy of Britanie, as the Earldome of Montfort, and other lands he had in France, the widow of Charles of Blois ratified it by vertue of the decree. Oliver of Cliffon at the same Treatie was restored to the possession of his lands, forfeited when his father was beheaded, (as wee haue said.) Hee shall bee Constable, and giue vs good cause to speake of his life.

This accord was made in the towne of Guerande, in the yeare 1365. but it continued not long. for Lewis of Anjou the Kings brother, (son in law to the Duchesse of Britanie) was not pleased with this agreement, whereby he said he was greatly wronged, & John of Montfort distrusting king Charles, had his recourse to the King of England, to whom he went in person, to require aid against the forces which he pretended would come against him: leaving Robert Knowles an Englishman in Britany, who not attending John's returne, began to make war vpon the French, with all violence. Charles being pressed (both by the

A Duchesse Joane, and by Lewis of Anjou his brother) declares John guilty of high treason: for that he had broken the accord, and would not appeare vpon sundry summons dayly made vnto him. So the war began againe: the successe whereof we will note hereafter. Thus there passed six or seven yeares, with variety of accidents in Britanie.

Whilst that Britanie was thus shaken with sundry stormes, Flanders was not without trouble, by the accustomed practices of the English. Lewis Earle of Flanders, son to that Lewis which was slaine at the battell of Cressie, had one only daughter named Marguerit, who remaining heire of this great and rich estate, was the leuaine of the ancient iealousie betwixt the two Kings Charles and Edward, strutting who should haue her.

B The Cities of Flanders, of greatest power in this pursuite, held stoutly for the English, Count Lewis father to the maid, was in suspence: fearing both the English & the French, for diuers respects: and yet he loued the first, and feared the last: but in the end, by the meanes of Marguerite of Arthois, mother to the Earle, a mariage was concluded in fauor of Philip the Hardy, brother to Charles the French King, to Edward's great grieffe, both father and sonne, who in disdain of this refusal, fought all meanes to breed new troubles in France.

The Treatie of Bretigny ministred a new subiect, and apparent cause of discontent to the King of England, who complained that he had beene deceiued by Charles, vnder a shew of faithfullnesse, hauing restored vnto him all his hostages, receiuing onely the sums promised for the ranfome, leauing vpon his simple word, the reuenues of those Seigneuries granted him by the treaty.

Charles had retired all his hostages, in good time paying ready money: and making knowne vnto Edward, the sundry charges he had giuen to the Countiees and places comprehended in the treatie, to yeeld themselves wholly into his power: he likewise signified vnto him his subiects answers, who in the beginning excused themselves ciuilly, by honest delays, but in the end the generall Estates giue Charles to vnderstand, That the question being for the generall interest of the States, they were not to be forced to yeeld to an unlawfull action, directly contrary to the fundamētall Law of the Realm, which suffers not the King to preiudice the Crowne; nor to alienate the reuenues thereof, which were not to be alienated. D That this accord made in prison, for the Kings redemption, was forced, and so by consequence, vnciuill, and not to be allowed by the Law of Nations.

The effects followed this resolution, with such an obstinacie of the Countiees, Cities and Noblemen, which were charged by this treatie to yeeld, as they protest freely to Charles, that they will willingly spend goods and liues, rather then fall into the King of Englands hands: and contrariwise, would employ all their meanes to liue vnder the subiection of the king of France. This faithful constancy of the interessed subiects, muft needs be pleasing vnto Charles: but for that he himselfe had made this treaty, his honour was greatly engaged, the which he muft iustifie by good and auailable reasons: and make it knowne vnto all Europe, who had their eyes fixed vpon these two Princes, playing their parts vpon so famous a Theater. Edward complains by a solemne Ambassage to the Emperor Charles the 4. who took the paines to come into France, with an intent to employ his authority & counsell to reconcile these two Princes: but it was in vaine. The cause of this fruitlesse paine, proceeded from Edward, being resolute to haue his part tryed by armes, being emboldned by his victorious successe in the former reignes.

Charles had alwaies protested to obserue the treaty of Bretigny inuiolable. But hauing vnderstood the generall resolution of the States, and of the countiees & Noblemen, interested by the said Treaty, he resolues to protect them: and hauing excused himselfe both to the Emperor and foraine Princes, by a publike declaration, hee sends a Gentleman of Bouffle called Chappeneau, to the Prince of Wales being at Bourdeaux, summoning him to appeare before him at Paris, at the instance of the Nobility and commons of Guienne, complaining of him. He also sent a Herald to the king of England, to proclaim war against him. The Earle of Armagnac, the Lord of Albret (who had newly married Isabel of Bourbon, and by this alliance was become French) the Earles of Perigot, Cominges, and Carmaigne: the Lords of Barde, Condon, Pinconer, Pardailan and Agenois, began this protestation against the king of England, followed by all those Provinces, professing for the Crowne of France. At this example all the townes of the Countie of Ponthiue, yielded to Guy Earle of S. Pol, and to Guy of Chastillon Master of the Croffe-bowes.

The successe of the French army in Guienne.The exploits of the Prince of Wales.

Then the Kings armies march into diuers parts, vnder the commands of the Dukes of Anjou and Berry; and the Constable Guesclin, to whose wisdome, (and especially to the Chancellor Dourmans) they attribute the obedience of the people of Guienne, discretely practised by them. Limoges and Cahors yeeld at the sight of the Kings armie. Castar, Bergerac, S. Seuer, and in the end Rochel by siege; and by the successe of these Cities (reduced to the Kings obedience by force) S. Ian d'Angely, Angouleme, Xaintes, Fontenay, Parthenay, and many other townes obey voluntarily. The fortresses of Mortaigne, Lusignan and Sanzay, are added to this conquest, and in the end Tours stretcheth forth her hands to the King, and shakes off the English yoke. Whilest the Kings armie performed these happy exploits in Guienne: the Prince of Wales (a hardy and generous warrior) to turne aside this deluge, (the which he fees filling vpon the Country of Bourdeaux) resolves to enter by another quarter, which (fearing no enemy) should be found without defence. Hauiug made a flying campe of English and Gascons, well armed, hee slips into Auergne, from thence into Bourbonnois and Berry: where hauing refreshed his troopes some dayes, hee passeth into Foret; and gathering together the boates vpon the Riuer of Loire, hee passeth ouer at Marigny of Nunnes, and crossing Malconnois, hee comes into Bourgogne: where finding all desert without victuals, (all being caried into walled Townes, by the care of Philip the Kings brother,) he marcheth into Auxerrois, and from thence into Gassinois: in the end hee Bayes before Elpernay, with an armie of twenty thousand men, which terrifies the whole country, and takes the Towne easily, being not releued.

Charles recalls his army out of Guienne, giuing the Constable Guesclin commission to stop this frame, the which he executes so happily, as all this cloud was presently dispersed: so as the Prince of Wales could hardly retire himselfe to Bourdeaux, nor laden with spoiles as in former times, but with shame and losse.

This was the successe of the first passage the English made through France. But what is become of our Nauarrois? Wee haue obserued how hee made his peace with King John, when as he returned from prison. He thence retired himselfe quietly into his Realme of Nauarre, dissembling his ialousie, and watching all opportunities to crosse the affaires of Charles, who spared him with so great respect. The needernes of Bourdeaux was a fit meane for him to continue his practices with the English vnder-hand: although by meanes of the Queenes, he entertained a shew of friendship with Charles his brother in law.

Castile ministred matter of employment for our warriors, with a very notable successe. Peter King of Castile, sonne to Alphonso (making great profession of loue to the French) married Blanche the daughter of Peter Duke of Bourbon, and sister to Joane the wife of our Charles the Wife, and so brother in law to the King. Whilest the Castilian loued his wife, the alliance and friendship of our King was his greatest honour: but abandoning himselfe to a trumpet named Padille, hee forooke all duty to his Wife, left France, and linckt himselfe with the English, against his sworne faith to his allies. To this treachery hee adds the murder of his wife, and a cruell tyranny against his subiects.

These execrable proceedings procured the wrath of God against him, with the hatred both of great and small, which drew him headlong to his ruine. Alphonso his father making him his heire and successor of his realme of Castile, had bequeathed a legacy by testament to Henry his bastard sonne, a vertuous man, that is to say, as lawfull by his vertue, as Peter was growne degenerate by his vices: and as greatly beloued of the people, as Peter was hated in generall by reason of his abominable life. Hee spoiled Henry his brother of this legacie, the which his father had left him: but thinking to take from another, he lost his owne. For Henry thus ill intreated, flies to Pope Vrbans, then resident at Auignon, beseeching him to vse his authority by admonitions to his brother, advising him to restore that which his father had giuen him. Vrbans inclining to his iust request, cites them both to appeare before the Conffitory, to draw them to their duties: Peter not onely refuseth to obey the Pope, but doth outrage to his Nuncio. Henry thus repulsed, repaires to Charles, by the meanes of Peter of Bourbon, brother to the Queene of Castile, whom her husband Peter had murdered. The indignitie of this fact procured Henry great succours from King Charles, euen at such a time as he wanted worke for his men of war. The command of this army was giuen to Peter of Bourbon a Prince of the blood, with the counsell and direction of the Constable Guesclin, who also bare the name, as he tooke the greatest pains. and behended.

The army is leaued in Languedoe by the kings command, and the exceeding care of the Duke of Berry Governour of that Country, to the incredible joy of many voluntaries, who went cheerfully to so iust a warre: the successe was both happy and speedy. Suddenly as the French army appeared for the succour of Henry, all the Castilians repelt against Peter, who with great difficulty saues himselfe with his concubine and three daughters he had by her, and one onely seruant, carying nothing with him but a little ready money, and the misery of a dispossessed Prince.

This his calamity did not moue the Prince of Wales to compassion, and then his father Edward, commanding his sonne to succour him with all his forces; the which hee performed speedily with a goodly army, meaning to crosse the designs of our Charles: but (on the patience of God, which giues a sinner so long a time of repentance, that in the end (without any excuse) he might pay both the principall and interest) the successe of this English army was such, in fauour of Peter of Castile, as hauing vanquished the French army, by a notable defeat of foue and twenty thousand men; taken Guesclin the Constable, Arnaud of Andreghen Marshall of France, and many other great men prisoners, Peter was restored to the possession of his Realme, and Henry dispossessed, who escaped hardly in this great danger, and retires himselfe into Languedoe, to John Duke of Berry the Kings brother, and Governour of that Country. But after this gracious assistance of Gods mercy, his iustice must take place, as it did against Peter by this meanes, Henry being courtously received by the Pope and the Duke of Berry; and the Constable Guesclin set at liberty with all his companions, hauing payed their ransomes to the Prince of Wales, he recouers a second ayd by the bounty of our wife Charles, and the diligence of the Duke of Berry, to attempt anew the recovery of the Realme of Castile. The Constable Guesclin was appointed to this charge, to withstand the first checke, if it were possible. The euent answered the proiect, and by an admirable meanes, the which ruined Peter through his owne folly.

This tyrant (growne proud by the wishfull successe of the English forces) makes no regard to satisfie the Prince of Wales for the charges of this warre (although the successe were for his good) but busying himselfe to take reuenge on such as had risen against him, he contemned such as had succoured him: yea treading all piety vnder foot, hee allied himselfe with the King of Belle-marine a Sarazin, (and marrying his daughter) hee abjured the Christian Religion, holding the neighbourhood of so mighty a King, to be more certaine and profitable, then all the forces of England. But it fell out contrary to his conceit, for Henry assisted by the Constable Guesclin, and the French Forces, hauing wonne five battels against Peter, in the end he was quite defeated and taken prisoner.

Hauing him in his power, at the Castilians suite (wonderfully incensed against this tyrant) hee caused his head to be cut off, reaping the fruits of his impiety, the which made him to forsake the true religion: of his vanity, trusting to a rotten plancke, with the losse of his conscience; and of his exceeding cruely, hauing murdered his wife, tyrannized ouer his subjects, and spoyled his brother of his Estate against all right. Hee that writes the History of Spaine, reports that hee was slaine by his brother Duke Henry in Guesclin Tent, being come out of Montiel vpon his assurance. An excellent lesson for all men, especially for great Princes, not to dally with God, who punisheth heynous crimes with heynous punishments euen in this life, attending the euertlasting paine in the life to come.

Charles King of Nauarre was much perplexed, seeing himselfe betwixt two armies, for desiring to be a neuter, and to please both, he knew not how to gouerne himselfe. He seeks to entertaine both Charles and Edward, although hee were more engaged to the English, and could not well trust his brother in law, hauing greatly offended him. So he lets the English armie to passe through his dominions when it marched into Castile, to succour Peter, and suffered himselfe to be taken prisoner by Oliver of Mauny, a Gentleman of Britaine, who led him into Castile, to make the English think he had bene forsworn; and the French, that he did willingly employ himselfe for them, being in their troopes.

A miserable hypocritie, which of a master makes himselfe a slave, who might haue bene one of the chiefe of the army, without this wretched dissembling. The good and wise King, taught by the example of his father John, that an Ele is lost by ouer-gripping it, desired onely to pacifie his brother in law, although hee were well acquainted with his bad disposition, and the practices he continued with England. So he gaue him a safe conduct to come vnto him, and restored vnto him Mantes and Meulan, and the free possession of his lands in Normandy: but this Prince fraught with malice, could not bee reclaimed, neither by the Kings prosperity, nor by his clemency: for (not trusting him) hee returns to his Realme of Nauarre, where he continues his old practices with the English: he helps the Britton with men out of Normandy, and attempted against the Kings person, seeking to poyson him by Jaquet Rue and Petr of Terre, his domestical servants: who were executed, and the Nauarrais places seized on, as guilty of high treason. Thus Charles was forced to fight against his owne blood, and to haue the malice of his kinsmen and allies. No small combat for a great Prince.

The death of both Edwards.

We haue discoursed at large of the valour and happy success both of Edward the third King of England, and of Edward his sonne Prince of Wales. But as humane things are not durable, so there chanced a great accident vpon his returne from the warre of Castile, which brought them both to the graue. The Prince of Wales finding himselfe threatened with a droopie, passed from Bourdeaux into England, to take the ayre of his native country, but he died soon after his arrival, the 46 yeare of his age. A Prince of great hope, not only lamented of his friends, but commended of his enemies. Edward the father, seeing his right arme (as it were) cut off, died for griefe: leaving Richard the sonne of his sonne Edward in his place, who was received (without any question made by his vncles) as the first by right of succession.

The English
second passage through France.

Richard (not to degenerate from the example of his grandfather and father, being crowned King) vnder takes a warre in France: whether he sends a goodly army vnder the command of the Duke of Clarence his vncle, who (having landed at Calais) passeth the Riuer of Somme at Clery neere vnto Peronne, and bending towards Soisson, hee crosseth the Riuer of Oise and Ain. Then marching towards Chaalons, hee passeth Marne, and shewing himselfe before Troyes in Champagne, hee spoiles the Country, and so goeth ouer Seine, betwixt Ville-neufue and Souley, and bending towards Beaulieu and Gastoins hee crosseth into Britany, thereto reuiue the warre in fauour of Iohn of Montfort, spoyling the Country with a strange desolation. On the other side there lands another army at Bourdeaux, the which hauing entred the Country, fortified such places as held for the English, to nourish the seeds of this new warre. In the Country of Guenaudan (a diocesse in that large Prouince of Languedoc) there was a Castle neere to Mande named Randon, whereas the English maintained a strong garison, a retreat for theuees, which did infinite harme in the country. The country hauing sued vnto the King, to free them of this emburance, he granted them Gusclin the Constable, a man of great reputation, but the armie should be defrayed at their charges. Hee comes into Languedoc, besiegeth Randon, and brings them to the last extremity, but as the besieged (not able to hold out) were entered into composition, beheld the Constable (sicke to the death) yeelds vp the ghost. At the same instant the place was yeelded vnto the King: so as in signe that the honour of this prize was due to Gusclin, the Capitaine caried the keyes of the Castle vpon his herts. Thus died Gusclin, leauing an honourable testimony of his valour and loyalty: and to Charles an extreame sorrow for his death, who honoured him with a notable Obsequy, causing his body to be interred with the Kings at Saint Denis: and at the foot of his owne Tombe was that of Gusclin, with a burning lampe, maintained by foundation, called the Lampe of Gusclin vnto this day. King Charles had giuen all Bourgongne to his brother Philip for his portion, according to the will of his father Iohn, as we haue said, and had married him with Marguerite the rich heiress of Flanders. Being in possession of Bourgongne, there hapned another occasion in Flanders, which won him great credit with those people whom he should command after the death of Lewis his father in law, who was yet liuing.

Troubles in Flanders pacified by Philip.

The inhabitants of Gand, a malicious people by nature, who neuer want matter to mutine, had then a great discontent, both against their Earle in generally, (by reason of some new impositions) and against them of Bruges, in particular (jealous to see them in so great fauour with their Prince) by reason of a channell which they had drawne from the Riuer of Lis, for the commodity of the Country: which Riuer crossing the Riuer of Gand, the Gantois supposed it was all theirs in proper: so as none else might vse it without their liking. This lealousie grew so great, that this great City (as big with their wayward and contentious humors, as it was populous and rich) being thus moued, resolves to make shew thereof: and in this fury they make a league, and choose a head, bearing a marke or token of their faction, and from words they goe to blowes. One called Leon (a bold praefier of popular seditions) was found fit to be the Ring-leader of this tumult: their marke was a white cap for all the rooqe. These Gantois gather together, they hinder the work of this channell, and the gathering of the custome, being the cause of this quarrell: they kill Collectors and Receiueurs, and in the end the Gouernor of the City called Roger, who being there for the Earle, laboured to teach them their duties. Their fury exceeded so far, as they spoile the Earles Palace, fire it, and in their rage pull it downe to the ground. They runne in great troopes to other townes, to draw them to their league. They besiege Ypre, held by the Earles men, crying in all places, Liberty, as hauing a meaning to change their Lord, and then to seize vpon Flanders. This cruell disorder amazed the Earle, when as beheld Philip Duke of Bourgongne, his sonne in law, flies vnto him to quench this fire: and as men admire rather the Sunne rising then setting, and that the name of the House of France, and the greatnesse of his goodly portion gaue him great authority: so it chanced that he pacified this rebellion, to the content both of the Earle and Cities, taking a happy possession of this great inheritance, by a famous and profitable occasion. But Flanders alone was not subiect to these mad mutinies: for those of Montpellier, newly reduced to the obedience of our King, grew into so great a fury, as they slue James Pontet a Knight of the Order, and Chancellor to Iohn Duke of Berry, Gouernor of the Country, Guy of Scery Seneschall of Rouergue, Arnald of Montclair, Gouernour of the said City, and other officers of the Kings and Dukes, to the number of fourescore, and cast their bodies into a well. As the outrage was odious, so the punishment was memorable. The Duke of Berry comes with his forces, assisted by the whole Prouince, detestful so foule an infolency, so as the inhabitants (calling to mind their audacious frenzy) resolve to submit themselves to punishment, and not to stand desperately against force.

Montpellier.

The Consuls of the City hauing halters about their neckes, and torne clothes, the keyes of the Citie in one hand, and a red cap (the marke of their office) in the other, met with the Duke their Gouernor, being followed by the Clergy (carying a Crosse) all crying for mercy, and weeping with a lamentable noise.

In this mournfull sort the Duke enters the Citie gates, being without any guard, hee finds the streets full of poore and desolate people, vpon their knees, men and women, old and young, crying for mercy, and redoubling their pitifull cries, as witnesses of their repentance. Then the Duke commands they should presently bring all their armes into one place neere vnto his lodging, placing a guard at the gates, and vpon the wals. The next day he caused a scaffold to be made in the market place, where hauing sharply rebuked the people for their rebellion, he pronounced a sentence in the Kings name, whereby he declares, That all their priuiledges were taken from them, their Consullship, Townehoufe, common Arches, Vniuersity, their Bels, Salt-pannes, and all Iurisdiccions of the Citie, either of soueraigne Courts, or of the Commonalty: six hundred inhabitants to be chosen at aduenture, condemned to die; that is, two hundred to lose their heads, two hundred to be hanged, and two hundred burnt, their children declared infamous and slauers for euer, and their goods confiscate: The Commonaltie should pay sixefcore thousand Frankes of gold, and the charges of the Dukes voyage, and his armies: The Consuls with certaine Councillers that were named, should draw the bodies of such as had bene massacred out of the Well, and bury them: A Chappell should bee built for their obsequies, with the same Bell which did found the Alarm: The gates and Citie wals should be beaten downe, and their armes burnt publicly.

The sentence pronounced against them,

This was their doome: but it was moderated at the intercession of Pope Clement then resident in Auignon, by the means of Cardinall de la Lune. The summe was qualified, the priuiledges restored, the gates and wals preferred: but the authors of this sedition were put to death, that the rest of the inhabitants might liue in safety.

is moderated.

A notable precedent for subiects to suppress their fury, even when they thinke to haue a iust cause of complaint, feeling themselves surcharged or otherwise grieved: considering that errors are sooner committed then repaired: And for Commanders, that it is a dangerous resolution to let loose the reins to a mad multitude, which augments the mischief, supposing to cure it.

time, to the great griefe of her husband, to whom she left two sonnes, Charles and Lewis, both very young: for Charles was borne the 3 of December 1371, and was caried to the Font by Charles of Montmorency, and baptised by Dourmans Bishop of Beauuois, and Chancellor of France. Lewis was Duke of Orleans. She left him also one daughter, Jehet, married afterwards to Richard King of England. Necessary obseruations for the course of our History.

This good Prince after his wiues death, was nothing healthfull, so as broken with poyson, the which had much weakened him, and with the tedious toyles of his youth, more then with age, he decayed daily, and he himselfe perceiued it; so as feeling the end of his life to approach, remembering what troubles he had past, during the mournfull imprisonment of his father, by the contempt of his young age, lest the like should happen to his sonne Charles, vader colour of his minority, gouerned by Tutors, he decreed in a generall assembly of the States, by a Law, and an irreuoicable Edict, That after the deceasse of the King of France, his eldest sonne should succeed him presently, and at the age of foureteene years should be declared capable to gouerne the Estate alone, and be freed from Tutors. But (oh the weaknesse of mans wisedome!) he did not foresee that his sonne should be ill gouerned by his Tutors in his minority, that the age of foureteene should not free him from Tutors; and that euen his sonne, comming to mans estate, should giue more scope to the ambition of his owne Vnckles (more worthily to bee called murtherers then tutors) then his weakest youth had done.

He had a Fistula in one arme, by the which those ill humors were drawne away, which grew by poyson, and gaue great ease when it did runne. It chanced this Fistula stop, and then his malady encreas'd much.

Charles (resembling by this sharpe alarm, to goe the common way of all flesh) cald for his three brethren, Lewis, Iohn, and Philip; and hauing recommended his children and subiects vnto them, he giues them particular addece for the gouernment of the Realme: leaving the custody of his sonne, and the Regency of the Realme vnto them. Hee died the 16 of September 1380, in the Castle of Beauty, seated vnder the River of Marne. He commanded that Oliuer of Clifton should bee Constable, hauing commended his fidelity and sufficiency, and that they should carefully preferue the amity of Germany.

Charles dies.

Thus died Charles the wife, wonderfully beloued and lamented of his subiects, leaving his Realme in good estate, after so horrible a desolation. And although the confusions passed had wonderfully impoucrished the subiects, and wasted the Kings treasure, (neither was his reigne free from war) yet did he leaue the Provinces of his Realme very weaklie, and an infinite treasure in his coffers: although he had built the Loure, Saint Germaine in Lay, Montargis, Creil, the Celestines, and some other Churches. Of such power is good husbandry in this Realme, as in riches it yeelds not to the treasures of Peru, nor in fertility to any Country vnder heauen, to subsist amidst so many stormes, and to be presently restored by good husbandry.

His disposition.

An example for Princes to imitate, and not to despaire in like confusions, but to hope for all that may be wished for in the restoring of an Estate, by patience and dexterity, vertues proper to our wife Charles. A Prince so much the more praise-worthy, hauing preferred this Estate when it seemed lost; religious, wise, modest, patient, stirring and fained, when need required; able to entertaine euery man according to his humour: hauing by these vertues wonne a great reputation both within and without the Realme, and honourable to his posterity, as to haue saved France from shipwracke.

He loued learning and learned men: Nicholas Oresme was his Schoolemaster, whom he honoured with great preferments. He caused the Bible to be translated into French, imitating Saint Lewis. I haue scene the Originall in the Kings lodging at the Loure, signed by King Charles and his brother the Duke of Berry. A goodly obseruation of the ancient simplicity of those royall characters. I haue likewise scene a Manuscript of the translation made by the commandement of Saint Lewis. He delighted in the reading of the holy Scripture and Philophy: hauing likewise caused the Ethikes and Politiques of Aristotle, with many bookes of Tully, to be translated into French. The fauour he shewed to learned men, stirred vp many good wits, who beganne to draw the Muses from their graues both in France and Italy.

The History doth particularly note, that he did often visit his Court of Parliament, and his Chamber of accompts: gaue audience vnto suitors, read their petitions, and heard their complaints and reasons, employing some dayes of the weeke, euen in his greatesse affaires, to doe those fatherly and royall workes of iustice. Hee tooke great delight to aduance his household seruants, giuing them meanes secretly (and without the priuity of any) to instruct their sonnes, and to marrie their daughters. A testimony of a good confidence, and of a wife man. This bond of loyalty could haue no better foundation, then in transporting it from the father to the sonne, nor almes be better employed then from the master to the seruant.

Royall vertues, and worthy of eternall memory. But alas! what shall be the successe of this bounty and wisedome? The reigne of his sonne Charles shall be most miserable. He hath done the part of a good brother, of a good master, a good father, and a good King: but God the Soueraigne of Kings, had limited the euent of his cares: to reach vs; (by a notable example) That unless the Lord build the house the workmen labour but in vaine: if the Lord keepe not the City, the watchman watcheth but in vaine: for an eternall Maxim of gouernment and State, Whoseuer glories, let him glory in the Lord. But vertues are not hereditary. Iohn not very wise, begat Charles a wife and happy Prince, and hee begets a frantick man, vnhappy both in youth and age. We may on the other side oppose other considerations very disputable. Profit aduised him to marrie the heyre of Flanders, not onely to pacifie that Country, but also to enlarge his owne dominions, adding thereunto that great and rich Estate of Flanders, from whence so many mischiefes haue sprung to France, but his delight made him preferre the faire before the rich. Moreover, the rules of State did not permit him so to aduance his brother, making him in a manner equal to himselfe in power, the which must needs be the cause of many inconueniences, as it after hapned. The cause of his brother Philip Duke of Bourgongne, is ordered by the same rule, for who can with reason mislike, that Charles giues a portion to his brother by his fathers will; and that in the rich marriage of a Prince his vassall, and of a heire Estate (whereby his Realme was daily annoyed) he preferres his brother before his capital enemy? But God had reserved the honour to himselfe. Bourgongne since Robert, the grandchild of Hugh Capet, had beene successiue in the power of Princes, who had alwaies done faithfull seruice to the Crowne, and now it shall be a scourge vnto it: yet in the end it shall be wited vnto the Crowne againe, and taken from such as had abused it. Experience doth teach, that in matters of State, the end is not alwaies answerable to the beginning, nor the successe to the designe, to the end that Princes may depend on him who is greater then themselves, who hath made them, and can marre them: and without whom they cannot doe any thing.

Behold the life, death, race, reigne, and manners of Charles the fifth called the Wife. But before we enter into the troublefome reigne of Charles the sixth, let vs obserue the estate of the Empire and of the Church. We haue said that Charles the sonne of Iohn King of Bohemia had beene chosen Emperour, and called Charles the fourth. He held the Empire two and thirty yeares, beginning in the yeare 1350. So the reignes of Iohn and Charles his sonne, is contained in this Empire: for he died in the yeare 1378. Before his death he provided that Winceslas his sonne should succeed him in the Imperiall dignity. At the first he married Blanche Countesse of Valois, daughter to Charles Earle of Valois, and sister to Philip of Valois the French King, being very young, (for shee was but seuen yeares old when she was betroathed vnto him) hee had beene bred vp in the Court of France, and leamed the French humors: he loued our Crowne better then our lawes. A Prince wholly inclined to his owne particular, making shew to loue our Kings, but vnder-hand hee supported their enemies against them.

The estate of the Empire.

This was the principall reason why his comming into France proued fruitlesse, after so long a voyage and so great expences, ministring a sufficient cause of icalousy to our Charles, who gaue him the best entertainment he could, to make him know, that the souerainty which he pretended to haue ouer France, was but a dreame. Yet he suffered the Country of Dauphin (which they called the Empire, as a member of the ancient Realme of Arles) to be wholly infranchised from that subiection, to cut off all pretensions from his successors, embracing the commodity to settle his affaires euen by their meanes whom he knew were not his friends.

disposition:Original of the

This Emperour Charles the fourth, did all he could both in Italy and Germany to apply vnto himselfe the rights of the Empire, being wholly inclined to his owne profit, for the which he vled the name of iustice and good order, being more learned in law then in doing right, and hauing more knowledge then conscience. It is he which made the Golden Bull, both to rule the Election of the Emperour, and the rights and dignitie of the Empire. The former confusions of the Empire had so dispensed all priuate gouernours of Countries and Cities as euery one played the Emperour in his gouernment.

These tyrannicall disorders were the cause of the Cantons in Switzerland, who haue established a goodly Common-weale, consisting of thirteene Cantons, who maintaine themselves with great order and force, hauing the amitie and alliance of the neighbour Monarchs, and an honourable place among the Estates of Christendome vnto this day. Their particular history belongs not to our subject, it sufficeth to haue noted the beginning, and the occasion of their common-weale, newly erected in the disorders of that age. The Church of Rome was in a very poore estate, first by the continuall factions of the Guephens and Gibelins, and of it selfe by a distraction bred by an open schisme hauing two Popes, two chaires, two Seas, and a deadly hatred, the which troubled all the Kings and Princes of Christendome, some defending the Pope, others the Antipope his oppositor.

We haue said, that in the reigne of Philip of Valois the Pontificall Sea was transfused from Rome to Auignon, where it continued about 70 yeares, Clement the sixth hauing bought this Citie for his successors, being a pleasant and fruitfull seat. These quarrels (continued with such violent passions) had tired mens minds like as a long proccesse doth weary the most obstinate pleaders. The Popes being absent from Rome, gouerned the estate of Italy by three Cardinals, their Legats, but all went to ruine. Gregory the fifth Limosin, being chosen Pope at Auignon, went to Rome to redresse these confusions, wherein there was small helpe. Being receiued with an incredible ioy of the Romans, and of all Italy, he returnes no more to Auignon, but passeth the rest of his dayes at Rome. After his death the people with all vehemency require a Roman borne, or an Italian for Pope: but there was some difficulty in the election, for the Colledge consisted for the most part of French Cardinals, who desired to haue one of their owne nation. They were much diuided: but the Cardinals (fearing the peoples fury, armed with an intent to murder them if they did not choose one of their nation) yielded to the election of Neopolitane, named Bartolomeus, who was receiued and proclaimed by the name of Vrbane the sixth.

But within few dayes after, the malecontents retired from Rome (vnder colour to fly the plague) to Fundy, a towne in the Realme of Naples (of the French faction) by means of Queen Isabe, where they did choose Clement the 7, a Limosin, who retired to Auignon, and was opposite to Vrbane the sixth, with open defiance one of another: which schisme continued vntill the Councell of Constance, each Pope with his faction. Clement had him the Kings of France, Castile, and Scotland. Vrbane had the Emperour, the Kings of England and Hungary: Clement held his seat at Auignon, and Vrbane at Rome. In this dayes liues Barthol, Baldus, Petrarch, Boccace, Planudes a Greeke by nation, Bonaventura and Iohn Wickliffe. These hurly-burlys touched the hearts, and opened the mouthes of many good men, wonderfully grieved to see such diuision in the Church, apparently growne by the ambition of such as had greatest authority in the same. The writings open to their reasonable complaints, which euery one may reade, without any further discourse.

CHARLES THE SIXT,
The 53. French King.

It is necessary to haue some direction to passe through a labyrinth, so this crooked reigne hath need of some order to guide vs in the disorder of so many obscure confusions, which we are to represent. I will first obserue the most famous acts and worthiest personages of this reigne, and then will I distinguish the subject according to the occurrences. This miserable reigne continued 42 yeares, beginning in the yeare 1380, and ending in the yeare 1422. Charles the sixth succeeded his father Charles the fifth, at the age of 12 yeares, (being borne in the yeare 1368) he was crowned in the yeare 80, married in 84, dismissed his Tutors to reigne alone in 87, falls into a frenzy in 93, and dies in the yeare 1422. So being vnder age with his Tutors, and of age in perfect sence, he reigned thirteen yeares, and liued in his frenzy twenty nine yeares. Who sees not then the iust calculation of forty two yeares in this reigne?

Charles the fifth his father, had three brethren, Lewis Duke of Aniou, Iohn Duke of Berry, & Philip Duke of Bourgongne. Queen Isabe, daughter to Peter Duke of Bourbon, wife to Charles the fifth, and mother to Charles the sixth, had one brother, James Duke of Bourbon. These foure Vncles shall play their parts vpon this stage in diuers occurrences, but let vs adde the rest, euery one shall haue his turne.

We haue said that Charles the Wise left two sonnes, this Charles the 6, whose reigne we now describe, and Lewis Duke of Orleans. And our Charles had three sonnes, Lewis, Iohn, and Charles, and one daughter named Katherine: all by Elizabeth of Bauiaria, one of the chiefe fire brands of this Tragedie: an outrageous woman, an vnnatural mother, and altogether vnworthy of this Crowne. These three sonnes were Dauphins one after another in their fathers life: but Charles succeeded him, notwithstanding all crosses and difficulties: and Katherine his sister was married to Henry the fifth, King of England; a mournfull age of a horrible confusion for this Realme. But alas, how many cruell acts of ambition, vanity, and treacherie of such as held the helme of this Estate, being either royall persons, or seated in the highest dignities? How many changes and reuolutions of these fiordward humors, daring any thing vnder the liberty of this reigne: the King being either a child, or sicke, and alwayes weak and vnable to gouerne so great a charge? In the first scene of this Tragedie, we shall see the Vncles of this young King in diuision one against another. Lewis Duke of Aniou (declared Regent, as first Prince of the blood) is crossed by his brethren, the Dukes of Berry and Bourgongne, and he abuserh his authority imperiously. Lewis Duke of Aniou being dead, Lewis Duke of Orleans, brother to King Charles the 6, shall take his place, as the first Prince, and shall fall to quarrell with Philip the Hardy Duke of Bourgongne, his Vncle, who dying, shall leaue Iohn his sonne successor of his ieaousie, against Lewis Duke of Orleans his cousin. Iohn shall exceed all humanitie, and kill him, but the hatred shall not die, being transplanted into Charles Duke of Orleans, sonne to Lewis massacred, the which shall breed infinite troubles. The Dauphins shall play their parts, sometimes friends, and sometimes enemies one to another. Iohn who had murdered Lewis of Orleans, shall be slaine by Charles the Dauphin, who shall be King: but from Iohn shall spring another Philip of Bourgongne, who shall kindle a new fire, to be reuenged of his fathers death. The stranger is engaged in these ciuill warres: women augment it by their furies. On the one side Valentine Duchesse of Orleans: on the other Isabel Queene of France. The Constables of Clifton and Armagnac are likewise drawne in: and the subject grows licentious in these disorders. Passion preuailes with such a fury, as the mother forgets the birth of her owne wombe, and so abuserh her authority, as she dares attempt against the fundamentall law of State) to giue the Realme to a stranger, who was crowned and proclaimed King in the heart of France, by her boldnesse.

These be the Contents of this wretched reigne, with these two parcels distinctly to be obserued: the Kings Minority, and his Majority, and thereby we shall diuide our whole Discourse.

The Minoritie of King CHARLES the sixt:

From the yeare 1380, when as CHARLES received the Crowne by the decease of his Father, unto the yeare 37, that he dismissed his Vncles, to rule alone with absolute authority.

Lewis of Anjou Regent.

A controuersie for precedence betwixt the Kings vncles at his coronation.

THE Generall Estates assemble at Paris presently after the death of Charles the V to provide for the government of the King and Realme; and to auoid all apphealoufie betwixt the Kings Vncles, they decreed, That according to the Declaration by their good King deceased, Charles his sonne should be anointed and crowned King, and he should be of competent age to gouerne so great an Estate, Lewis Duke of Anjou (as eldest of the House of France, and so the first Prince of the blood) should be Regent, and haue the shority of Councell and royall Command. And likewise by vertue of King Charles his will, Oliuer of Clifton (a braue and valiant Knight borne in Britany) was made Constable of France. Oliuer of Clifton tooke possession of his charge, preparing for the Kings Coronation: and the Duke of Anjou receiuing the Kings Treasure, which they say was eigheteen hundred thousand Crownes. A very great summe for those times, and after so watched a season. He forced Sawys the head Treasurer, to deliuer those summes into his hands, and by this excelsse laid the ground of a great presumption which followed.

Charles is anointed at Rheims, and crowned after the custome of France, the 27th October, in the yeare 1380, in a solempne assembly of his Princes of the blood, Princes allied, and officers of this Crowne. The Dukes of Anjou, Berry, and Bourgongne the Kings Vncles, Wencelin Duke of Brabant, the Dukes of Lorraine and Barre, the Earles of Auoy, of Marche, and Eu (friends and confederates to our Kings) did assist. At this solempny there was some question for place, whether should take it, the Duke of Anjou as Regent of the Realme, or the Duke of Bourgongne as first Peere of France and Deane of the Peeres: distinguishing the degrees according to their qualities, to whom the one was giuen.

The King to crowne his instalment by some notable act, tooke vpon him to decide this controuersie, and decreed, That for as much as as the Kings anointing, the Peeres of France ought to hold the first ranke, in all ceremonies: the Duke of Bourgongne as the first should take place of the Duke of Anjou: and so Philip was preferred before his elder brother continuing the possession of the name of Hardy, the which he purchased in defending his father Iohn so stoutly at the battell of Poitiers. But he encreased this name of Hardy so much in his cariage, leauing it hereditary to his children, conuerting this stoutnesse into an imperious presumption, which bred a huge deluge of miseries to the great perill of the whole Realme. The day after the coronation, the States beseech the Regent to provide for the reliefe of the poore people, whose burthen was too heauy for the great charges they were to pay of debts growne in former reignes, and the rather for that there was no warre which imposed the necessity of so great a charge.

The Regent did not yeeld thereunto, but continued these leaues of money more and more, which was the occasion of tumults in diuers Prouinces of France, as if this popular humor had beene like vnto a pestilent feuer, or an infectious disease. Flanders likewise kindred great fires vpon sundry occasions, which were quenched with much trouble, and memorable combustions. Flanders shall embarke first in this storme, and shall last to land not without danger by strange accidents; to teach Princes how farre they should presse their subiects; and for subiects, with what respect they should reuerence their superiors, in seeking out remedies for their afflictions; for in the end (amidst these tumults) the victors weepe and lament in the ruine and notable losse and overthrow of the vanquished.

We haue sayd that Philip Duke of Bourgongne, made a composition for the Gantois with the Earle of Flanders his father in law. But this accord lasted not long: for the Earle disdainning the indignities hee had digested, during the sedition, could not forget them; but vnder fained quarrels, (to the end they should haue no cause of complaint, as breaking the accord) he pincheth some, and ruines others: and for that the Gantois stood vnder their guard, nor suffering the Earles men to attempt any thing within the limits of the City,

A City, he made a search in the Citie of Bruges (where he commanded absolutely) for such as had been of the faction of White-caps, where he executed about 500. This execution kindled a new fire: Gant falls to armes, and Ypre follows; to whose succour the Gantois send three thousand men. The Earle being the stronger, cutteth them in pieces betwixt Courtray and Pourpaigny, as they march: Ypre yeelds vnto him; being entred the towne, he cuts off seauen hundred of the chiefe men heads: and then without any stay, hee marcheth to Gand, and besiegeth it. But his forces were too small in regard of that great and spacious Citie, so as hauing employed all his meanes, they had still the liberty of foure gates.

B The Gantois loth to be shut vp, and to endure the discommodities of a siege, hauing a wonderfull aduantage by the numbers of their people, resolute to provide well for the guard of the City, and then to draw forth a good troope to spoyle the Country, and to force some of the Earles places, thereby to make a diuersion of the siege. They goe to the field with sixe thousand choice men, vnder the command of Iohn de Launoy one of their Tribunes. They take and burne Tenremonde and Gramont, townes belonging to the Earle, committing infinite spoiles in the Country. The Earle leaues the siege, and marcheth away with an intent to fight with them. He finds them neare to Niuelle, chargeth them, defeats them, and purs them to flight: They recover the gates of Niuelle, and the Earle enters with them pell mell; some of them (led by Launoy) recover the Fort of the towne: the Earle besiegeth them, and causeth many fagots and bauns to be brought about this Tower, and to be set on fire. All these poore wretches are burnt, making most horrible cries. This Tribune entreateth, that they might be receiued to ranfome, and shewing his pite, but receiuing no answer from them, but scornes and mockes, he casts himselfe from the top of the Tower vpon their Halberds and Pikes, and so he dies very valiantly. This sight was horrible, and truly vnworthy of a Lord displeased with his subiects, and yet he continued it with a new slaughter of this poore people, who being amazed with this great defeat, had neither feet to runne, nor hands to defend themselves. All are put to the sword, so as of sixe thousand, there hardly escaped three hundred. But the Gantois shall soone haue their reuenge. At the brute hereof, they were as much amazed, as the Earle was put vpon with pride to pursue his victory, being in so ready a way for the execution and pursuit thereof.

In this disorder, the Gantois choose another head, Philip of Arteuille, sonne to Iames of Arteuille, (who (as we sayd) was slaine by the people) who aduise them to humble themselves vnto their Earle, and to craue pardon. They are resolute, hauing necessity for their chiefe Councillor, praying and beseeching their Earle, To haue pitié of the blood of his subiects, who submitted their liues and goods to his mercy, to dispose at his pleasure, either in pardoning them, or suffering them to depart, in abandoning their native Country, as a perpetual banishment, that it would please him onely to grant them their liues. The Earle was greatly incensed against them, and in such a choler, as they could receiue no other answer. E But that all sorts within the City, men and women above the age of fifteene yeares, should bare-foot and bare-headed submit themselves to his mercy, and bring in this estate, hee would advise what to doe.

The people of Gant seeing him transported with wrath, and no meanes to pacifie it, they resolute (by the aduice of Philip of Arteuille, their leader, in this extreme necessity) to hazard all, and not to hope for any safety but in despaire: being the least of two mischiefs, to dye courageously, for the liberty of their country, and defending themselves against the vniust violence of so inexorable a man; then hauing sene their wives & daughters deslowred, they should either suruiue their infamie, or be slaine and massacred without any defence, like dogges, at the mercy of so cruell an enemy. The event, or rather God the protector of the afflicted, fauoured this courageous resolution. For the effecting hereof, they make choise of sixe thousand of their most resolute and best armed men, to try their fortunes against the Earle, and provide the best they can for the guard of the City: with a generall resolution and consent, That if these sixe thousand men should be defeated, to the end they should not attend the doubtfull euent of a siege, nor fall into the hands of so irreconcilable an enemy, they would set fire of the City, and euery one saue himselfe as he could.

and marcheth directly to Bruges, takes a feat of advantage, and intrencheth himselfe, attending the opportunity, either to defend themselves with advantage, or to fall vpon the enemy. The Earle putt vp with his first successe, imagining them too few for the Lacquesies belonging to the Gentlemen of his traine, came to charge them within their trenches, and to force them to fight. Arteuille not like a Brewer of beere, as he was, but as a great Captaine, ordered his troopes with such dexterity, as the Earles army had the Sun in their eyes: vpon this sudden change, hauing a full view of the Earles men, he goes resolutely to the charge, leading forth this desperate troope, which fell vpon them like a great streame of water, breaking forth suddenly, hauing found a passage. The first ranks (troubled with the Sun-beames which dazled their eyes, and not able to withstand so violent a charge) giue way, and turning their backs, they disorder all the rest.

The Gantois vpon this advantage, reare all in pieces they encounter; as famished wolues doe in a flocke of sheepe. This braue Nobility flies, as astonied, and is put to the sword. The Earle cries, entreats, and runnes, but all in vaine: he that had the swiftest horse, and the best legges to flye, was the most valiant. The retreat from thence to Bruges was neere the multitude flies thither, like a current of water. The Earle enters with the rest, not able to gather his men againe together, and thrusts himselfe into his Castle.

The Gantois following, and killing them that fled, enter pel mel, and seized vpon the gates. Arteuille hauing speedily provided for the guard thereof, the Gantois (being victors) dispersed themselves throughout the City, crying against the vanquished. C. The City is wonne: and liberty proclaimed for the good Citizens, killing all such as they found to fauour the Earle, searching all houses for his seruants, and commanding to spare the good Citizens. The Earle foreseeing by this brute that the enemy would presently pursue him, he suddenly leaues his rich attire, and takes the simplest of one of his Grooms, and so forsakes the Castle, to seek some corner to hide his head in. Hee was scarce gone out, but his Castle was beset, and easily taken and spoyled, whilest that he saues himselfe in a poore womans house: where in her silly cottage she had only one room beneath, and about a garret, to the which they mounted by a ladder. The Earle creeps into this cabin, and the woman hides him in the bed-straw, where her children did lie, and coming downe, tooke away the ladder. The Gantois hauing made search in euery corner for the Earle, they came to the house where the Earle was, and searching it, they went vpon to the place where hee lay hidden. He that could haue read the secrets of this poore princes heart, in this amazement, should haue seene a remorse of conscience, for that hee had not intreated his subiects with more mildnesse. Being thus freed, he creeps out of this cottage, and gets forth of the towne, being alone, and on foot: running from bush to bush, and from ditch to ditch, fearing euery one that passed: when as behold (lying hidden in a ditch) he discouers a household seruant of his owne, named Robert Marshal, who takes him vp on horse-backe behind him, and in this order he recouers Life.

This vnexpected successe bred new designs in the franticke braine of this Tribune: and of this furious multitude, who should haue bene satisfied to haue auoided shipwrack, and (returning to their houses) should haue fallen to their vsuall trades, and haue vied this profitable successe to good purpose, and made their peace with their lawfull Lord, being sufficiently chastised. But vanity thrusts them on, and the certaintie of Gods threats sheweth it selfe in the following punishment: to teach vs, That man hath but the misery which he seekes by his owne folly. A generall lesson for great and small, both for men, Families, and States.

Arteuille with his Gantois (hauing glutted themselves with the sacke and blood of such as were any way affected to the Earle, hauing spoiled his Castle, and left it desolate, beaten downe the gates of Bruges, and filled vp the ditches) from thence they goe to conquer the other cities of Flanders, where he conceived a new Empire. Presently all obey him: Ypre, Dam, Bergues, Bourbourg, Furnes, Sluse, Pourprigne, Courtray and the lesser townes, Audenard resists: It is presently besieged. At the brute of this successe, all Flanders flies thither, so as in few dayes there were about a hundred thousand men assembled before the towne. The Earle amazed with so violent a reuolt of all his subiects, hath recourse to his son in law Philip Duke of Bourgogne, that by his meanes he might be liued from the King: although he were more affected to the English then French, hauing bene too much respected by our Kings. King Charles succours the Earle of Flanders contrary to the aduice of the Regent and Councell.

A iested in aduersity. The Regent and the Councell refused to venture the King with this man in so dangerous a cause: but two reasons moued the King thereunto, and made him ouerrule both the Duke of Aniou his Vncle, and his whole Councell by the perswasions of the Duke of Bourgogne. The one was Arteuille himselfe, who during the siege of Audenard (not content to haue ruined the Noblemens houses of the country) had made some roades vpon the frontiers of France.

The other was, King Charles dreamed that hee was mounted vpon a flying Hart, which caried him gently through the ayre, and a Heron vnder him, which did beat downe all other birds, came then flying to his fist, and the Hart brought him to the place from whence he caried him, to his great content. As the King conceived a delight to report this dreame, as preface of some good successe, so the Duke of Bourgogne laboured to draw him into Flanders. The King vpon these motives doth presently leaue an armie, and goes to field. Arteuille to avoid this storme, fortifies the passages of Flanders, especially Pont du Lis, neere vnto Comines. The French surpriseth this passage politely, hauing attended all night in the dirtie marsh vp to the ancles, expecting the commoditie of the passage. Their patience was the more commendable, for that it was in the depth of a sharp winter, in December. Comines and Verrain being taken, sackt and burnt, the towne of Ypre kills their Governour, who would not suffer them to obey the King, and yeeld themselves, paying fortie thousand franks for a composition. By their example, Cassel, Bergues, Bourbourg, Graue, Lin, Furnes, Dunckerke, Pourprigne, Tourmont, Vaillant, Messine, and other neighbour townes resolute to seaze vpon their Gouvernours, being Gantois: and so send them bound hands and feet vnto the King, as a testimonie that they had yeelded vpon force.

Charles receiues the townes to mercie, and cuts off the heads of these vnlawfull Gouvernours. Arteuille fearing the reuolt of other Cities, and that his forces (which were great) would fall from him, resolues to preuent Charles, and to force him to fight, promising himselfe the like successe as he had against the Earle before Bruges. With this resolution he chargeth the French armie betwixt Corray and Rosebecque, vpon the Mount of gold, which at the first shocke did somewhat amaze them, they recoyling a little, but without any disorder: yet supported by the Bataille and reere-ward, they breathe, and all together charge this multitude with so great a furie, as all are put to flight, and cut in peeces, or taken with a strange disorder. They number about threecore thousand men slaine, and an infinite number of prisoners taken: after the Nobilitie had glutted their choller vpon this seditious rabble, who had made rebellion, a vertue, Philip of Arteuille their leader was slaine: hee was found breathing among the dead carcases, whom the King commanded to be hanged, and so he had the reward of his imagined Empire.

This double euent may serue as a lesson, both for great and small, for great men, in the Earles person; for small, in that of this Tribune. For the first, to command well, for the others to obey well: and for all, not to passe the bounds of their duties. God punishing the great for their tyranny and crueltye, and the lesser for their disobedience: dangerous plagues of mankind, the which cannot stand but by order and authoritie well gouerned, and well applied.

They call this overthrow the battaile of Rosebecque, which chanced in the yeare 1382. in December. It was the more remarkable, for that the vanquished had soon their reuenge. Charles thus victorious, could not manage his victorie; for in stead of surprisng the Gantois in this amazement, he lingers too long at Corray, to seek out the remainder of those miserable mutines, which remained in this defeat: whereas, in pardoning the vanquished, the Victor gets a double victorie.

This place also (being infamous by a great overthrow which chanced in the yeare 1312) moued him to choler, for that this ill aduised people, to note the memorie of that day, did celebrate a solemne feast yeafely, and had reserved 500 paire of gilt spurres, which they had taken from the French in that battell. Charles was so transported with the memory of this audacious indignitie, as he caused this poore Towne to be burnt. An vnworthy reuenge of so great a Monarch, who should hold it the greatest reuenge vpon his enemies, to pardon when he may reuenge. The duke of Bourgogne in all this confusion, did not forget to seeke for goodly moueables, whereof there was abundance. He caried away that goodly clocke, and that exquisite tapistrie, which is now at Dijon in the Kings house.

Gantois seeks succour from England.

Arteman, one of their Citizens, for their head, and renew the league of white caps, more obstinately then before, being resolved to die, rather then to trust their Eale, to whom they imputed the cause of all their miseries, the which had continued five yeares, and deuoured two hundred thousand men. So farall are ciuill dissentions betwixt the Lord and his subjects. Lewis their Earle hauing laboured to settle his affaires both by the French and English, against the Gantois, feeling daily the inconueniences of this rebellious people, as thornes in his sides, fell into such a melancholie, as he died, leauing his whole estate much troubled, to his sonne in law, Philip Duke of Bourgongne, who being farre engaged in his father in lawes quarrell, was nothing pleasing to this his people.

A strange meanes to pacifie Gant.

The warre was renewed, both by practices of the English, and by the meanes of Arteman, the head of that faction, who hauing tasted the sweet of popular command, desired nothing more then to maintain this diuision: but there fell out a sodaine accident, which pacified all this great trouble, as a little raine doth a great winde. Two citizens of Gant (whose names deserued well to be registered in this history) discoursing one day of their common miseries, and noting the true causes of these calamities within their city, as feeling the wound, they fought the meanes to cure it, the which had continued so long, and cost their miserable country so deare. The Kings pleasure, and the Duke of Bourgongnes must be knowne: they were not ignorant of the peoples humour, being very wearie of so many miseries.

Their enterprise was not without exceeding danger, by the absolute authority of three or foure, who had most credit with the people, being susceptible of any mischief, whom they are thrust forward with a shew of good. It was requisite in the managing of so important a businesse to vse wisdom and secrecy, vntill the foundation were well laid: and for the execution thereof, there needed one which had both credit and authority with both parties. The God of peace presented one vnto them, which gouerned this action discreetly. Iohn Delle, a gentleman of Gant, but bred vp in the court of France. He that seeks peace, findes it. This Delle goes to the King, & the Duke of Bourgongne; he laies open his designe, and is well entertained. He returns with a good answer, both by letters of credit, and priuate instructions, to the Gantois. At his returne the matter is so well furthered by those two citizens (who were in great reputation with the people) as without the pteuoy of Arteman, or the English Negotiators, the banner of Flanders (the signall of that popular power) is solemly planted in the great Market place. All the people flocke thither, where hauing signified vnto the chiefe Magistrates, that they would haue peace, and obey the Duke of Bourgongne their Prince; Deputies are appointed with power to negotiate and conclude a peace with him. This was effected after a long confusion, to the content, both of the Earle and Flemings. Of a light beginning, God performs a great worke, when it pleaseth him. Thus the Duke of Bourgongne pacified Flanders in the year 1384, when as he feared greatest tumults by meanes of some seditious persons: to whose great griefe a peace was proclaimed throughout all the Estates of Flanders, which gave an incredible content to all the people after so many miseries.

Peace in Flanders.Charles marries with Isabel of Bawaria.

Now King Charles grew great, and although he were but sixteen yeeres of age, yet was he desirous to marry. The Duke of Aniou his Vncle, according to the aduice which King Charles the wife had giuen on his death bed, thought good to seeke him out a Mariage in Germany, in the house of Bawaria, to counterballance the credit of the Emperours Mariage, no friend to the House of France, what few sooner he made. Hee therefore matcht with Isabel the daughter of Stephen Duke of Bawaria, a Princesse from whom they expected much good: but the brought infinit troubles to France, as wee shall see hereafter. Thus mans wilddome is deceived, when as he hopes for best: that God might be knowne for the author of all good, both in the family and State. This imperious Proserpina, possessed the preuerbe, That a woman raiseth, or ruines a house. She had almost ouerthrowne the State. But shortly there shall an Italian woman be ioyned to this Germane, to augment the confusions of this reigne, reasonable good in the beginning, but very miserable at the end. This yeere likewise concluded a peace in Britany, after many troubles, John Montfort hauing renewed his homage to the King, and sworne fealty, which shall not continue, to the great preiudice of the King and his realme.

Peace in Britany.

The truce was continued in shew betwixt France and England, but with no more intent of the two Kings, then betwixt capitall enemies, who fought to annoy one another by all attempts.

1384

Charles sends men and munition into Scotland.

Charles hauing pacified Flanders & Britany, resolves to be reuenged of Richard, who had fought all meanes to annoy him in either prouince, besides the ordinary brauadoes hee gaue him within the heart of his realme. Hee therefore sends a thousand men at armes to David King of Scots, and threecore Ships well appointed with furniture to arme twelve thousand men of his country, vnder the command of Iohn of Vienne, Admirall of France. Their entry into Scotland was pleasing, but the Scottishmen grew loone discontented with our men, either through their fault or ours, they accusing vs of infolency and loofenesse, and wee them of barbarousnesse and cruelty to their friend a stranger, who came to succour them.

This diuision caused David to make a peace with Richard, and our Admirall of Vienne to returne speedily home with his Frenchmen: but not without obstruing the manners, strength and commodities of this Island, diuided into two kingdomes. And lest hee should seeme to haue made a fruitlesse voiage, yelding an account vnto the King of what he had done, seen and learned in Scotland, he lets him vnderstand, that the strength of Scotland consisted but in five thousand horse, and thirty thousand foote halfe armed. And that of England in eight thousand horsemen, and 60000. footmen. This relation (were it true or false) gaue aduice to assaile the King of England in his owne country, where he might be vanquished with more facility then abroad, the which so moued the minde of this young prince (transported with the great harmes suffered with much indignity by the English) as it was easie for the Duke of Bourgongne whom it much concerned to haue the English molested, being often disquieted by them in his country of Flanders, to perswade the King to vndertake this warre. Opportunity did likewise seeme to iouine him, for that the Duke of Lancaster (pretending right to the realme of Castile by his Wife) had exhausted England, both of men and money, and the Gantois being pacified, all Flanders would be held in subiection by this check.

Charles resolves to make warre
in England.

The Regent acquainted with the Duke of Bourgongnes humour being his brother, (who for his priuate interest would hazard the whole) and noting the eminent dangers in the Kings person (who would imbarke himselfe in this action) the great want of money, the peoples exclamations, the great danger of tumults by the great exactions which must be made, and in the action it selfe, the inconueniency so apparent to any one that would open his eyes, the impossibility of so great an enterprise, to assaile a great King (so oft a Conquerour) within his owne Realme, not holding any land there; hee was vterly against it, yet he spake soberly, lest hee should offend the King, who greatly affected it.

Lewis Earle of Touraine the Kings brother (who soone shall be Duke of Orleans) the Constable Cliffon, the Earle of Saint Pol, the Lord of Coufly, and others in whom Charles had most trust, had beene so perswaded by the Duke of Bourgongne, as they had nothing els in their mouths, nothing founded in this young Princes eares, but the necessity, profit, honour and facility of this voiage. What my Liege (say they) are you lesse then the King of England? shall the French yeeld to the English in valour, courage or force? what an indignity is it to haue this people alwaies at our gates, to nourish them in our bosomes, and to furnish them with armes to beat vs? what a benefit will it be to take their nest from them, and leaue them no place of retreat? The Countries of Guienne, Normandy, Picardy and Flanders, are wholly yours. How much doth that import for the honour of your Majesty, and the good of your Realme, to returne them their owne, who haue so often defeated your armies, taken your ancestors, spoiled your Estate, braued it in your townes, & besieged your chiefe City of Paris: As for the facility of the execution, who fees not but you may effect it if you please? The Saxons conquered England with a handful of men, farre from their owne home, and with small meanes; and William the Conquerour with his sword alone. And you my Liege hauing a realme full of men, victuals and money, euen at your enemies gate, shall not you preuaile? England opens her armes vnto you: your Realme inuities you, which without doubt will employ both heart and purse for so great and generous a designe, the which imports both the honour and quiet of your Majesty.

Such and like speeches they did continually buzze into Charles his eares, but from his Chamber they were published in the Court, and so throughout the whole realme, as that which pleaseth the King doth commonly please all. The designe was to be wished against a capitall enemy of the State, and the proceeding had a faire shew. At the general instance of all the French, the King decrees in Councell, to leauy a great army, for the voiage of

of England: letters are sent out to all parts, subsidies, taxes, loans imposed, greater than during the imprisonment of King John, but all was shadowed with this reason: That they must endeavour once for all, to roote out the English, who vndermined this Estate, and sought to ruine it. This decree was put in execution with great applause of all men, as if France had laid new foundations of her greatness, both to warrant it selfe from danger at hand, to have a reuenge of former losses, and to build a new Estate at the cost of the common enemy of the French nation. The Navy is prepared at Sculuse and Blanbergue in the great content of the Flemings. They armed foure hundred eighty seuen ships for war, with an infinite quantity of victuals, the which came from all parts like to a flowing stream. The Nobility strives who shalbe best appointed. Strange Princes are invited. The King of Spaine (then a friend to our King) the Earle of Sauoy, the Dukes of Saxony and Bawarie send men. Our Princes will not yeeld one to another in costly shewes: they adde superfluous curiosity to necessity. They paint and gild their Ships, all glisters with goodly flagges, Penons, Banners, Standards, and Streamers. The Masts painted with rich ground shining with leaues of gold, gaue notice to all men, that they went not onely to a certaine victory, but to some ioyfull nuptials. But all this feast was made without any reckoning with God, who laughs from heauen at these ants, that strue to climbe without a ladder and at princes, who made these brauadoes at the poore peoples cost, who remembered not that God hath a soueraine court, and a register to controll their actions, and to oppose against their Vanities. The Army was prepared in two places, in Flanders, and in Britany. It consisted of twenty thousand Knights and Squires, as many Genouois archers on foot, and fise hundred men at armes Britains, vnder the command of the Constable Cliffon, who was with the Fleet in Britany. They had a care safely to lodge this great Army after their descent in England, expecting with safety the variable euent of warre, against a King and people, whom they came to fight with, on their owne dunghill. To prevent all inconueniences, they build a great frame or engine (some attribute this inuention to the Constable Cliffon, others to John of Viennne, Admirall of France, who had laid the first plot of this enterprise) like to a towne of warre, with towers, bastions, bulwarks, flanks, and other defences, according to the manner of that age. There was a lodging for the King and his court, according to the degrees of princes, officers, and noblemen of mark: lodgings for the chiefe of the army, according to their quarters, and space to set vp their tents and pavillions, halls and common places for the munition and victuals which followed the army, and to conclude, conuenient roome to imbattell a great number of men of warre.

This inclosure or frame was round, and made of many peeces with admirable art, and so great abundance of stiffe, as if they had cut downe a whole Forrest: it was finished with wonderfull speed, by the great number of workemen which came from all parts. To the men, ships, victuals, and this engine, the Kings court gaue an extraordinary beauty, being accompanied with the Dukes of Lorraine and Bar, the Earles of Sauoy, Armagnac, Geneue, Saint Pol, Longueuille, Eu, Dauphin of Auvergne, the Lord Cousily, Mahe William of Namur, with all the great Barons of France, and an infinite number of nobility who imbarcked themselves more willingly then in the voyage to the Holy Land. Thus was the preparation made in France for England, where they remained in great perplexity, to see so great a storme ready to fall vpon them. They provide the best they can, first by deuotion, (hauing recourse vnto God) then they fortifie their Ports and all passages with great diligence, both with men of warre, and all sorts of incombers, to helpe those places which nature had made of hard access to this Island. They say that Richard leaued a hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse, which was not answerable in the Admirals relation, the first Architect of this ridiculous attempt. But thus are Princes oftentimes abused, imbarcking themselves in dangerous actions without reason, whose ends are not answerable to their beginnings.

All was ready in the end of September: the King had provided for the government of the realme in his absence, leauing his brother Lewis Earle of Tourain, assisted with the duke of Berry his vnckle, and the bishop of Beauuais his Chancellor. Thus he parts from Paris, and comes to Sculuse with great speed, to recover the time lost. The Regent (should not abandon his person in so long and important a voyage, but he staies behind the King, promising to follow presently, but his meaning was to bring this enterprise to nothing. The King being ariued, the houres of stay are tedious, hee tels the minutes, and complains

A of the time lost: hee sollicites his vnckle to come by sundry letters, and sends poste after poste, hee stampes, hee chafes by reason of his stay. The whole Court is of the same humor. The Duke of Aniou answers the King, that he will part to morrow, but he staies at Paris to make good cheere at leisure, of purpose to draw on winter, to make the voyage impossible, and so to ouerthrow the action, the which was neuer pleasing vnto him, either for that it was pleasing to the Duke of Bourgongne his brother, and so to crosse him, or for that he held it preiudiciall to the King and his Realme.

But seeing himselfe prest by importunity, and impatient letters from the King, he parts from Paris, and the same day the Constable Cliffon weighs anchor at Lantriguer in Britany, with his great Towne of wood, and 72. ships of warre, meaning to ioiune with the whole body of the army at Sculuse: but it fell out contrary to his designe, and otherwise then the facility of his supposed victory had represented vnto him.

For hauing run his course towards Flanders, to take port at Sculuse, behold a contrary wind casts him vpon the coast of England, where (knowwithstanding all the diligence of his Mariners) his fleet was disperfed into diuers parts, three ships (wherein this great Engine was) are driuen into England, and runne on ground at the mouth of the Riuer of Thames. Behold our Argonauts as much amazed to see themselves taken in a weire, as the English were glad, who with ioy and admiration see themselves possessed (beyond all hope, & without any paine) of that which had cost their enemies so much to ruine them.

C These newes flie speedily to King Richard, who commands this great booty to bee brought vp the riuer vnto him, whither all the Country flockes to so strange a spectacle, and euery one holds it for a presage of good successe, to haue taken their City, which should haue taken them. Another part of the fleet is driuen into Zealand, and the Constable of Cliffon with the rest ariues at Sculuse, much amazed at this first disaster.

All their ioy of an assured victory, is conuerted into a generall feare, lest some new losse should follow this vnfortunate beginning. But whilst this amazement troubled most of the French, the Duke of Bourgongne and those of his faction (who desired the performance of this voyage at any rate) made these difficulties light, as common accidents which should not hinder great enterprises, the which cannot bee executed with-

D out some crosse, for the which they must seek a remedy, and not despair: He had perswaded the King againe, easie to be drawne to what he desired. Hereupon the Regent ariues, who (seeing the King resolved to imbarque) vailles his maske, speakes plainly, and tels the King in his Councell; That he will neuer consent hee should expose his person and estate to the hazard of the sea, of weather, and of warre, and vpon an aduice which seemed apparently false: being most certaine that the King of England had assembled aboue a hundred thousand fighting men. That these first losses were aduertisements from heauen to bridle those vaine hopes, which are sooner conceiued then brought forth. He had alwayes sufficiently declared, that it was not his aduice, yet for that hee would not seeme to contradict the Kings will, and crosse such as gaue him this counsell, as honorable to himselfe, and profitable to his Realme, he would not rashly oppose himselfe. But seeing now that God spake, he did open his mouth the more boldly, bearing in his heart a faithfull zeale vnto the Kings seruice, and the good of the State. That shortest errors being best, it were better to retire in time, then to make an absolute shipwracke of the Kings person, and the honor and good of the Realme, too much dismembred by former afflictions. This check from heauen which God hath sent, Winter, and the feare of worse, made the Regents aduice to be allowed, both by the King and his counsell, who changed opinion for their voyage to England. So this great enterprise was disappointed, being very preiudiciall to the poore people, who endured the warre that their enemy should haue felt, by an vnreasonable and excessive charge.

I haue quoted this action in the year 1381. vnder the Regency of the Duke of Aniou. I know some attribute it to the Duke of Berry, but I haue followed the first opinion, vpon the relation of true Authors, and as it shall appeare by the progresse of this report most likely. This action was the cause of seditions at Paris and Rouen, bred without doubt by the discontent of this bad government: for this great shew so incensed the people (being weary and grieved to haue borne so great a burthen for so vaine an enterprise) as they rise at Paris, Rouen, Amiens, Poitiers, Lions, and many other Cities, by this new occasion, which presently succeeded the first folly.

Sedition at Paris.Naples offered to the Regent.

The Regent was blamed by the people, to haue been too slack in his opposition against this preparation for England, and the chiefe in Court hated him for being so hasty, so that he was the only stay thereof. This ill thought of by both, hee was maligned of all hands. It chanced the Realme of Naples was offered vnto him by Queene Ioane & Pope Clement the 7. This was his whole desire, but he must conquer it by dint of sword. The title only was offered him, both by her that might giue it as being heire, and by him that might confirme the donation as being Pope. All the Kings counsell (being weary of the Regents command) wished to see him gone, but they must fly to the people for money, the which was hard to get, as experience did witness.

Presently, as they hear talk at Paris of a new imposition (although they sweetned these bitter pilles with the goodly name of subsidies) all the world begins to cry out, and from Paris the brute flies through the whole Realme. The people runne tumultuously to the Greue, they desire the Prouost of Merchants to bring them to the Regent, the which delays from day to day by excuses, but in the end he cannot retaine them. A great multitude runs to the Regents lodging, they giue him to vnderstand by their prouost, into what extremity they were brought, and vrge the late superfluous expences. To what end then (say they) serueth a new war to conquer a new kingdome in the ayre with the ruine of the widow and the Orphelin? This was not decreed, nor practised by the good & wise King Charles, whereunto he had bound his son, who should not suffer the memory of his fathers ashes to bee taxed with this dishonor. The Chancellor Dourmans speaks at the Regents request, hee laies before their eyes the necessity of this voyage, whereby both the King and Realme might reape profit and honor, promising the King should provide for the reliefe of the people. This was gently put off, to makethem lose this humour in diuiding them, but the people continue more obstinate, they require a plaine and resolute answer to their demand, so as the next day, they come in troopes before the Kings lodgings, where the whole counsell was assembled with the Regent.

The King giues audience to the prouost of Merchants in the peoples name, who delivers the same complaints. Then Iohn de Marais an aduocate in Parliament, an eloquent and popular man, prepared carefully for the purpose, makes a goodly & artificiall oration to diuert the people from this bitterness, laying before them their duties, the necessity of the Kings affaires, and the good which should redound by the enterprise of this foreign warre. Hee omitted nothing of the office of a good Orator, but he prevailed not, for the people going from thence, without respect of the King or his counsell, runne presently to the Iewes, Lombards, & such other Merchants houses as had been accustomed to gather all publike exactions, they break vp their shops & counting-houses, they take away what was good, and ill intreat all such as they meet of their profession, yet they kill no man in this first tumult. The Regent winking at this insolency, and fearing lest it should increase by mouing the people already in choller, thinkes it best to referre the matter to another time, vntill the fume of this bitter discontent were blowne ouer, aduertisements coming from all parts of the realme, that the Cities grew into the like humour.

But all this dissuades him not from his enterprise, he employs all such as he thinkes fit to win the people. Iohn de Marais, Peter de la Riviere, James Andelle, & such like Tribunes, who seemed to be in credit with the people, in shewing themselves affected to the common good: And to lose no time, he prepares his army, being resolute to leauy this imposition by force, whatsoeuer it cost. The farmers of this leauy, haue charge to begin it. A Collector at the Halles requiring a denier from a poore woman, for a basket of herbs, she crying out, a great troope flocke about this Collector and reare him in peeces.

But this is not all, in this tumult all runne together on heapes: Porters, Pedlers, Carriers, Butchers, Taverners, and such like, the scumme of the baser sort, they goe in troopes to the towne-houfe, they breake open the doores, and take such armes as they finde. By the Constables command they had made beetles or axes to arme their men withall, they take them, and so yse them, as this sedition was afterwards called, by the name of Mulins. Being thus armed, they goe to the Farmers lodgings, beat downe the doores, breake open cofers, cubboards, and counting-houses, they draw forth their bookes and papers, they teare and burne them, they take away money and mouebles, and in the end they kill and massacre all the Farmers they can finde, searching all corners of their houses. They cry that one had saued himselfe in Saint Iames Church at the Butchery, they runne thither,

A thither, and murder him holding the Image of the blessed Virgin in his armes. Some faue themselves in S. Germaines Abbey, where they are presently besieged. But whilst that some labour after this siege, the rest run to the prisons of the Chasteler and Fourl' Euefque where they release the prisoners and arme them. They bethinke themselves of a head, there was a very sufficient man in prison named Hugh Aubriot, who in former times had beene Prouost of the Merchants, and had with honour executed great charges; both in the Treasury and State, but for certaine dislikes of the Vniuersitie, (which was then in great credit at Paris) hee was condemned to perpetual prison. This multitude drawes him forth, vpon promise to be their leader, but being at liberty he slips away and retires wisely to Dijon: being loth to ingage himselfe in these popular confusions; the which discreet men doe flie as plagues in a common-weale. This rabble finding themselves countenanced with a Commander so well experienced, presume farther, yet seeing themselves abandoned by the departure of Aubriot, and recalling themselves from this phrensie, their hearts faint, and euery one bethinkes himselfe how to yeeld an account of that which had chanced, all this zeale of publike good vanishing away with the consideration of priuate danger. Such as had most to lose (finding themselves actors in these insolencies) seeke for counsell of Iohn de Marais a popular Aduocate, intreating him to be intercessor for them vnto the King. The Vniuersity is also requested to employ their credit with the Prouost of Merchants and other notable Citizens, which were not guilty of these phrenesies.

There is a number chosen to goe to the King, and to sue for pardon. These deputies, in their habits, countenances and words, shew the greatest sorrow that may bee, for an offence committed. Iohn de Marais is their Aduocate, the King hauing heard them, sends them away, vntill his Counsell had aduised what answer to make: who decrees, That for punishment of this popular insolency, the City of Paris should pay a hundred thousand Franks, and the heads of this sedition (with such as had broke the prisons,) should bee at the Kings discretion.

They sue to the King for pardon.

This decree is deliuered to Iohn de Marais to make knowne vnto the Parisians, in whose name he had spoken to the Kings Counsell. He acquaints them with the Article for the defence, and conceales the punishing of the Authors of this sedition: whether it were by commandement, or otherwise, the History makes no mention: yet he kept their heads and his owne for the Scaffold, as we shall presently see, to reape the deserved punishment for dealing in these dangerous affaires, and to pay a deare interest of their popular brokerage. The Parisians tamed by this reprehension, pay the hundred thousand Franks, as a fine for their folly, and the whole taxation imposed for the warre of Naples, without any question.

These summes are giuen to the Regent for his voyage into Italy, where his brethren, the Constable of Clifton, and the greatest part of the Counsell wished him, rather then in France (the Chancellor Dourmans only excepted, who soone shall reape the fruit of his departure) notwithstanding any shew they made him, to see him in good way to settle his greatnesse. He parts from Paris taking an honourable leaue of the King, of his brethren, and of the whole Court, leauing the Regency to the Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne, vntill his returne. But taking the way of Italy, he takes the way of much paine, and the Rendezvous of death, which soone swallowes vp both his life and all his designs. His army was goodly, some say 30000 horse, and an infinit number of foot: others 30000 men, without specifying horse or foot, but all agree that he went to the conquest of this Realme, not only well accompanied, but also well furnished with siluer, the necessary finewes of a long war. They gaue out, that it was the Treasure of Charles the 5. the which he caused Sansy to deliuer in the beginning of his Regency.

The order of the History commands me now to set downe the titles of the Realme of Naples, for the which our Lewis of Aniou marcheth into Italy with his army, and the success of this voyage. We haue said that Charles (brother to the King S. Lewis Duke of Aniou and Earle of Prouence by his wife Beatrice, was called to the Realme of Naples by Pope Vrbane the 4. and conquered the possession by his sword, hauing defeated Manfred and Conradin of Sueuia.

That he was dispossessed of Sicilia at the Sicilian Euen-song, by Peter of Arragon, sonne in law to Manfred, fauoured by Nicholas the 4. taking from Charles what his predecessor

Vrbane had giuen him, so as after hee had contended long with Peter of Arragon, the Realme of Naples remained vnto him, leauing it to his children with more trouble the content. This Charles of Aniou brother to S. Lewis, had many children, Charles, Robert, Lewis, and Philip. Lewis furnished the Lame, married Mary daughter of Stephen King of Hungary. Charles Martel had two sons, Lewis and Andrew, Lewis was Prince of Durazzo or Durachium, and Philip Prince of Tarentum. All appeared on this Theater in some fort, but Robert second son to Charles, was King of Naples, and Earle of Prouence: he had one sonne named Charles, who succeeded him in these two Estates, and he had but two daughters, Joane and Marguerite.

Joane as the eldest, was Queene of Naples & Countesse of Prouence, and was married to Andrew brother of Lewis King of Hungary, a loose and an audacious Princeesse, who fled her husband (as we haue said) and married with Lewis son to Philip Prince of Tarentum her cousin against all order. Lewis King of Hungary, son to Charles Martel, comes to Naples, to reuenge the murder and adultery of this mastiue bitch: who flies with her incestuous husband into Prouence, yielding him the free possession of the City of Naples, and that of the greatest part of the Realm, some places remaining in Apulia, in the guard of certain Captaines, confident seruants vnto Joane, who were the means to put her again speedily in possession of that Estate, soone won and soone lost. It is manifest that the inheritance of the Realme of Naples belongs to the Sea of Rome. Lewis King of Hungary being victor, hauing performed the duty of a good brother, and done all hee could against this villanous murderesse, returns home, leauing all his new conquest to the disposition of Pope Clement the 6, a Limosin, then resident in Auignon.

Joane means to recouer Naples.

Joane who was neer vnto him, and to whom Auignon (where the Popes had now long held their Sea) belonged, had no great labour, for yielding Auignon vnto him she recouered Naples, both by the Popes fauour (who had the chiefe authority,) as also by money, wherewith she did both win the Gonernors of places most easie to corrupt, and also leaued an army to force them that were most affected to the King of Hungary. Now she is settled againe in the Realme of Naples, with her adulterer Lewis of Tarentum, who surruined not long after this exploit of Naples and the sale of Auignon. After his death she maries presently with Lames of Arragon, Duke of Calabria of whom shee was soone weary, falling in loue with Otho of Brunwicke, a yong Germane Prince, of a good house, but not of ability to support Joane, so as she held him not as a husband, but vsed him as a Stallion. Amiddest these alterations of Naples, the Sea of Rome, was not quiet, for after the death of Pope Gregory the 11, who retired from Auignon to Rome, the Colledge of Cardinals fell to a horrible contention for the Popes election: the Romanes being relucate to haue one of their owne nation, and the French one of theirs, from whence sprung that strange Schisme whereof we shall speake.

Vrbane the sixt, was chosen at Rome, after the decease of Gregory the eleuenth, and the French Cardinals yielded to this election, but for that they said they had been forced by the Romanes, who had them in their power and threatened to kill them, vnder colour to change the aire, hauing obtained leaue to go to Anagnia, they retire to Fundi, a City of the realme of Naples, fauoured by Queene Joane, French by stocke and humor, and then they choose Clement the 7, for Pope, to oppose him against Vrbane. Clement retired to Auignon, and Vrbane keeps at Rome.

A Schisme in the Church.

Two Popes, two Seas, two Factions, which trouble all Christendome with horrible confusions. Clement seeks to fortifie himselfe, and as France held for him, so did he labour to haue Naples wholly at his deuotion, by reason of the neereresse, much importing for the City of Rome, where the chiefe quarrell was debated. Contrariwise Vrbane the sixt to bee reuenged on Joane, (a partisan to Clement the seuenth his enemy) hath recourse to Lewis King of Hungary the first interested, being brother to him whom this trumpet had slaine, that hee might oppose the same scourge which had already corrected her. But Lewis excusing himselfe by his age, and the infirmity of his body, sent him Charles issued from that Lewis Prince of Durazzo, who wee said, was sonne to Charles of Aniou, seeking euen in the race it selfe, a man to punish this wicked woman giuing him a goodly army to that end. Joane seeing this great storme ready to fall on her, flies to Pope Clement the 7, and by his aduice adops our Lewis Duke of Aniou, of whom we now treat.

Lewis having prepared his army and being crowned King of Naples & Sicilie by Pope Clement the seuenth in Auignon, hee lands at Naples, to take possession of the Realme, whereunto the lawfull heire and the Popes authority did call him. But he came too late, for Charles of Durazzo (being parted from Hungary with his army, and happily landed) entered the Countrey, ouer-came Otho, the pretended husband of Joane, and holding him prisoner, hee forced this miserable woman to yield vnto his mercy, the which was too great, for that hee only caused her to bee smothered betwix two pillows, desfering as cruel a death as her life had bene execrable. Notwithstanding all these difficulties, Lewis of Aniou (thrust forward by his owne ambition,) proceeded hauing giuen such order to his affaires (after the adoption made by Joane in his fauour, and the Popes coronation) as hee procured all the Captaines of places to hold for him, hauing ingaged them by money and golden promises, so as many places held good for him: and the people desired him, being glad to be freed from Joane, and to haue so mighty a Lord, to maintaine them in peace.

Queene Joane taken and smothered.

Lewis enters the Realme of Naples: at the first he wins Tarentum and Beri, but whilest he determines to proceed in his designs, death surpriseth him, making an end of his insinuation and of all his toyles: but not of his childrens, Lewis & Charles, nor of their posterities. Thus Charles Prince of Durazzo, of the race of Aniou (called the Hungariens, for that he had bene borne and bred in Hungary, and brought vp by King Lewis) remained peaceable King of Naples, leauing two children, Ladislaus and Joane, who shall prepare a new stage, whereon our Princes shall soone play their parts, as you shall vnderstand. Let vs now returne to France: The Duke of Anious departure put all authority into the hands of the Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne, who began to manage the affaire of State at their pleasures. There was no great loue betwix them, although they were brethren, but onely to maintaine themselves against such as might hinder their ambitious projects. And for that they had knowne the Chancellor Dourmann, to bee wholy affected to the Regent, they perswaded the yong King to dismisse him, for some reasons, the which are not specified in the History. But Princes want no colours when they will disgrace their seruants. Peter Orgerius was appointed in his place, after the seale had remained some time in the hands of Robert of Corby first president of the Court of Parliament at Paris, and of Philip Moulins a Chanoin of the said City. But Flanders (which alwaies bred some monsters in that age) stirred vp by the English, and putt vp by the ridiculous conclusion of this great and vaine preparation, began new troubles, and had practices with them of Paris, to draw the rest of the Cities of the Realme into some popular league. These newes put the King into great perplexity, the rather for that he had surprisid certain letters from the Mailloins of Paris, to the white caps of Gant, to make a correspondence betwix them, the accustomed leuaine of rebellion with ill aduised people.

The Chancelor Dourmann
disgraced.

As these things amaze both the King and his vncles, behold Richard lands at Calais, with an army vnder the command of the duke of Lancaster, who at the first spoiles Picardy, and then plants himselfe before Ypre, and besiegeth it. The Gantois had made a good lew, both to the King, and Duke of Bourgogne, vntill that time, seeming resolute to obserue their former accord: but the English army being entred into Flanders, they goe to field, and ioyned with them before Ypre. The Kings vncles muster men in all places with great diligence, and intreat their neerest friends to come speedily to their succour. The Dukes of Loraine and Bar make haste, the Duke of Britanie comes with a goodly troupe. They haue suddenly assembled 20000 Frenchmen at armes, besides the succors of Loraine and Britanie, the number of foot is not specified.

The English
enter Picardy

Charles (thus accompanied) comes to Saint Denis in France, and hauing leaue of the Maryrs (according to the ancient custome of Kings) and giuen the foreward of his Army to the leading of the Constable Cliffon, and the Duke of Britanie. (the Constable marching before the Duke, by reason of his place) the ground of a dislike fell out betwix them, which being nourished by diuers occasions, shall bee the subiect of a great disaster for the King and Realme.

A great quarrel grows betwix these two commanders.

The King followed (accompanied with the Dukes of Berry, Bourgogne and Bourbon vncles, and the dukes of Loraine and Bar: hee lodgeth at Blandelle, two leagues from Calais, with an intent to charge the English, who presently leaue the siege of Ypre, Calais and Grauelins, and retire to Bergues, where Charles presently besiegeth them. lish demands a parlee with the Duke of Britany, they put him in mind of the benefite he had receiued from their nation, and demand requittall in this occurrent. The duke of Lancaster remains at Calais, by reason of his weaknesse: the English Capitaines require respit to vnderstand his pleasure.

Charles makes a trace with the English.

The King confide what course to take with the multitudeous Parisians.

In the end the King receiues them vpon honest conditions, to depart with baggage and to leave Flanders, the which they performe. Being returned into England, they are accused to haue sold the Earldome of Flanders to the French, so as by Richard command they are beheaded. The Gantois made a durisfull answer, and promised obedience and loyalty to the King. A truce was concluded for one yeare with the English, by meanes of the Duke of Lancaster for King Richard, and the Duke of Berry for our King Charles. Such was the issue of this sudden voyage of Flanders, being a meane to settle businesse of a deeper consultation and more dangerous consequence; seeing it concerned not only the heart, but the whole body of State. They fought how to suppress the sedition, which was apparently bred in Paris, and by their example, in many great Cities of the Realme. To this end Charles vpon his returne from this voyage, staid at S. Denis with his Vncle, the Constable, Chancellor, and his whole Councell: they were all troubled to resolve in so important a cause. For what should they doe? To punish the poore people tired with the wars, thrased with losses, halfe dead by the feeling of so great calamities, that were to beat one lying sicke in his bed for his waywardnesse, and not cure him of the paine which is the cause thereof. It were a meane to driue him to despair, to apply a remedy worse then the disease. And not to punish them, would argue feare, and make them grow more proud and insolent, a meane to animate them to all iniquity, and to lay the way open to a disordered rebellion.

But the last aduice prevailed, being well verified, that since the paiement of the fine, the Parisians were growne worse, and more bitter: hauing had conference with the Gantois audacious mutines, and the right artisans of rebellion, holding it a vertue to play the men against their naturall Lords: and also had so farre abused the Kings bounty, as they had presumed to sollicite the best Cities of the Realme to the like disorder. It did greatly import for the good of the Kings seruice and of the State, that such phrenesies should be suppressed by an exemplary punishment done vpon the chiefe authors. John de Meun was very deepe engaged in these tumults, and the more dangerously, for that hee cast a stone, and withdrew his arme, and making a shew of seruice to the King, he fed the people in these mad humors, very torches of sedition, vnder a colour of the common weale, for who can beleue they would put so famous a person to death without some iust cause. I know they write diuersly, and euery man hath his iudgment free: yet is it not true, but likely, that in pardoning a whole multitude offending, they would punish him in whom there were no shew of offence. If he were not culpable at the least, he was accused of the which was the subiect of a publike condemnation.

Charles being aduised to punish the Parisians for the insolencies they had committed in his presence, caused his army to lodge about the City, and on a certaine day hee came for the Prouost of Merchants and the Sherifffs, who come vnto him to Saint Denis, a countenance full of humility, and shew of amendment. The King gaue them to vnderstand, by Peter Orgement his Chancellor, that he meant to go to his City of Paris, to nish the rebels and seditious, who had not respected his presence. The prouost answered: That the whole body of the City was wonderfully grieved for that which had bene committed by men in despaire, worthy to be severely punished, but the Citizens had no community with these rascals, and that the whole City was ready to doe him faithfull seruice.

The King enters Paris with his army.

There were many about the King which made all odious that concerned the Parisians, but Charles made them no other answer, but that he would be soone at Paris, and what reason and the duty of a good King required. Hee caused his foreward to be led by the Constable Cliffon and the Marshall of Sancerre, who seize vpon the which they found open without any guards. The King accompanied with the Duke of Berry, Bourgongne, and Bourbon, with other Lords of his Councell, and an infinite number of Noblemen and Gentlemen in great shew, terrible to the people, marched to the City. Being come to S. Denis gate, hee caught the barres to be beaten downe. The Prouost of Merchants, the Sherifffs, with the chiefe Inhabitants of the City, crying the keyes, beseech the King to giue them audience: he denyeth them, and passeth on to the house of Saint Pol, but the army is dispersed throughout all the quarters of the City. Presently they take away all the chaines, and send them to Bois de Vincennes. They search all houses for armes, the which are instantly caried to the Louure and the Bastille. The Dukes of Berry and Bourgongne, with the Prouost and his Archers, goe through out the City, causing 300 of the most seditious to be apprehended.

The next day many heads were stricken off at the Halles, and amongst the rest, that of John de Meun, whom all men had heard of late discourse so eloquently with admiration, being held for the Oracle of France. These executions were done by fits, with such a shew of grauity, as the seat of Iustice did more terrifie, then the executioners arme vpon the scaffold. A whole day was spent in these flow proceedings, the City gates being kept so straitly, as no man might issue forth: houses and shops were shut vp, with so great a silence, as if all had bene dead, euery man being hidden in his house, or else so amazed as he durst not looke into the streets. The Vniuersity (which then was in great credit with the King) becometh sutor for the people, and beseecheth him not to include the innocent with the culpable. The King answereth coldly, that he would aduise what to doe, willing them to retire. In the meane time a great scaffold is made on the highest staire of the Palace, before the great image of Philip the Faire, with great shew and pompe: in the midst was a royall Throne, and seats on either side.

John de Meun
a famous aduoc-ate, with many others, excepted.

The Heralds giue commandment throughout the City in the Kings name, that euery man should repaire to the Palace at a certaine houre. The King sitting in his seat of iustice hauing on either side of him, the Dukes of Berry, Bourgongne and Bourbon his Vncles, with all the rest of his Councell in order, he commanded Peter Orgement his Chancellor, to deliuer his mind to the people of Paris. The multitude being disarmed, compassed in round about with armed men, being bare-headed, they sal vpon their knees, seeing Orgement rise from his chaire: who hauing made a great obeysance to the King, hee turnes to the multitude. If thou hadst (quoth he) O City, as much care of thy duty, as thy Kings haue, speech to the Parisians.

Orgement

thou wouldst remember the soueraigne bounty and clemency of our late King of happy memory, Charles truly wife, who (despising errors which thou hadst committed against his father being a prisoner, without any respect, afflicting the afflicted, and supporting his capitall enemy against him, with all treachery and infoleny. Thou canst not deny, ingratefull people, how much thou wert indebted to that good Prince: duty did binde thee to sacrifice thy selfe cheerfully for him in his afflictions. But all these things being troden vnder foot, hee vied towards thee all humanity, which the most affectionate and faithfull subiect may hope for of his Prince. His sonne our King seated at this day in the royall throne, and heyre to his vertues, hath followed his fathers steps in this mildnesse and clemency, hauing supported thee more then a father could doe his child. But thou hast followed being mad and ingratefully thy wretched disposition, suffering thy selfe to be furiously transported by thy wicked Councillors (the fire-brands of sedition and disobedience) and by the vnruly passions of thy blind fury. The goodly worke thou hast made of late, the disloyall intelligences thou hast with those mutines, enemies of all command and policy: the audacious practices thou hast presumed to make in the Cities of this Realme: and the blood which thou hast spilt in the bowels of this thy Country, whereof she hath horror, feeling her bosome polluted with the blood vniuilly shed by thy violent hands. All these horrible and tragick effects are knowne to the world: for the which thou canst yeeld no excuse, which doth not double the offence. O wretched people! be not these authentick testimonies to the whole Realme, yea to all nations, of thy ingratitude, disloyalty, cruelty, villany, and fury? Misable, what hast thou deserued? The Kings bounty? But thou hast treacherously abused it. Thou hast made shew to contemne publike authority, drunke with thine owne frenzie, and of thy wicked Councillors. The King, the King I say, shall make thee feeble, that hath one arme to support and maintaine the good, and another to punish and reuege the wicked. Thou hast seene examples vpon these wicked heads, which made thee forget thy duty; but the punishment is light in regard of the offence: neither dost thou see any smart, whereof thou thy selfe art not the cause. Orgement hauing thus ended, comes vnto the King: My Liege (sayth he) is this it which your Majesty commanded me nee to say vnto the people. It is (answered the King) but this sufficeth not, in regard of what they haue deserued. This short and rough answer from the King, the Chancellors speech, vttered with great vehemency, and especially the blood freshly spilt, which they did see as it were rebound vpon the place of execution: the fearful armies wherewith the people were compassed in, had brought them into extreame perplexity, like men already in the graue: so as euery one bethought himselfe, according to his offences he had committed: and such as had wealth, according to the enemies which did maligne them, being terrified with the tragick spectacle of Iohn de Marsis.

They stand all mute, their eyes fixed on the ground, prostrate before his throne, men and women, yong & old, infant in number. In this great silence the Dukes of Berry and Bourgongne rise from their seats with a very mournfull countenance, and fall at the Kings feet, beseeching him to haue pity of his poore City of Paris, and not to comprehend the innocent with the culpable, good men with rascals vnworthy of his grace. Presently after their speech, without expecting any answer from the King, the sorrowed this miserable people, suppressed during these complaints and threats, burst forth into lamentable a cry, as if the whole City had beene lost. All cryed for mercy: there was nothing but cries, lamentations and howlings of women & men, old and yong. The Ladies and Gentlewomen of the City, with their heire hanging downe, full of teares, cry out: Liege Lord, will you ruine your City of Paris for some rascals? let it begin by vs and ours, we desire not to suruiue this misery: take pity (Liege Lord) of your people, who sue for pity. The people cry out againe with a fearful voyce, Mercy, Mercy.

The Parisians
cry for mercy.

This spectacle was pitifull to behold: there was no heart so hard but relented. The King in the end answered, (the noise being quieted,) That he would not punish the goods for the bad, and that he did pardon the people, vpon condition, they should be better aduised hereafter, and not suffer themselves to be seduced by these wicked ring-leaders of sedition. That for Gods sake, and as his Vncles suit, hee gaue life vnto the prisoners, paying such fines as his Councell should decree. Those to whom the prisoners belonged, cryed out, God save the King: and the people freed from their feare, redouble their cries with great ioy, all so they all depart. The Councell decrees, That forasmuch as the City of Paris had been engaged in this sedition, they should be deprived of their Magistrates, chaires, and armes: and should lose all priuiledges vntill the King had otherwise determined. That for recompence of this capitall crime, as well the prisoners, as all others guilty of the sedition, according to information duly made, should pay the moeyie of their goods. The which was speedily put in execution, to send home the men of war, by means of the great summes of money which they leauied by this exaction. Thus the sedition at Paris was suppressed, and afterwards at Rouen and Orleans, but with farre more rigour then at Paris. An example for all subjects, how to oppose themselves against their Lords: who soone or late make them to reape the fruits of their rashnesse and insolency. Their Magistrates, chaires, armes, and all priuiledges, were soone restored to the Parisians, by means of the D. of Bourgongne, who from that time sought all means to creepe into the peoples fauour, which hee did as well as the sonne shall vie no lesse then the Nauarrois had done: this happened in the year of our Lord God 1387. in the month of December. This iust execution did greatly comend the yong age of Charles, for that in so follemne an act, he had caried a countenance worthy of a Royall Maiesty: His age and the name of a King, made him know that he was a King, together with the daily instructions which did sound in his cares, by his inward and truethy seruants: yet his Vncles kept him still in his minority, disposing matters in Councell by their authority. Charles was much discontented with this proceeding of the Dukes of Berry and Bourgongne, who should rather haue preuented them: hee them, experience hauing taught all Frenchmen what hee was. Hee therefore seeks a remedy for their error.

Hee caused a Councell to be held at Rhemes, where it was decreed, That Charles should be free from the government of his Vncles: for that both his age and the proofe of his iudgment did testifie plainly that hee was worthy to gouerne his Realme. This resolution greatly displeased the Dukes of Berry and Bourgongne, who would gladly haue had longer possession of this Royall authority which they enioyed, being discontented with such as had put this spirit into the yong King. The Cardinall of Laon (one of the authors of this Councell) enioyed it not long, for hee dyed (not without suspicion of poyson)

these.

A poyson Iohn of Montague shall pay both principall and interest in his time. Iohn Mortier and the Lord of Noiant shall haue their parts, these shall now enter into quarter, and haue all the credit. It is this Noiant which caused the golden Hart in the Palace to be made for a modell of that which he would make of gold, of the Ingots he had gathered together in the Treasury, hauing reduced the coyned money into this forme. Left Charles a yong Prince and very bountifull, should giue it away prodigally. The Dukes of Berry and Bourgongne retire themselves quietly to their houles, making a shew to be very well satisfied, although they hatched a great discontent, and especially Philip, being a man of an imperious and insupportable spirit.

We haue drawne Charles out of his Minority, the first parcell of our discourse: let vs now see his Maioyrie, into the which I tremble to enter, foreseeing so happy a beginning to haue so lamentable an end. But alas! what shall we see therein, which wee haue not scene in our miserable age. Our experience shall bee vnto vs a mournfull commentary, most true in the reigne which we are to represent.

The Maioyrie of King CHARLES the sixt:

Remarkable in two respects: Of Health, and Sickness.

HE reigned thirteene yeares, either with his Vncles, or alone in his good sense, and 29 in phrensie, not ruling but ruled, or rather rauished by the sundry passions of others. So wee will distinguish his Maioyrie, according to the calculation of these two seasons, and in either of them the most famous acts of these home-bred confusions.

The first time of the Kings Health,

From the year 1388, vnto 1393.

FRANCE enioyed a long rest, the tempest of these popular tumults being pacified. Flanders subdued, and the English forced to hold a truce (by reason of their homebred quarrels, the which brought forth strange effects, as wee shall hereafter see) Charles then undertook the charge of his Realme, to gouerne alone, without any Tutor. The flower of his youth, framed to great affaires, and commendable for his mild disposition, promised the fruits of a reigne both wise, moderate, peacefull, and most happy. But oh the vanity of mans hopes! a dreame of him that wakes a fruitlesse pipe which hunts and gets nothing.

Being freed from the government of others, hauing absolute authority, he was desirous to marry Lewis his onely brother, and to giue him authority: neither would he abandon his cousins of Anjou, Lewis and Charles, in their pretensions to the Realme of Naples. The Estate of Milan did wonderfully import to aduance this action, for the countditties in hath in Italy: To this end he married his brother Lewis with Valentina the daughter of Iohn Galeas Duke of Milan, a marriage which succeeded not according to his desire, no more then his owne. An Italian woman ioyned with a Germane, shall make strange work: to shew, that all is not gold that glisters: for both these marriages were built vpon grounds of apparent good, as farre as humane reason could comprehend, to the end they might haue great intelligences both in Germany and Italy, alliances which import much for the good of France. Philip of Valois, the kings brother, & Iohn Duke of Orleans, were dead without children, and the Duchy returned to the Crowne. Charles giues this Duchy to his brother Lewis, who was but Earle of Touraine, and now shall be Duke of Orleans, and by this name shall be much spoken of.

In this profound peace, it was necessary for Charles to make himselfe knowne to his subjects, after so many confusions. He makes a progresse into Languedoc, one of the remotest Provinces from his chiefe City, lying vpon the Mediterranean Sea, and yet one of the most fertile and best affected to the Crowne. He had especial reasons to visit this goodly Province, for the great complaints they made against the Duke of Berry their Gouernour, who committed great extortions by his officers, vnder colour of authority. Charles passeth by Dijon to see his Vncle the Duke of Bourgongne, who accompanys him to Avignon. The Earle of Sauoy comes vnto him, the people of Dauphine and

Viarez shew a wonderfull ioy to see their King after so troublesome a time. So he comes to Auignon, being kindly received, and much made of by Pope Clement the 7, who could not stand without him, having Frabane the 6, for his competitor. The widow of Lewis Duke of Aniou repaired thither, who by the fauour of Charles caused Lewis the second, her eldest sonne to bee crowned King of Naples. This course wee must hold for the continuance of our History.

From Auignon he went into Languedoc to settle his authority, the which was much respected by the people of that Country, but had been greatly blemished by the government of the Dukes of Aniou & Berry his Vncles, Gouvernors of that goodly Prouince one after another. He staies at Montpellier, a City of a goodly & pleasant situation; where he heard many complaints against the Duke of Berry his Vncle, for his great oppression of the country. But the absence of this Prince, and the authority of his name staied the remedy to another season. The Estates of the country made sure to haue the Earle of Foix for their gouernor, hauing heretofore liued quietly vnder him; but he would not accept of this gouernment, without the good liking of the Duke of Berry, so as all the punishment fell vpon Betizac, his chiefe Treasurer, who was burnt at Beziers, purging in the fire the extortions he had committed vnder his masters authority.

death of the Nauarrois.

At that time Charles King of Nauarre died, so often blemished in the truth of this History: we haue noted how he had retired himselfe from Court, into his Realme of Nauarre. As this retreat was vnto him a reproachfull banishment, so this shamefull folitarie was a ciuill death. But the Catastrophe of his tragicall life was a famous proof that God doth often reuenge notable sins by notable punishment euen in this life. He was much broken by the excess of venvy, and all sorts of dissolutions, the which he had exceedingly vsed with his wonderfull tyranny & cruelty. As they did anoint him with medicines fit to warme & comfort his benumbed members (some say they had chafed him with Aqua viua, and wrapt him in a sheet) behold, fire takes hold of this sheete with such violence, as (being vnable to quench it) he was consumed by degrees, liuing some daies, a suffering his paine; and that which increased the horror of Gods iudgment, his death made both great and small to reioyce, and was received in France with as great content as the winning of a great and famous battell. There was a general truce betwixt the French and English. So as the garisons lying still, the souldiers bred vp and nourished in armes, fighting no more by order vnder their ensignes, sought now their prey by disorder vpon the labourer and Merchant. The Countries of Rouergue, Perigord, Limosin, Auvergne, and La Marche, had English garisons, who spoiled these Countries and did runne vp into the neerest parts of Languedoc, Velai, Gvaudan, Viarez, and Suenna, where the villages are for the most part walled in, to prevent these sudden incursions. There were many theues amongst them: Teste noire or Black-pate in the Castle of Ventador, Amerigo Marcel at Roch-Vandais, who breaking the truce, sought to be supported by the King of England, but in the end they all fell into the hangmans hands, punished miserably by some strange death, an Image of our late confusions. Liberty break vp these warriors with so great abundance, as the English passed the sea to make highways, and to fight at barriers, as they vie at great triumphs. There was a Tike betwixt Calais and Saint Inqueluert, where the Nobility made triall of their valour in a schoole of Fence. To take away this troublesome abundance, they tooke occasion to make long voyages into Castile and Italy, but in the end there was a very famous offered against the miscreants of Barbary, at the Geneuois request, who suffered in commodities in their trafficke, by these barbarous Africans. Charles granted them, willingly, and gaue the charge of this war to Peter Duke of Bourbon, assisted with Earles of Auvergne and Foix, the Lords of Coucy, Guy of Tremouille, John of Vienne, Admiral of France, Philip of Arthois Earle of Eu, Philip of Bar, Harcourt, Anioi, Linge, Pyquiny, and many other great men from all parts of the Realme, which made so famous an action, vnder so worthy a Commander, and at so great a losse, painful then the toyle of warre to men that desired nothing but employment. The King of England, to imitate Charles, granted succour to the Geneuois, vnder the command of the Earle of Salisbury, accompanied with many Noblemen and English souldiers, moued with desire like vnto the French, in the enterprise of this plecting warre. The Deputies of the kings of France and England assembled to treat of a general peace,

A voyage into Africke by the French & English together.

A but not able to effect it, they continue a truce for foure yeares, with goodly prouisions against robberies, for the safety and quiet of their Estates. Charles gaue free passage to the English, by the Countries of Languedoc and Dauphin, to passe the Alpes safely.

All come to Genoa, to the great ioy of the Geneuois. Being shipt, they land within few dayes in Barbary. Presently they besiege the City of Africke (so our History termes it) as bearing the name of all the worst and barbarous Country. They call the African commanders Agadinquor of Olfierne, and Brabadist of Thunes. But our Argonauts found them which stayed their fury. The Barbarians defended themselves with an obstinate resolution. But their force did them lesse harme then the ayre, and died, being very contrarie to their complexions; so as our army decreased daily, especially of men of accompt. This siege continued fixe weekes with much losse and no hope to preuaile. The Geneuois hauing conceived a hope of a sudden victory, began to grow cold and slacke in furnishing of the army. The Duke of Bourbon foreseeing the difficulties which might grow in continuing obdurate at this siege, fearing the winter, and not trusting the Geneuois (who are famous for that they haue no faith) remembering the example of the King Saint Lewis, resolved to returne, without any greater losse. He trusteth vp his baggage, and brings backe his troopes into France, continuing the example to all such as are capable of reason, how difficult it is for Christians to performe these strange attempts, after the experience of many ages. The French and English hauing liued louingly together in this voyage, returned to their houses without doing any memorable act, but to haue endeauoured to doe something worthy of memory to avoid idleness during so peacefull a time.

The Geneuois abuses Charles
little.

Britany did then conceiue, and afterwards bring forth more preiudicall effects then Barbary it selfe: and the way was made by light occasions to horrible and monstrous effects, to the great preiudice both of the King and Realme: for a notable testimony to posterity, what Councillors, enuy, and ambition, be in a State: wee like wretches seeke for peace, and when God giues it, we flye from it; we maligne another mans good, and deprive our selues of our owne. But alas! it were a small matter for a great personage to hurt himselfe by his owne passions, if this poyson did not spread abroad to the preiudice of the Common-weale.

D We haue said that John of Montfort remained peaceably Duke of Britany: by the death of Charles of Blois, and the agreement he made with his widow, whose eldest sonne John of Britany, Earle of Ponthieure, was redeemed from prison from England by the Constable Clifton, who gaue him his daughter in marriage and payed his ranfome. The Constable was a Britton, and so a subiect to John of Montfort Duke of Britany, his ancient and capital enemy, and yet by this successe was become his Lord.

Doubleless in this quality Clifton could not but yeeld vnto him as his vassall, but as Constable of France and dearly beloued of his master, the greatest Monarch in Europe, and Soueraigne to the Duke of Britany, herein the Duke must needs respect him, his place giuing him authority in many notable actions, ouer the greatest personages within the Realme. This was the ground of their hate, which not onely embarked King Charles, Lord vnto them both, but caried him so farre into the maine, as hee could not avoid a notable shipwracke by their meanes. By the former accord, John of Montfort was to yeeld vnto Clifton all his patrimony, whereon he had seized vnder colour of a confiscation, reuoked by Charles, which he had not yet performed. And although he had promised the King, and giuen him a new assurance, yet did he not trust the King, but continued his intelligence with the English, fortified his places, and coyned both gold and silver against the lawes of State. He refused likewise to acknowledge Clement the seventh for lawfull Pope, whom France approued: not to suffer the Earle of Ponthieure aforesaid to beare the name and armes of Britany. These were the chiefe causes of their complaints and differences. The King and his most secret Councill, Mercier, Montagu, and la Riviere, held for the Constable. The Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne, and the Chancellor Ogerment, for the Duke of Britany, a cunning dissembling Prince, and high minded. He spake proudly, by reason of his intelligence with England, which could not faile him: and mildly when as he found meanes to doe his businesse vnder-hand, and not to breake with the King. Hee comeste Toucy vnto Charles, where after many discourses their quarrels are ended by marriages: the Kings daughter (being yet young) is promised to the Dukes sonne, and the sonne of John Earle of Ponthieure (borne of the Constables daughter) to the Dukes daughter, ter, who promifeth likewife to reftore Cliffon his lands; in fnew friends, but in their heart irreconcilable enemies. Hereupon Cliffon goes into Britany to receive his lands. The Duke held a Parliament at Vannes, whither he called his Nobility. The Conftable comes, fearing no enemy. The Duke had built a caſtle called the Hermine, where he feaſts the States. The Conftable is called, and welcomed with the firſt: the countenance did not ſhew who was prepared for the end of the banquet againſt the Conftable. After dinner the Duke took him by the hand, vnder colour to ſhew him his building, and to haue his aduice, as if a great Captaine and well ſcene in Architecture, he leads him from place to place, through halls, chambers, and cloſets, untill he had brought him to a great Tower, hauing an inner doore, wherein were armed men. The Duke enters firſt, the Conftable follows him, viewing the proportion of this worke, and the thickeſſe of the wals by the window. But behold the Duke flips out of the Tower, where he leaues the Conftable, and ſhuts the doore after him.

The Duke of Britanie ſeizeth treacherouſly on the Conftable,

This ſigne giuen, the armed men ſeize vpon the Conſtables ſword, and keepe him priſoner, putting irons on his legges. The Conſtable was not ſo much amazed at this ſtrange viſage, as the Duke reioyced at this ſweet content of reuenge, thinking to attaine the end of his deſires, to be reuenged of a capital and cruell enemy, and in the heat of his fury commands a faithfull ſeruant of his called Iohn Banalan, to diſpatch the Conſtable preſently. Banalán accepts this charge, but hee doth not execute it. He goes to the Tower and affures himſelfe of the Conſtables perſon, retaining the ſouldiers, whom the Duke commanded to obey him, and ſo he paſſeth the night with the Conſtable. But the night gaue him counſell. The Duke tranſported with ioy in the heat of his choler, goes to his reſt, but care awaked him, and reaſon (of more force then his paſſion) lets him know the fault he had committed, and repentance followed this firſt act. A wife ſeruant in not obeying his maſters paſſion. The Duke lying reſtleſſe a great part of the night, riſeth early the morning, calleth Banalán, and demands what is become of the Conſtable; his paſſion bewrayes his mind before he ſpake, witneſſing the ſhame he had of his choler, & his grief for this furious charge. Banalán comforts him, and affures him that the Conſtable is well. The Duke wonderfully glad of this newes, which freed him from ſo cruell a torment, commands he ſhould be well entreated and with reſpect, attending newes from the King, from whom there comes poſte vpon poſte with complaints and commandements to the Duke.

And repents what he had done.

The Duke without any great delay excuſeth himſelfe of his imprifonment, and ſends the Conſtable to the King. It had beene more auailable for him to haue ſuppreſſed his choler, in committing this error. But he did verſifie, That he which offends doth neuer forgive. The Conſtable goes to the King to Blois, he thanks him for his care in his deſire: the Duke doth likewiſe ſend vnto him, to craue a ſafe conduct to come himſelfe to make his iuſt excuſes, and to ſhew what reaſon had moued him to put the Conſtable in priſon. The Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne holding openly for the Britton, obſtinate for him to come vpon the Kings word. He comes well accompanied, and notably iuſtifies the taking of Cliffon, being his ſubiect, & in his owne country, but alſo he ſheweth the King beholding vnto him for the reſpect he bare vnto his officer, whom once he might iuſtly haue put to death. It is an eaſie matter for great men to manage theſe affairs at their ſeruants coſt! The Conſtable digeſted quietly this new affront, being ſo haue recouered his liberty: but the Duke of Britanies malice ſhall bee the cauſe of great miſery both to the King and Realme, ſeeking new deuices to ſariſſie his choler, a furious beaſt which can neuer be tamed by flattery. It burſt forth vpon a light and ridiculous ſubiect, which bred a horrible Chaos of ſundry confuſions.

Peter Craona Nobleman of the Country of Aniou, had great credit with the King, and with Lewis Duke of Orleans his brother, who loued him ſo dearly, that hee truſted him with his greateſt ſecrets, euen with his amorous paſſions, whereunto his looſe diſpoſition, his age, eaſe, and Court, made him too prone, to the great diſcontent of Valentin his wife, who exceeding iealous of her husband, and an Italian, ſeeking by all meanes to learne how he was affected, feeling him ſo cold to her, ſhee finds no better expedient then to gaine Craona, whom ſhee handled ſo cunningly, as ſhee drew the wordes from his noſe.

Hauing ſpeciall aduerſement of her husbands loues, ſhe threatens the Lady that was beloued,

A beloued, and complains to her husband, naming the reporter. The Duke of Orleans finding himſelfe wronged by this diſloyall affront done him by Craona, in a very light ſubiect, but a prooſe of his rash trechery, vnworthy of ſo ſtrict a frienſhip wherewith he had honoured him, he complained to the King his brother, who loued him exceedingly. Both of them deteſting this diſloyall raſhneſſe of Craona, as a trecherous and an inſufficient man, holding him vnworthy of their ſeruiſe, diſmiſſe him with great diſgrace, reſuſing to ſee him, or to heare his pretended excuſes.

Thus Craona retires to his houſe wonderfully perplexed with this diſgrace, and finding himſelfe not greatly ſafe, he retires to the Duke of Britany his kinſman and more friend, to whom he reports his miſfortune. The Duke embraceth this occaſion, and with a deeper reach, perſwades him that the Conſtable is the cauſe of this diſgrace, making his proſe of the paſſions of theſe young Princes, and proceeding in his diſcourſe, (truſt on by the inueterate hatred he bare him) he perſwades Craona to kill him, to rid the world of ſo pernicious a man: and thereupon offers him his meanes, vpon all occaſions.

This was that miſerable counſell which hatred and malice gaue him, two bad counſellers: for if choler be a ſhort fury, who ſees not by the effect, that hatred is a continuing rage, the mother of reuenges, the ſeed of all miſery to mankind.

As it was ſimply concluded betwixt them, ſo was it vainly executed by Peter of Craon. He had a houſe at Paris, whither he finds meanes to ſend men fit for this murder, and follows himſelfe ſecretly: (an eaſie matter in this great foreſt of Paris) who knowing the houres of Court, and hauing ſet ſpies to obſerue when the Conſtable ſhould goe from the King at night to his lodging, he attends him with his murderers in a little houſe where he ſhould paſſe, and ſets vpon him with twenty armed men.

The Conſtable thinking at the firſt, that the Duke of Orleans had done it in ieſt, made no great regard thereof, but vnderſtanding it was Craona, he defends himſelfe with a great ſkime (ſuch as they did vſually weare in thoſe dayes) who being charged on all ſides by theſe twenty murderers, and crying for ayd, he ſaues himſelfe (all wounded) in a Bakers ſhop.

The people that were neare, came running at this noiſe: Craona ſaues himſelfe on horſebacke by Saint Anthoines gate, with the greateſt part of theſe murderers: three onely were taken in this diſorder.

The Conſtable was caried to his lodging, called the houſe of Mercy (it is now the houſe of Guife, as the Hiſtory obſerues) all wounded. The King and Court (diſquieted by ſo audacious an attempt,) are all the night in tumult. Theſe murderers being examined, confeſſe that Peter of Craon had not onely cauſed them to commit this act, but was alſo preſent at the execution, and ſo they are beheaded.

The King comes to viſit the Conſtable lying in bed: he doth comfort him, and affures him, that he will not leaue ſo execrable an act vnpiſhiſhed. But in effect this affront ſo impudently done to his Conſtable in the boſome of the head City, in the view of all his Court, and in his preſence, together with the ſcorne of his audacious imprifonment, and the piniſhment of Cliffon, who keeping ſilence, the indignities he had ſo oft receiued of the Duke of Britanie, pleaded for him, being ſealed by theſe outrageous wounds. All theſe things put Charles into ſuch a choler, and made ſo great an impreſſion in his heart offered hatred againſt the Duke, as he was farre more ſicke then the Conſtable himſelfe.

King Charles aſſiſted by his Councell, declares Peter of Craon guilty of high Treason, and enemy to the Crowne of France, hauing attempted againſt his chiefe officer, and doth ſee him to come and iuſtifie himſelfe ſpeedily. He is called, and (not appearing) is condemned for his contempt: he is declared a baniſhed man, and his body and goods confiscated. And in the execution of this ſentence, his houſe at Paris was razed. The Tragedy began by this act, in the yeare 1393, in the month of May, but it ſhall continue with many other mournfull acts, and ſhall cauſe new Sceneyes vpon this Stage. This ſentence thus executed at Paris, it went into Aniou and Britany. All Craona places and houſes were ſeized on, and put into the Kings hands: and the Duke of Britany was commanded by the ſame Commiſſioners to deliuer him. The Duke of Britany excuſeth himſelfe, ſwearing that he hath him not in his power, diſcouers the place where he is, makes offer of all his meanes for the execution of iuſtice: he ſends to the King to reiterate his excuſes, affuring him that he was not priuy to this murder. Craona was fled to the towne of Sable in Maine, which which appertained vnto him. Charles (transported with choler) lost both meat and rest, incensed by the Duke of Orleans his brother, and his most trusty seruants, Noyant, Montaigne, and Montague, dreaming of nothing more then to be reuenged of the Duke of Britanie, whom he held to be the very cause of this attempt. Such as were of iudgement and without passion, thought no otherwise. But alas! how weak is mans vnderstanding, even in the best things, wherein there often wants a good proceeding. Charles had great cause to be grieved with the Duke of Britanie, but he should moderate the heat of his choler by the temper of wisdom, expecting wisely a fit opportunity to punish, not troubling the quiet of his mind with such violence, in seeking reuenge of his enemy.

We may well say, That Charles had a good cause, but it was ill managed: and the Duke of Britanie a bad, the which he gouerned with policy. Wherein our Charles should haue vncunning to crosse his enemies cunning, following the example of his wife father Charles the fifth, who vanquished the Nauarrois with patience, and flying the vntempered rage, neffe of Iohn his grandfather, who seeking hastily a reuenge of the same Nauarrois his enemy, did thrust himselfe into a mortall prison.

The children are neither heires of their fathers vertues, nor of their happinesse, whole bodies they haue by the wil of God, being the instruments of their essence, but he referres to himselfe the foueraignty of vertue and happinesse, to gouerne them in the difficult Labyrinths of this world. The Dukes of Berry and Bourgongne aduise the King their Nephew, to leaue the deciding of this quarrell to the Constable and Craon, and not to attempt any thing against the Duke of Britanie, who disauowed the fact, who feeling himselfe oppressed, would seeke for extraordinary remedies to defend himselfe, whereby strange inconueniences might ensue.

But the King was resolute at any hand to make warre against the Duke of Britanie. All are sent for, euery man doth march, the Rendezvous is at Mans. Peter of Craon retires from Sable, whilst this storme riseth: but the King marcheth on, assuring himselfe that he was in Britanie, although some say that he was in Arragon, and that the Queene of Arragon had giuen him intelligence, that she held a French Knight prisoner at Perpignan, who would not discouer his name. This dis tempered choler had much impaired the Kings health, who caried in his face the disease of his mind.

His Physicians dissuaded him from this voyage, as most preiudiciall for his health: and the Duke of Britanie by a new excuse, beseeched him to beleue, that hee had no dealing with Peter of Craon.

The King could not be diuerted by all these difficulties, from passing on in this journey, so wilfully vndertaken by him: although his Vncles found new deuices to stay him, both at Chartres and at Mans, employing his Physitians, to tell him, how dangerous it was to march in Summer, being extremely hot, considering the debility of his health, much impaired since his burning choler, the which had altered his blood, whereof he had prooffe by daily Feuers. But this passion of choler had so possessed his poore affected spirits, that such as were about him, besides himselfe, perceived his grieffe to be the greater, in that he was insensible of what he suffered: and his seruants cried that which they could not but see in him, by the excreame apprehension they had of the harme which was at hand.

Moreover, the Duke of Britanie, to calme this great storme, which was ready to fall vpon him, (although in truth he had hidden Peter of Craon at Sufnet, and was loyall that he had not slaine the Constable Cliffon) sends a certaine Bishop of his Country to the King, called the Beard, a very famous man for the integrity of his life, to beseech him to beleue that he was nothing guilty of this attempt, neither did he know what was become of Peter of Craon, whom he would send vnto him with his hands and feet bound, if he were in his power: That he should not make warre against his owne Country, and against a poore people, which must suffer for another mans folly. In the end this man pronounced the threats of Gods iudgement against Charles, if hee should proceed in this warre, so lightly vndertaken against his vassals and subiects, and against the articles of mariage concluded betwix his daughter and the Dukes sonne, as a seale of their loyallty. This Bishop was heard in Councell, and the Duke of Berry speaking more boldly then the rest (for the authority which his degree and white haies gaue him) laid open all that might hinder this voyage. But Charles kept his eares to all good counsell, hauing his

A braine disposed to the distemperature which shall presently seize vpon him, running headlong into the mischief which should afflict him and all France. He parts from Mans in July, (in an exceeding hot day, as the History sayes, as if all things had conspired to afflict this poore Prince) at fiftie of the clocke in the morning, to receiue the coolnesse of the greatest heat at noone tide, weak in head and mind, dis tempered with choler, grieffe, delight, and languishing: his body wearied with watching and distaste, not able to eate nor sleep, hauing his head muffled with a great hood of scarlet, and his body couered with a thicke, Ierkint of Veluet, (too waighy for a sharpe winter) marching on a landy plaine, so fast with the Sunne-beames, as the strongest did melt in sweat, and were out of breath: being entred the forest of Mans, behold a man bare-headed and bare-legged, attired in a coat of white rugge, steps suddenly forth betwixt two trees, taking hold of the reins of his horse, he stayes him, and sayes vnto him; King, ride no further, but returne backe, for thou art betrayed.

Charles (whose spirits were otherwise dulled) was amazed at this voice, and his blood greatly dis tempered. His seruants run to this man, and with blowes make him leaue the reins of his horse, and so without any further search the man vanished. After this accident there presently follows another. Charles and his Noblemen did ride in troopes diuided by reason of the dust, and he himselfe all alone persue, with the Pages of his chamber, who were so neare vnto him, as they trode on his horses heeles. He that was nearest caried his helmet vpon his head, and the next his lance, being garnished with crimson filke: As the heat of the noone day makes men drouzy on horseback, it chanced the Page which caried his lance, (being very sleepey) let it fall vpon him which caried the helmet, making a great noise, like the rushing of atmes: the King starts with amazement at this noise, and seeing the crimson banderolle of the lance, hauing his spirits weakened with the former distemperatures, transported with the imagination of this voice, sleepey with labour and heat, he imagined himselfe to be compassed in with many armed men which pursued him to the death.

A strange accident befalls the King.

The second season, from the time of the Kings sickness.

From the yeare 1393, to the yeare 1412.

This time of his infirmity is distinguished into many Acts, whereof this is the first.
Scene of a long and mournfull Tragedie.

Thus Charles transported with this frenzy, layes hold on his sword, drawes it, and runs violently after his Pages, and cries amaine, At these Traytors. The Pages concealing at the first, that he had bene displeased for the disorder of the Lance, flye from him. The King followes after, doubling his cry. At this noise the Duke of Orleans runs towards him, to vnderstand the cause. The King layes at him, not knowing him: the Duke flies, and the King followes. The Duke of Bourgongne rides to him: all gather together with a great outcry: Squires and Knights compass in the King, till that being wearied, and his horse out of breath, his most trusty Chamberlaine takes hold of him gently behind, and stayes him, chearing him with flattering words, and speaking vnto him with that familiarity that befits a faithfull seruant to a good master. Then all draw neare vnto him, they take his sword from him, they lay him on the ground, and disrobe him of his thicke veluet linnen, and his scarlet cap, to giue him breath.

His brother and vncles salute him: but he knowes them not, neither makes he any shew to moue, being pensieue, his eyes troubled, turning vp and downe, mute, sighing, panting, mouing both body and head with great amazement. All signes of frenzy appeared in this poore Prince. The Physitians are sent for in haste: they come, but he knowes them not. Brother, Vncles, Lords, Physitians, all sigh: all lift vp their eyes to heauen. Teares fall from the Duke of Orleans eyes: he bears his brest, and crosse his armes, he approacheth neerer to his poore brother, and he recules from him. All are amazed, all confounded.

O my Country! what trouble shall this poore Head giue vnto thy body, but may I lawfully sigh with my Countreymen who sighed then, forgetting the miseries that should befall them by this frenzy, as if my selfe had bene (in this disorder) a witness of so great an

sue of this ac-

an affliction, both to this poore Prince and to his Estate. The History doth very fidelly downe the diuers Censures that were giuen of this accident, both at Rome and Auignon (famous places being then the seats of Popes) and also in England and in France.

The poore subiects (as men whom it concerned) spake soberly, and with what griefe some blaming the duke of Britanie, and Peter of Craon and others the Constable of Clemon, and Mignons of his chamber, who had drawne the King into this action; but all in generall lamented bitterly this great disaster. England was amazed at this report, and for for intrespecially the Duke of Lancaster, who had conferred with our Charles very priuately in the treaty of peace which they had at Amiens. He wept, commending this good wife Prince, being desirous of the good of all Christendome. Rome & Auignon (being then banded one against the other, by reason of the Schism of Antipopes) reioiced at the calamity befalling vnto our poore King. Vrbane (as his professed enemy) triumphed in his misery, whereinto he said he was false by a iust iudgment of God, hauing supported ment his competitor against him. Clement reioiced, for that hee was not fully confirmed in his authority by him: the King hauing busied himselfe with his subiects quarrells, wheras his greatest charge was to restore the dignity of the holy See to her ancient beau-
tie. This the History obserueth of the Censures of these Antipopes.

But the diuine Oracle saies, O how happy is hee that iudgeth wisely of the afflicted, representing an admirable example in the person of Iob, to gouerne themselves discretely in their Censures. Iob hath the testimony of a very good man, and yet he had great afflictions, hauing lost goods, children, house and health, tormented by his wife, and not onely abandoned, but also persecuted by all his friends, in that which was more deare vnto him then his goods, life and credit, whereof they seeked to deprive him, accusing him that he had lined wickedly like an hypocrite, hauing but the shew of a good man, and not the regritie of a good life whereof he made profession. Such is the vaine iudgement of the world, which holds aduersity for a vice, and prosperitie for a vertue; measuring things according to their passions, and not with reason, but the truth doth teach vs another lesson. O Lord how great are thy workes; thy thoughts are very deepe; the ignorant man doth not know them, nor the foole doth not understand them. That wee might know the chastisements of God to be awaies iust, although the causes be vknowne vnto vs.

We cannot denie but there were errors in Charles; but yet we must confesse, (in acknowledging things as they be,) that he was one of the least vicious Kings of France, and if we shall examine the zeale he had to the government of his Estate, hee must hold an honorable rancke among the most vertuous Princes that haue at any time deserued well this Monarchy. Many nearer causes of his infirmity, may be truly and soberly obserued the disposition of his body, his manner of life, the surcharge of affaires, the weaknesse of his braine, the abounding of choller, griefe, and waywardnesse, the want of rest and food, the importunity of his voyage, the terror of his voice, and the noise of armes; to weigh downe the balance ouer-charged with so heauy a burthen. But why from man doe we ascend to God?

Truly God doth hold and gouerne this rod: and as Charles was the head of this great Estate by his wife decree, so hee not onely punished the person of Charles, but the whole body of this Realme: that both great and small might learne by this pittifull spectacle humble themselves vnder the mighty hand of God, who hath created the spirit of man to worke according to his good and wife will; and disposeth absolutely of men and their affaires, as he pleaseth: and that this saying may be the seale of a true and sober hu-militie, I haue haue held my peace O Lord, for thou hast done it, drawne from this Maxim God doth all well, what heeuer he doth. O kings! this famous example belongs to you, in famous a King. O subiects! you must learne by the head of Charles, of what price head is, whom God hath giuen you for King: that you may pray vnto him with all your hearts, to make him fit for the government of the whole body without the which it can not subsist. But I will retume to our Charles. Pardon courteous Reader this digression, for the search of the vse of so famous an Accident.

This new and strange accident made them presently to dismiss the troopes, haue other worke in hand then to make war in Britanie. All the Court is wholly affected to the Kings health. He is presently caried back to Mans: his sicknesse increaseth, hee must be transported to a better aire. The Physitians aduise it should bee to Creil vpon Oise.

A one of the royall Houses, in the Country of Beauuoisin, betwixt Beauuais and Senlis, a pleasant and wholesome seat vpon the riuier. He is conducted thither with great care; but his franticke feuer continues still. They seeked to concale it, left the same thereof should be dishonourable: but truth speaks generally. James Harfely an excellent Physitian of Laon is sent for, and performeth his duty happily, as shall appeare by the event. Nothing wanted that mans wit could deuise to helpe and cure the infirmity of so great a King. Let vs leau Charles in the Physitians hands, and retume to the Crowne as sicke as the head, hauing as great need of a good and speedy remedy.

A Parliament is presently called: they assemble at Paris with all speed: all France mournes for the affliction of their King, whom they loued dearly for his mildnesse, and the singular hope they conceiued of his reigne: whereby Charles purchased the name of Wellbeloued. The Estates assemble to resolute what was necessary for the government of the Realme in this accident. They determine first, what might be fittest for the forme of government, hoping verely of the Kings speedy recovery, being loath to seeke a remedy that might any way preiudice his authority. It was therefore let downe for a law, That they should abstaine from the name of Regent, vnfit in this sudden accident, the King being dead and of yeares. And they concluded, That during the Kings infirmity, and without any preiudice to his authority, the soueraigne government of the Crowne of France should be giuen to the Prince of his blood. But this point being decided, there was another of no lesse dif-ficultie, To what Prince? The order of the Fundamentall law, called Lewis of Orleans the Kings brother, as first Prince of the blood: but neither his age, nor the present necessity could allow thereof. The States yeelding vnto reason, decree, *That being apparently necessary to prouide for the State, by reason of the Kings weaknesse, being very sicke, it were not conuenient to lay so heauy a burthen vpon so weake shoulders, as the Kings brother, a young Prince:

but that the Dukes of Berry and Bourgongne, his Vncles, next to his brother, should haue the go-uernment of the Realme vntill the Kings recovery.* John Duke of Berry was elder then Philip, but hauing purchased an ill fame in Languedoc, to be couetous and violent, hee was nothing pleasing, so as the French were better affected to Philip the Hardy, Duke of Bour-gongne, a cunning, cold, temperate, milde, patient, and popular Prince, but ambitious, disolous, reuengefull, & malicious. Being therefore pleasing to the States, the chiefe charge was imposed on him: the title was common to both brethren, but the effect of the authority was proper to him alone. The Estates adde to their decree (especially in his fauour) that the Duchesse of Bourgongne should haue the first place next to Queene Isabel our sike Kings wife, and by consequence they giue her access to her chamber, and the go-uernment of the children at all euents. This was Marguerite the heyre of Flanders, a woman of a manly courage, raised for her great possessions, and wholly bred to ambition.
This new precedence displeased Valentine the Duchesse of Orleans, who yeelded nothing more in greatnesse of courage. We stand now vpon good termes, that must be gou-erned by three women, a Germane, an Italian, and a Fleming, all which had absolute authority ouer their husbands: whose distaffes did cut like swords, whereof they will giue vs presently a sufficient proofe.

Contention for the government.

Philip Duke of Bourgongne aduanced to the government of the Realme by a decree of the States.

Behold the Kings Vncles now at the helme, to the great discontent of the Duke of Orleans, and of James of Bourbon his Vncle by the mother side. The winde changeth, and the scales turne, the Court is transformed. There are two factions: but that of Berry and Bourgongne is the stronger. The Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon make the other, but there is no equality. The authority of the whole government, and of the treasure, is in their hands to whom the States had decreed it. Such force hath this solemne consent of the French in matter of State.

Two factions in Court.

Such as had bene of Charles his most secret Councell, were out of fauour: the Constable, Beuge de Villaines, Montague, la Riviere, and Mercier, they are all in bad estate for their overthrow is plotted, by what meanes soeuer. The Dukes authority must beginne with them, yet there was no loue betwixt the two brethren (for who can beleeue that bition and couetousnesse are fit to vnite friendships) but onely to ruine their common enemies, and to suppress their authority. Such as were in their rowle, had their turnes, but diuersly. The Duke of Bourgogne standing vpon his guard restrained his imperious wife, who at his first aduancement to this great command, would haue turned all topsie turuy: but he seekes all meanes to prevent his enemies, being resolu'd to begin with the Constable, as with the strongest, and this he concluded with his brother of Berry. Montague cunningly smells out this practice, and with all the best he could carry away, saues himselfe at Auzignon, attending some better opportunity: but he shall returne too soone to lose his head on a scaffold. The Constable Cliffon, at his first speech with the Duke of Bourgogne, is so checkt and threatned by him, as swallowing this pill quietly, he steals out of Paris, and retires to his house at Montlehermy, from whence with extreame danger he saues himselfe in Britany, hauing the Duke for his capitall enemy. But he had his son in law there, the Duke of Aniou, the Earle of Ponthieure, and so many friends within the Country, as in the end the equity of his cause shall draw the Duke of Britany to reason, being his most dangerous enemy. After notice that the Constable was fled, Begone de Vilaines, a Gentleman of Beaulieu (who had married the Countesse of Rebele in Castile) la Riviere and Mercier were coopt vp, but all escaped by sundry meanes, onely Montague in the end shall lose the mould of his doublet, although he seemed to haue better provided for his safety then all the rest. That we may hold for an vndoubted Maxime in all these resolutions which mans reason can set downe in greatest dangers, That what God keeps is well kept. Yet not rashly to omit the lawfull meanes of our preseruacion, neither to relye ouer much vpon our owne wisdomes, no more then to a rotten planke in passing of a great Riuer.

The Duke of Bourgogne had nothing lesse in his heart, nor more in his mouth then the sacred name of Iustice. Hauing the Court of Parliament of Paris at his deuotion, he begins to plant his artillery against the Constable, by this authority. The Kings Aduocate hauing framed a complaint against him, commissions are sent into Britany to summon him, who not finding him, they proceed against him by exceptions: all formalities being obserued, they condemne him by a decree of the Court of Parliament (in the presence of the Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne) as guilty of high treason, hauing attempted against the Kings person by poison, and against the State by theft and treason: That as guilty of these crimes he was degraded of the office of Constable, condemned in a hundred markes of silver to the King, and banished the Realme.

A strange alteration, the which the History represents in these verses:

*Inconstant Fortune neuer stayes, her motions turning are alwayes:
The biggest mounted on the wheele, is strangely cast behind the heele.*

But truth corrects the vanity of this popular opinion. God is Iudge, he raiseth one, and casts downe another. Aduancement comes not from the East, nor from the West; but God doth raise up and pull downe by his wise providence: for God that hath made the world, should not be gouerne the world: the eye sees not the Sunne through a thicke cloud, and yette is in heauen, notwithstanding the weaknesse of our sight. That which the ignorant call Fortune in diuers euents of worldly things, is a secret operation of the wisdom of God, alwayes iust, euen when it is most vnkowne vnto vs: the which is no more polluted with humane passions, then the Sun beames with the most infected carrion, whereon it works by his heat. Oh man! distinguish the rod from the hand that rules it: doe thou thy duty, and leaue the euents to God: feare God and thou shalt haue no need to feare Fortune. An assured passport not onely to avoid the strange alterations of Court, but all other accidents of mans life which hath nothing constant in it, but vnconstancy it selfe. But euery man treads on him that fals, saith the same History. Euery man speaks infamously of the disgraced Constable, they cry out against him, as hauing bewitched the King. Thus the afflicted is alwayes held culpable, according to the censure of this wise world, which iudgeth onely by outward circumstances. But who would beleue, that Cliffon and his companions (who had so great an interest in the Kings health) would make him sicke? The issue will shew the contrary; verifying, that as slander is the touchstone of vertue, so there is nothing

Philip of Es made Constable.

A nothing more couragious then a good cause, nor more victorious then the truth. Cliffon stirs not at all this brute, he stands vpon his guard, purchaseth friends, and attends the time, which in the end brought him to a safe Port, as we shall see hereafter. After his condemnation, the Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne hastned nothing so much, as to aduance one to this goodly charge, whereby they might tye some great person vnto them. They offer it to the Lord of Coufly, who refuseth it, whereupon Philip of Eu Earle of Arthois is aduanced; and for a confirmation of this new league, he giues his sonne to the Duke of Berries daughter.

Thus passed the beginning of this new authority, when as Charles, by rest, a good ayre, the coolnesse of the winter, and good vylage, beganne daily to recover his health, comming first to the knowledge of such as were ordinarily about him, and of his wife, children and brother, who parted not from his bed whilest his vnclies made this goodly worke at Paris. Hauing recovered his health, and James Harvelly dismissed with an honourable reward, all France was reuiued with incredible ioy, to see their King as it were taile'd out of the graue, and giuen deuoutly to his prayers: but he hath a greater relapse into this miserable discale by a new accident; and this was the occasion.

Charles recouers his health.

Charles returned to Paris to his subiects great comfort, who fought to delight him with all kinds of sports: euery man employed his wits thereto: So as there was a new inuention of a Maske of wilde men, attired in fine linnen cloath, all couered with very fine flaxe, from the foot to the head, being glued to the cloath so artificially, as if it had growne to the skin and that they which did weare it had beene naked. They were fix, and the King would make the seuenth to lead the dance. For the auoyding of all danger of fire, which might easily take the flaxe, commandement was giuen to put out all torches; but it chanced that the Duke of Orleans, vnacquainted with this Maske, came into the Hall, followed by his Pages, who caried Torchets (according to the vsual manner) euen as these Saueage men (tied one to another like prisoners) present themselves vnto the company: the King (who marched first) goes presently to the Duchesse of Berry, the holds him, and refuseth to let him goe without knowledge what he was.

And euen then the Duke of Orleans with an actiue resolutenesse answerable to his age and naturall wantonnesse, takes a Torch and comes neere to these Saueage men, to knowe them by the lifting vp of their maskes, when as fire takes hold of this flaxe so suddenly, as all were on a flame, notable to free themselves, being all tied to one line. The violence of the fire kindled with the rozen, caused a most horrible crie, but generally all men efferie out, Sau the King, whom they knew to be one of the Saueage men. The Duchesse of Berry wraps him in her gowne, being long and large, after the manner of those times, and so drawing him out of the Hall, they led him into the next chamber, without any hurt to his person. But the amazement was such, by the horrible cries of these poore men which burnt in the flames (not able to be helped wth so sudden an outcry, as the King could not be stayed in this amazement. They lay him on his bed, but his spirits could take no rest. Thus the night passed away, this poore Prince being much distempered in mind, and all his seruants distressed with griefe.

The King falls into a relapse by a strange accident.

There fell out another vnhappy accident. In the morning it was bruted through the City, that the King was dead, so as the people did runne in flockes to his vnclies lodgings, exclaiming against them for the ill guard they had kept of his person, whom they desired to see either dead or aliue, so as the Dukes of Berry and Bourgogne yeelding to this violence, were forced (euen when as the King began to take some rest) to raise him out of his bed, and to lead him through the City to our Ladies Church, to pacifie the peoples fury. At this returne his spirits faile him, he falls into his former frenzy, and neuer after were they settled, notwithstanding all the helpes men could apply.

He languished two and twenty years in this pitifull estate, and in the condition of a long an infirmity the Realme was not without languishing. Sometimes hee was in good temper (as frenzies haue their resaits, and doe not alwayes distemper the faculties of the minde) but still hee fell, and euen when as he thought to doe best, hee recoored most, when as he sought to retaine the authority to himselfe, and that nothing should be done but by his command. Hence sprang the horrible confusions in this Realme, for that diuers passionate men ruled his weake braine diuersly, one vndoing what another had done, couering their passions with the Kings name and authority. And all the liberty to doe ill, grew from this spring. But let vs turne to the end of our painfull we. The Duke of Orleans wonderfully perplexed to haue bene the cause of this scandall, cufeth himselfe presently in the hall, and to the King his brother, but all this did not satisfie. The Duke of Bourgongne reprehendeth him, and exceeds the censure of an Vnck for he layes hold on this occasion, to make him odious to the people, as if it had beene done of purpose to kill the King.

Iselaufie betwixt the Dukes of Orleans and Bour-gongne.

This maske of burning men (which chanced in the beginning of the yeare 1394) shal burne farther, and kindle a greater fire betwixt the Vnck and the Nephew, for the space of ten years, vntill the death of Philip Duke of Bourgongne, leauing this hatred hereditary to his posterity. There is no meanes which the Bourguignon doth not attempt to wrong his Nephew of Orleans. Certaine Augultine Friars vndertake to cure the King by incisions in his head, whereby he was in great danger of his life. These counterfeits were brought forth publicly in their habits, and beheaded, but the scars of these wound will remaine in Lewis his face, who recommended them vnto the King.

The women are dealers in these actions. The Duchesse of Bourgongne perswade Queene Isabel, that Lewis his meaning was to kill the King her husband, and his children. These impressions are confirmed by the graue and sweet discourfes of the Duke her husband, who by degrees fedled a hatred in the Queens mind against her brother in law. This faction is much fortified by the authority of Queene Isabel, and by her, with her husbands name, whom she makes to speake what she pleaseth, sometimes as her will directed him, but not alwayes. Yet his weak braine is the checker of all these counly policies, by the meanes of women, who are continually about his bed or his chaire, to dispute per his braine with variety of newes springing from their wretched passions: and this poore Prince is sometimes wonne, sometimes lost, and alwayes tormented with these inpoigne discourfes.

Valentine, wife to the Duke of Orleans, an Italian, and daughter to John Galeas one of the cunningest and most subtil wits of her time, which subtilty some held the increase by coniuring) would not yeeld to the brauadoes of these two Princesses: against whom she opposed her selfe, not onely by her husbands degree, but also by so politicke countenance in her selfe, visiting the sicke King with such ciuill entertainment, as her greatest enemies could not finde any honest colour to deny her the doore. So as the King did not onely willingly see her, but did call for her, and in his greatest fits did know her onely among all the rest, refusing to take any thing but from the hands of his good sister of Orleans. The more the Kings loue kindled a caloufise in these two Princesses her enemies, the more it raised vp the mind of Valentine, and by her meanes, of her husband: who remembering (too hatefully) the degree whereunto he was borne, and the wrong done him in reiecting him, yet hauing neither dexterity, nor meanes to winne many seruants, he gaue the Duke of Bourgongne all aduantages, being graue, cold, pleasing, and modest: so as by his wife temper hee discoloured the heart of the Duke of Orleans immoderate vehemency, who trying himselfe with the shew of his greatnesse, makes it knowne by effects, that all the authority was in the Duke of Bourgongne for whosoeuer had need of any publicke helpe, he must passe through his hands, and what businesse soeuer chanced, either within or without the Realme, the true rendezvous was at his lodging. Thus the Vnck made his Nephew to walke horsesh (as they say) although he chafed and stamped beyond all measure. These diuisions troubled the whole Court, making them to neglect the affaires of State; and what can we observe more famous in so disordered an Estate? All busineses are done in the Kings names, yet without the King, vntill the parties would haue him to countenance some great passion. I doe purposely omit all that which passed in this reigne touching the schisme of the Church; and the House of Anjou, in the Realmes of Naples and Arragon, not to breake off the course of my intent, meaning to re-present in due place all that concerns this foraine History. Richard King of England sends his Ambassadors to Charles, to congratulate his recovery, offering him a general peace, and demanding his daughter in marriage. The Kings relapse delayed the conclusion for a time, but soone after, by the care of the Duke of Bourgongne, who had a great interest in this alliance, by reason of his Country of Flanders, it was concluded, in the yeare 1395.

A to Calais, and Charles to Ardres, whither Richard came to ratifie the peace concluded betwixt their Ambassadors, and to receiue his new spouse. The Kings encountered one another with loue and kindnesse, making shewes of great good will: but it was a short ioy for either of them. For as it seemed that the quiet of these two realmes had bene ferled by this generall peace, sealed by this marriage, and leaened with so many reciprocall shewes of cordial affection betwixt these two great Kings, beheld a great combustion in England, which intangles both these Kings in this common calamity. Richard being of himselfe effeminate, carelesse, voluptuous and idle, grew more delicate by this profound rest built vpon the alliance of his enemy, who alone might haue quickened him. He is alwayes with his yong wife, embracing her, dallying with her, and attiring her, with such contempt of his authority, abasing himselfe too much to his subiects, so as he grew contemptible vnto his enemies, who presumed to attempt against his person. The ordinary warres of England against France, had caused many necessary impositions without any grudging of the subiects: but when as necessity ceased by this generall peace, the people require to be relieved: William More makes an Oration vnto the King in the name of the English in generall. Richard hauing no meane in these infinite exactions to supply the charges of his idle and voluptuous life, contemned his subiects request; and in the end pressed vpon the same matter by the Duke of Gloucester and the Earle of Arondell, in the name of them all, he puts them vniustly to death. The English mad with rage for the death of their deputies, flye to such remedies as despaire giues to necessity. From this generall discontent sprong a strange tragedy against Richard: for the English seeing themselues thus despised by their King, they cast their eyes vpon Henry of Lancaster his Cousin: and hauing called a Parliament, they put Richard (being forced in open Assembly) to resigne the Crowne, and to condemne himselfe to perpetuall prison, as hauing abused his royall Authority and his subiects. But this tragicke change concerns the history of England. This may briefly suffice for ours, in the conference of our Estate with theirs.

Richard King of England put
from the crowne

Charles did greatly grieve at this deiection of Richard his sonne in law, from whom he expected great loue and quiet for his subiects. But who seeth not the vanity of this world, both in great and small, to feare a shower euen when the Sunne is hottest? Hee sends for Isabel his daughter of twelue yeares old, whom Richard had not yet toucht, being content to behold her (like a puppet) vntill she came to age, satisfying his humour by some other wayes: howsoeuer it were, it proued to the dislike of his subiects, and scorne of neighbour Nations. Isabel being returned to her father, shall be married vnto Charles Duke of Orleans, sonne to this Lewis who is now in quarter, and from her shall spring a goodly plant, which in the end shall giue vs many kings in their order to preferre this Monarchy.

But, as if France had bene the store-house, or rather the common Sanctuary of all Christendome, to whom the afflicted Christians might repaire in their greatest extremities, it happened in those dayes, that Sigismund King of Hungary intreated Charles to succour him against the Turke, the common enemy to the Christian name, who got footing in the Empire of the East. For, the schisme in the Church, the confusion of the Empire, and the daily warres betwixt France and England, had so mortified all Christians zeale from all care to support the affaires of the East, against the Turkes our sworn enemies, as the way was made easie for the planting of themselves there to our ruine. But all the fault was not wholly in the Westerne princes: the Christians of the East were in horrible confusions; and euen at Constantinople, whereas the Paleologues had in some sort maintained the name of the Empire of the East, since the bad government of our French.

Hungary craveth succour of King Charles.

All the Lords of Greece, vassals to the Empire, ioyning with the Despoire of Bulgaria against the Emperour, did sturue to ruine one another. This Ciuill warre drew the Turke out of Asia (where hee was yet confined) into Europe, ouer-threw all the rest of the Empire, and in the end shall bury the whole body of this great Estate, with the Christian name, in the ignominy of our disordered passions, as in a common sepulchre. It sufficeth to note the motiue of this warre, which was to expell Baiazet (of the race of the Ortomans, who yet holds the Empire of the East) being called in by John Paleolog Emperour: but seeing so mighty an enemy entred within his dominions, vnder a colour to succour him, hee fought to be freed from him by the meanes of Christian Princes his friends.

The nearest was Sigismund King of Hungary, who had reason himselfe to feare this overflowing deluge, the which in the end hath ouer-runne Hungary, being at this day for the most part vnder the Turkes tyranny. But the euent was not answerable to his desire. Charles being solicited for succours, granted them, as freely as his infirmity would suffer. But the Duke of Bourgongne made the prouision: the charge of the army was giuen to his sonne Iohn Earle of Neuers, being two and twenty yeeres old, and married to the daughter of Albert of Bauaria, Earle of Haieault, Holland and Zeland, by whom he had then one sonne, who shall succeed him. The army was goodly, beautified with the presence of many great personages, as Philip of Eu Constable of France, the Earles of La Marke, Saint Pol, and Bar, the Lords of Couffy, Tremouille, Vienne, Bouciquault, Roys, Monterel, Saint Py, and Brezay, to the number of a thousand Knights and Squires.

Being ioyned to Sigismunds army, which consisted of many Hongariens, Bohemians and Germains, they desired at any hand to haue the vangard, and to march in the face of an vnknown enemy, of whose discipline they were ignorant; and to make prooffe of their valour, against the aduise of Sigismund, they cast themselves desperately into the midst of the Turkes auantcourours, all the Christian army being too far behind to second them; but it chanced, that Baiazet (followed by a farre greater troope then theirs) compassed them in easily as with a net, so as after they had fought valiantly, & made a great slaughter of Turkes, not able to withstand so great a force, they were all cut in peeces, or taken prisoners. Iohn of Bourgongne, and all the aboue-named Lords, were either slaine or taken, not one escaped the sword or slavery.

Baiazet moved with the great losse of his men, would haue slaine all the prisoners, but the greedy desire of ranfome was helpfull to some few of the Noblemen. The history of Germany notes but few, all the rest were murdered after their taking, by the commandement, and in the presence of this Barbarian, who hauing resolved to kill Iohn of Bourgongne as the head of the army, was disswayed by an old Turke a Necromancian, who said vnto him; Preserue this young man, who shall kill more Christians then thine army. A Prince borne to the spoile and ruine of his country, whereof he shall be shortly a more cruell scourge then the Turkes. They spared him, but he spared not the blood of his cousin German, to defile his incestuous hands, and to prophane the bosome of France, which had so greatly honoured him. Enguerrand of Couffy, a great man in his time, died in prison, and Philip of Eu Constable of France (by whose death the Earle of Sancerre was aduanced to this great dignity) but after him there shall be other Constables in this contested reigne. This defeat chanced in the yeare 1396, before Nicopolis a City in Misia, neere to the which Traian vanquished the Daciens. This victorie of the Turkes had proceeded farther, by the terror it gaue to those countries, but God gaue those Christians some time of breathing before the last stroke, the which came but too soon for the scorner of God; yet after this ouerthrow, as Baiazet prepared to pursue his victory against the Christians; Tamberlan, another scourge of mankind, ouerflowing Asia like a great deluge, ouerthrew him, and tooke him prisoner, and so God stayed the Ottomans power for that time, but the Christians malice (abusing the patience of God) pronoked his wrath, which being iustly kindled against them, he suffered the Turkes to take Constantinople, the capital city of the Esterne Empire, as we shall see else-where. But let vs returne to France.

The Kings children during his infirmity.

Charles had some truce with his infirmity, who notwithstanding this indisposition of his braine, was in reasonable good health of his body, so as he had children during this time. Before his sickness he had Isabel (of whom we haue made mention) and Lewis the Dauphin Duke of Guienne. But Iohn Duke of Touraine, and Charles Earle of Pontieu, Michele, Mary and Marguerit, two sonnes and three daughters (a goodly issue to keepe the Crowne from being an Orphelin) were borne to him by Isabel of Bauaria, during the weaknesse of his spirit. And much happinesse befell him.

After the taking of Baiazet, the Turkish Emperour, and the returne of Iohn of Bourgongne into France, hauing paid his ranfome, the Lord of Bouciquault (being sent to Genoa, to receiue it to the Kings obedience, to whom they had willingly giuen themselves) he made a voyage to Constantinople with a new army, more happy then the first, freeing the City, and returning victorious into Italy. Milan belonging to Valentine by the deceale of Iohn Galeas her father, had beene surprised by Francis Sforce, but at the returne of the Marshall Bouciquault, it yielded to the French obedience, and so did Placentia and Paula, cities in Lombardy. But these conquests continued not long with them, no more then the rest of Italy, by the fatal influence which hath alwaies made it a Sepulcher for the French, so as this suddaine yeelding of those Italian cities to the French obedience, was like vnto a fire of straw.

Verdun being ill intreated by the Duke of Loraine (although it were an Imperiall towne) cast it selfe into Charles his protection. Charles, the sonne of Charles of Nauarre, rightly marked with the name of bad, made great instance for his Seigneuries of Eureux, Cherbourg, and other lands in Normandie, the which Charles the fifth had taken from his father, who resigned his interest by an agreement made with him for two hundred thousand franks that were giuen him, and the Seigneury of Nemours, then made a Duchy vpon that occasion. But in these happy euents the iacalouse betwixt the Dukes of Orleans and Bourgongne continued and encreased hourly, through the violent practices of their proserpinas, of whom we haue made mention, who failed not to bring fuell to this fire, not only making coales to searce one another, but also a burning flame to fire both their houses, and the whole Realme. The occasion and meanes was very strange, Valentine Duchess of Orleans (whom King Charles did know and loue during the sharpest fits of his infirmity, euen when as he knew not his owne wife Isabel) being in the Kings chamber, (whether she had brought her little sonne to play with the Kings children) she cast a faire apple, after the which the children did runne, but Valentines sonne caught it, and hauing eaten it, fell presently sicke, and within few daies after died. Thereupon they concluded directly, that this childe died of poyson, prepared for the Kings sonne, which confirmed the old opinion, that the King had beene bewitched by her, so as all respect laid aside, they cried out against her, as against a rauening Wolfe. There was no other talke in Court, Paris, and through all the Prouinces of France.

The Duke of Bourgongne seemed very busie, and sent all complaints to the Kings councill, who decreed, That, to auoide a great scandall, Valentine should retire from Court, the which she did to the Castle of Asniere, vpon the way from Paris, to Beauvais: the Duke of Orleans disdaining it much, who must needs be toucht with this ignominy, and the peoples hatred encreasing mightily against him by this new accident. Whilest this home-bred harred continued in Court, betwixt the Vncle and the Nephew, the Constable Cliff fortified himselfe in Britany, both with friends and meanes, hauing by his dexterity gained the greatest Noblemen of the Country, by whose meanes he made a profitable peace for himselfe with Iohn of Montfort, Duke of Britany, to whom he had been a capitall enemy. The manner of this vnlooked for reconciliation is worthy of memory, to giue ages the subiect of a notable iudgement in so famous an example. The Duke prickt in conscience, and moued by necessity, hauing banded all his Subjects against him, seeing apparently the notable wrong he had done to the Constable Cliff, he resolved to be reconciled vnto him, and to winne his loue. But foreseeing, that hauing so often deceiued him, he would no more trust him but vpon good assurance, he resolues to secure him by an extraordinary meanes, sending him his eldest sonne as a pledge of his faith. The Constable seeing himselfe possessed of this young Prince, without any other securitie then his fathers letters, stands amazed at so vnexpected a prooffe of the Dukes loue, and resolues to haue his reuenge by a courtesie not onely strange, but lesse expected: for although hee had all the reason in the world to distrust the Duke, who had detained him prisoner vnder colour of a banquer, and had fought all meanes to ruine him; yet taking a new aduice vpon this new occasion, hee parts from his house, and bringing backe this young man to his father, puts himselfe into his power. The Duke more amazed at this strange confidence of the Constable, fo changeth his mind, as after that time he became his most affectionate friend; hauing built a firme friendship vpon this foundation, the which continued betwixt them the rest of their dayes, to the mutual content of eyther, and the profitable quier of their subjects, verifying, That Courtesie is a wife & happy councillor of State; teaching great ment, that patience triumphs in a good cause; and that we must hate as if we should loue, euen in the greatest heat of passionate quarrels, being well said by the Ancients, That hatred must be mortall, and loue immortal.

The hatred betwixt the Vncle and the Nephew ended not so quietly. The Duke of Orleans hauing receiued this disgrace in the person of his wife Valentine, growing very impatient, redoubles his complaints, with great vehemency, saying, that it was no longer time now to obiect his age, against the degree whereunto both Nature and the fundamētall law of State had openly called him, seeing it was now ten years since this borrowed authority of the Duke of Bourgongne had given him respite to be of age to enjoy his right, the which they could not take from him without prejudice to the Crowne; that it is a visible usurpation, being no longer able to disguise his grosse practices. The Duke of Bourgongne did frustrate these complaints by his coldnes and authority: but the Duke of Orleans grew more vehement, falling from words to deeds; and having had conference with the Duke of Gueldres, hee raised a good number of men at armes by his meanes, and lodged them about Paris, where hee enters with the said Duke, having advertised no man thereof, but onely the King, who fauoured his brother exceedingly, when he came to his right sense. The Duke of Berry made shew to be a neuter: but seeing the Duke of Bourgongne to vsurpe all to himselfe, tyred with his ambitious dissimulation, he inclined more to the Duke of Orleans his Nephew, although in few he labored to reconcile them. The Dukes of Bourbon and Aniou Princes of the blood were of the like humor. The Kings Councell labours by all meanes to end this quarrell betwixt these Princes, disallowing the government of any one in particular, and confirming a command of all the Princes together, supporting it by alliances: for, Charles the eldest sonne of Lewis Duke of Orleans, married Isabel of France, the eldest daughter to our King Charles the sixt. Lewis the Kings eldest sonne, Duke of Guienne, and Dauphin of Viennois, was betrothed to Katherine of Bourgongne, daughter to Iohn Earle of Nevers, sonne to Philip. To Iohn the Kings second sonne, Duke of Touraine, Iaqueline is promised, the onely daughter of William of Bauaria, Earle of Hainault, and so his heire. To Philip of Bourgongne, sonne to the aboue-named Iohn, Michelle the Kings second daughter is promised: for these mariages were all but future promises, by reason of the young age of the parties.

The Councell seeks to reconcile the Princes by alliances.

This was to ingage the faith to come, & now present to satisfie the discontented. Queen Isabel was twice pleased, both in her children and her race, which by this meanes was transplanted into the Royall blood of France, by her Cousin, who also caried the name of Bauaria. But what was ambition cannot be tamed, so in all these mariages, there was more alliance then friendship, and more dissembling then truth. God must needs reconcile them at last by a stronger conclusion.

Philip Duke of Bourgongne dyes, leaving his sonne Iohn the heire of his passions, against Lewis Duke of Orleans, in the year 1404.

The beginning of the Ciuill wars.

Thus Philip Duke of Bourgongne, raised vp with a new hope to maintaine himselfe against his enemy Lewis Duke of Orleans, as well by the cement of this alliance, as by the increase of power, which his sonne Iohn brought him (being his right arme, the true Image of his great and haughty courage, and a new fire-brand of his ambition) did at this time, when as hee dreamt least thereof: for hee dyed at Hall, going to visit his townes in Flanders, and to crosse the practices of the Duke of Gueldres, who was a principal support to the Duke of Orleans. Marguerit his wife (a companion in his ambition) did not suruiue him a whole year, who fearing to finde her husband too farre indebted, renounced his moueable goods, laying downe her purse and girdle vpon the place appointed, according to the vsuall custome, and so required an act from a publike Notary. Griefe for her husband did not hasten her death, seeing that she feared not her liuing should fall after him. Iohn of Montfort Duke of Britany (who had kept such a fire vpon this Theater) dyed four yeares before him, yet more wise and happy in one thing, having manifested the hatred he bare to the Constable Cliffon, before his death, as hath bene before declared.

Thus Death doth suddenly stay mens designs, which else flye most violent. How wretched then are wee to be thus blinde in these goodly examples. But let vs returne to our Discourse.

Philip left three sons, Iohn, Anthony, and Philip: but Iohn Earle of Nevers his eldest sonne succeeded him in his great Seignouries of Bourgongne and Flanders; and the chief heire of his hatred and other vices. Hee was equall to him in ambition, malice, dissembling, and policy, but herein hee did surmount him, that his father Philip hauing for the space of ten or eleuen yeares, crossed the designs of Lewis his Nephew, yet hee caried himselfe with such a cunning temper as holding the helme and making him to cary the bable, he made his vnlawfull government supportable by his modesty, and reasonable by the order which had confirmed him in this authority. But Iohn continues his practices with such violent fury, as within three yeares (hauing giuen the duke of Orleans a thousand crosses, and plunged France in a ciuill war) he murders his cousin germane most cruelly, defiles his Countie and his blood, and continues his furious designe with so great presumption, as countenancing this murder with a free confession, and seeking to maintain it by reason, he omitted no kind of mischicfe, but brought in all kind of disorderd confusions, as if France had bene the Rendezvous of villany and impiety. A text, the commentary whereof may be read at large in the following discourse: Behold the beginning of a ciuill war among the French, both long and furious, bred by the ill councell of the Princes of the blood, abusing their authority. A history the more worthy the noting, for that it serues vs to marke the fits, and accidents of diseases, where with wee haue bene afflicted, to apply the vse thereof to our owne experience.

After the death of Philip, all the government of publike affaires was without all controuersie deliuered into the hands of the Duke of Orleans. The King loued his onely brother dearly, and desired to grace him what he could. The Queene (to please her husband) made shew to reioyce thereat, hauing no more a Duchesse of Bourgongne to incense her, reason gaue him this preheminence, and the French obeyed him willingly, as the lawfull guardian of the French Monarchy. All things fauoured this yong Prince, if hee had not failed himselfe: but the choller hatched in his brest, hauing for so long a time swallowed vp so many indignities, the immoderate heat of command, so much desired, and the ambition and couetousnesse of his wife Valentine; all these plucked from him the fruit of these favourable occasions to settle his greatnesse, and gaue his enemy meanes to ruine him. These errors were accompanied with indiscretion, which commonly shakes the miserable. The Dukes of Berry and Bourbon his vncles, had fauoured him much, during the Bourgignons reigne, and their age had greatly countenanced his authority, if hee could haue vied them rightly. But this yong Prince was so pleased with the sweet command, as hee was loath to impart it to any: the which must needs discontent them, although (being wife) they dissembled it, yet this dislike encouraged the Bourgignon his enemy to attempt against him.

The Duke of Orleans advanced to the government.

The couetousnesse of Valentine prepared the way to these disorders. Lewis was desirous to purchase the Duchy of Luxembourg, his wife vrged him thereunto hourly, wishing him to deuise some meanes to make the King to pay for it. Vpon this aduice Lewis propounds in councell, that for the Kings important affaires there must bee a taxation made. There neuer wants some pretext to colour these exactions, but in effect it was for this purchase. Iohn duke of Bourgongne opposeth for the good of the common-wealth. On the one side it was a goodly meanes to shew both his loue to the people, and his zeale to the Kings seruice: and on the other, a reasonable subiect to make the Duke of Orleans odious. Yet this proposition passed in councell through the absolute authority of the duke of Orleans. The Bourgignon embraceth this occasion, and flatters the Parisians, to ioyne their loues, and to oppose them against his enemy, who could not be more odious then in this cause, and euen then they grew into such dislike of him, as they could neuer loue him. This was spread throughout the Realme, and the Duke of Bourgongne hauing protested that this charge was imposed vpon the subiects against his consent, laying a good foundation of firme correspondency with the Parisians, he retires into Flanders to take possession of his mother *Marguerit*s inheritance, and credit, with that rich people, but in effect it was to build vpon the hereditary hatred hee had against his cousin and capital enemy.

The Duke of Orleans grows odious to the subiect, by reason of an imposition.

To omit nothing that might auaile him against the duke of Orleans, being at Brussels he sent his Ambassadors to King Charles, beseeching him, with all affection to consummate the marriage betwixt Lewis his eldest son; duke of Guienne and Dauphin of Viennois, and Katherine of Bourgongne his daughter. Charles thought it fitt to content his cousin vpon this demand, but his brother Lewis crossed this marriage, as prejudiciall to the house

House of France, being already weakened by the uniting of Bourgongne to Flanders, the which would bee much more fortified by this alliance with the Kings sonne. John Ambassadors (after long delays) returne home without any effect, making their master acquainted with the cold proceedings of the Court, the which required his presence. In the end, he resolves to goe in person, to sollicite a matter of so great importance. But being ready to march, behold the King of England sends an army into Flanders, to bessege Seluse, which makes him yeeld to necessity, and to demand succours of the King, as his souereigne, against the common enemy of the State, staying himselfe in Flanders, to prevent these practices of the English. Lewis of Orleans (pretending a truce betwixt France and England) causeth succours to bee denied him, as if they should draw a warre vpon France being already tired with so great and long troubles. John held himselfe much wronged by this denial, and to haue the better meanes to returne to Paris, he compounded with the English, being desirous to make it knowne, that hee would oppose himselfe against the Duke of Orleans designs, taking hold of the occasion which hee himselfe offered him to his great prejudice.

The inposition was leauied by the D. of Orleans his command, and commissions were brought into Flanders. At Paris it was exacted with all rigour, but John commands his subjects of Flanders not to pay it, and goes wel accompanied to Paris to assist the people, who greatly discontented with this burthen, durst not yet vtter their griefe, expecting the countenance of a great commander. The Parisians incensed against Lewis of Orleans, sollicite John of Bourgongne to come to Paris, being resolved to employ all their means in the defence of this cause, which they held to be very important for their reliefe. John desired nothing more; so as redoubling his courage at these calls, hee goes in haste to Paris, and staies at Louvre in Paris, giuing the Parisians notice to come vnto him. The King remained at Paris, as he was accustomed, the Queene and Lewis of Orleans hauing discouered the duke of Bourgongnes intent, and fearing lest (being the stronger, and hauing the Parisians at their deuotion) he should force the King to marry the Dauphine Lewis, made sure to his daughter: they thought it best to conueigh this young Prince into Germany, to some place of safety. And going together fro Paris they left the Dauphin with Lewis of Bawaria (his vncl by the mothers side) who should conduct him secretly in a litter to Corbeil, where a goodly troope attended him. The Bourguingons followed giue him present intelligence of their departure. John follows so speedily as he ouertakes the Dauphin Lewis at Ville. Ivisie, conducted in a litter by Lewis of Bawaria his vncl, and brings him backe gently to Paris, where they receiue the Duke of Bourgongne with great ioy, and are glad of the Dauphins returne, going to meet them in great pompe, at a ioyfull triumph. John being come to Paris, hath conference with them of this faction, and finds them at his deuotion. The Prouost of Merchants, and the Vniuersity, assure him of their faithfull seruice, they intreat him to undertake the reformation of the State, a charge which he doth willingly embrace, as a fit maske for his ambitious humor.

He then presents a petition to the King, beseeching him to reforme the State, France corrupted by the ill gouernment of the treasure, whereby the subjects were oppressed with insupportable charges, and sacred iustice ill administered, the ordinary subject of the peoples complaints: but in effect it was to araigne the Duke of Orleans. The King forbore to make any answer vnto his brothers returne, being president of the councill, and greatly interested in this complaint: but these were words without effect, if force had not followed this admonition.

The Bourguingon, had brought great troopes, vnder the conduct of John without Pique Bishop of Liege, and the Duke of Cleues. The Duke of Orleans had also assembled an Army from diuers parts, by the Lord of Harpendanne, fortified with the Forces of the D. of Loraine and the King of Sicily, being made ready for the voyage of Naples. The life of France is full of souldiers of one livery, but of contrary humours, as the manner is in ciuill warres, French against French, and kinsman against kinsman, all making profession to maintaine the good of their Country in ruining it.

John of Bourgongne in shew had the advantage, being in the capital City, and possessed of the peoples hearts: hee had the King in his power, and (for a gage of his authority, which men honor like the sun rising) the Dauphin of the house of France, whom hee pretended to bee his sonne in law. All these considerations made his heart well, and his tongue to speake proudly. But Lewis Duke of Orleans sounds forth the name of publike authority, which then remained in his hands, as in a sacred guard. The most passionate make a stay at the name thereof, to attend the event of so great a quarrell. Such force hath the name of lawfull authority and order in a State, whereon it depends as on a firme foundation.

These armies thus lodged about Paris, the Generalls minds appeared in the deuices of their standards. In that of the duke of Orleans was written, le Pénit, with a staffe full of knots painted in it, signifying that hee would knocke him on the fingers that should presume to touch his authority. In the D. of Bourgongnes was written in Flemish, ick Houde, that is to say, I hold it, with a ioyners plane to make smooth the knotty staffe, and so to encounter the force that threatned him: yet these passions were suppressed by the only respect of authority, without the which all had tended to a violent spoile. The Princes of the blood (who were not engaged in these quarrells) labour to reconcile their cousins, seeing the Kings infirmity will not suffer him to vse his absolute authority.

Lewis of Anjou, King of Naples and Sicilia, and Lewis of Orleans, were with the Queene at Melun: the dukes of Berry and Bourbon, and the King of Nauarre, are at Paris with the King, and all the faction of Bourgongne. The King of Sicilia comes to Paris, hee les the dukes of Berry and Bourbon vnderstand, how necessary it was to quench this fire in time. All these Princes are willing to mediate an accord, but the indiscretion of the duke of Orleans had almost spoiled all.

At the first he grew amazed, but seeing no man to stir, and hauing some feeling of his authority, he began to speak bigge, writing to Paris, and to the best Cities of the Realme, against such as had made this petition. And (contrary to the aduice which the Princes his cousins gaue him, not to part from Melun) hee resolves to come to Paris, and to oppose himselfe against the duke of Bourgongne. The City and Vniuersity of Paris send an honorable deputation vnto him, excusing themselves, beseeching him to hearken to a good reformation, but he so checkt the deputies, as they returned ill satisfied, to a people big with a seditious humour. He shewed himselfe indiscreet in two sorts, excusing himselfe when no man accused him, which was properly to accuse himselfe, and in waking of a sleeping dog, in censuring this mutinous people, who were then kept in awe by his only authority, not daring to mutter against him but in secret. The Bourguingon desired nothing more then to haue some apparent cause to draw this people into mutiny, giuing it out openly, that the duke of Orleans came in armes to spoile the City of Paris. Behold the Parisians are in armes, prepared both within and without, to withstand the Duke of Orleans coming: they beate downe pentifes within the City, to make the streets more free for to cast stones. The people troope with the Duke of Bourgongnes men, and issue forth armed about Mountfaucon, in view of the Orleanois, lying in great numbers vpon the place.

The Chancellor of France, accompanied with the Presidents and Councillors of the Court of Parliament, goe to the Princes, aduertising the Duke of Orleans of the danger of a great confusion, if he did not foresee it. Hereupon Lewis commands his troopes to retire, and staies at the Castle of Beauty vpon Marne, to haue the better meanes to heare from his Vncles, who (by the authority of reason and alliance, after many voyages) reconciled Lewis of Orleans, and John of Bourgongne, hauing scene and embraced one another like kinde Kinsmen, with all outward signes of perfect and cordiall loue. This was but a coloured peace, the which in the end was so heauy a burthen to them both, as it weighed them downe, and by their owne wilfull follies, as if they willingly sought their owne ruines, verifying this assured maxime: That man hath no harme, but what he seeks himselfe, confirmed by the truth of these Oracles; They haue no harme, but by their owne iniquity: and, My people haue not obeyed my voice: and, Israel would none of me, ratified likewise by the experience of all men, all Estates, and all ages. The duke of Orleans sought his owne death, in prouoking his enemy without reason, and the duke of Bourgongne in murdering him, erected a scaffold to shed his owne blood.

This agreement made, John of Bourgongne informs the King and his Councill, how much it did import to take the towne of Calais from the English, where the commodity of landing, and the neerthe of the Kings estates, gaue the common enemy great means to molest the Prouinces of Flanders and Picardy, requiring aid and succours from the King to besiege it; the which hee grants. Whereupon he with all his Cities, making great preparations to fortifie the French Army, the which enters into Picardy, sending a commandement to beleaguer Calais. The artillerie and munition was ready to goe to field, through the great diligence of the Duke of Bourgogne, stirred vp with hope to pull this thorne out of his foot, and to free the traffick betwixt his subiects and France, when as suddenly the Kings letters patents come to the heads of the army, commanding all men of warre, of what condition soeuer, not to passe any farther, vpon paine of the lines. This vnexpected countermand, accused the Duke of Orleans as the author thereof, and gaue occasion to all men that desired the good of France to detest him, as seruing his owne passions, to the preiudice of the common-weale: but aboue all, it gaue too important a cause of discontent to the Duke of Bourgogne, who infinitely grieved with so excusable an affront, and such inhumane circumstances of a cruell indignity (for where serueth it to discover in particular, the griefes of so apparant an iniury?) he resolues to haue his reuenge once for all. Thus farre the Duke of Bourgogne had reason to complaine at the Duke Orleans; but he exceeds, from reason he flies to passion, the which is a dangerous Councillor, which presented vnto him a pernicious remedy, being then pleasing his troubled minde, leauing him nothing but a late repentance, and his body taken in the trappe which he himselfe had made.

A new cause of discontent betwixt the Duke Orleans and Bourgogne.

The Duke of Bourgogne resolues to kill his cousin Orleans.

Thus John resolues to free himselfe of his cousin the Duke of Orleans, who he supposed would be a perpetuall and irreconcilable enemy. The motives of this cruell resolution, are visible by the forepassed actions. But they added ielousie herunto, an intestine fire, which consumes him that lodgeth it in his bosome. The original of the History speaks nothing herof, for this shamefull iniury (which the wife conceale) was not spoken of by those that were chiefly interested. But the learned obserue, that the Duke of Orleans had vied his cousin of Bourgognes wife too familiarly, when as her husband was in the voyage of Hungary. A yong Flemish Princesse and browne, of whom they had made a song, the which the duke of Orleans caused to be put into musick, and to be sung before the ielous husband, at a banquet which hee had made him, hauing the Princesse picture in his Cabinet, and vinting that it was the triumph of his loue. These are those which pierce the hearts of generous men with an incurable wound. This they set downe for one of the motives of the Bourgignons hatred against his cousin of Orleans. The vanity cost Lewis of Orleans deare, being iugen exceedingly vnto women, and as it was one of the causes of his death by the iust iudgement of God, so is it considerable, for being slaine by his enemy, amongst his other vices, he shall reproach him of luxury, to iustifie the murder. But let vs obserue the sequell of this Tragedy.

Lewis Duke of Orleans is slaine by John Duke of Bourgogne, and in the end John makes a counterfeite peace with the children of Lewis, but it is the renuing of greater troubles.

JOHn of Bourgogne hauing resolved to kill Lewis of Orleans his cousin German, went to Paris, with so good a shew, as if hee had no intent to breake the accord so solemnly made betwixt them. That which most troubled him, was to see his enemies authority confirmed by this reconciliation, hauing the absolute government of the State, respected as the Kings brother, and the first Prince of the blood. And (to giue him greater authority and power) the good King Charles had giuen him for a new yeares gift the yeare 1407, the Duchy of Guienne for his portion, whereof the Dauphin then carried the title. This new fauour and great aduancement, kindled the coale of ielousie in the Bourgignons braine, being already much transported, and holding it for certaine, that hee should neuer by any ordinary course preuaile against so passionate and powerfull an enemy, who as his means did increase, so would his desire augment to ruine him. He therefore thinks it convenient to prevent him, and draws vnto him men fit for so audacious a murder, Raoules of Artonuille a Norman, an ancient seruant of his house, and discontented with the Kings brother, for that he had taken from him the office of Generall of Normandy, and a souldier of Guines called William Corteheuze, with others of the same humour, to the number of eighteen. This William had a brother called Sin of Courtcheuze, a groom of the Kings chamber, who should be the insti-ment to draw this poore Prince into the pitfall. The Queene lay therein child-bed, the Duke of Orleans goes to visit her after supper, when as this Sin of Corteheuze goes to the Queenes chamber to tell him, that the king desired him to repaire, presently vnto him for very important affaires. The Murtherers were lodged secretly in a house by the which the Duke should passe. Being mounted vpon his mule, accompanied onely with two Squires vpon one horse, and one that followed on foot, his pages carrying torches both before and behind him, as the horse (which carried the two Squires) came before the house, where this ambuscadoe lay, hee began to short and to run. The murtherers issue forth in family and charge the Duke, at the first they cut off his hand which held the reignes of his horse. He cries out, Amble Duke of Orleans, and they answer, It is you we seek for. They double their blowes with such violence, as they beat him downe and cleaue his head, for as the braines lay scattered vpon the pavement.

The Duke of Orleans murdered by the Bourgignons.

The yong Squire that remained with him, runs desperately among their weapons, and is presently slaine vpon his poore master. The pages had already giuen the alarm at his lodging, and many came running to succour their Lord, whom they find thus massacred. There was nothing to be heard but cries and lamentations, whilest the murtherers (hauing fired a house, and cast Calthrops in the streets) get themselves into the Duke of Bourgognes house. Thus the night passeth in miserable lamentations. Valentine doubtles the terror of this horrible accident with fearefull outcries. The Princes his cousins are thus to participate in this sorrow. All weepe and lament all cry out in this mournfull house. When the day appears, they finde his hand on the one side, and his braines scattered on the other. The reliques of his head are gathered together with teares, and all kept for an honourable funeral.

O head! how many mischiefs attend thee? Oh murderer! thou shalt bee murthered: disloyall, thou shalt be disloyally slaine. I haue horror, yea I tremble to shew this blood againe by my report. The very enemies of Lewis were amazed at this audacious murder, foretelling the miseries that should follow. The Queene wonderfully passionate, caught herselfe to be removed to the Kings lodging, and doubles the guards. In the end the king hath notice thereof, and apprehends it according to the weaknesse of his braine, but the Princes provided presently for his safetie and their owne, euery man fearing for himselfe in so strange an accident.

Such was the violent death of Lewis duke of Orleans, traitorously slaine at Paris by John duke of Bourgogne, the twentieth day of Nouember, in the yeare of our Lord 1407, who thinking to kill his enemies, slew himselfe, and left this blood prodigiously shed, as a mournfull Legacy to his posterity; and hoping in his ouerweening spirit, to vsurpe France from the lawfull heires, he lost Bourgogne for his posterity: neither could hee hinder his issue whom hee had so treacherously murdered, from the happy enioying of the whole Realme; for Lewis D. of Orleans left three Sonnes by Valentine the heire of Milan, Charles, Philip and John: from Charles the eldest (being duke of Orleans,) is issued directly King Lewis the twelfth, the father of the people, and of John Earle of Angoulesme, father to King Francis the first, the father of the Muses, who hath giuen foure Kings successively to our Monarchy. But of John of Bourgogne wee can reckon but two successors, Philip and Charles. Philip was his son, who by the patience of God left Charles in his place, but Charles suffered for his grandfathers errors and his owne, for he died in blood: his pride was entered in an vnknowne tombe, and Bourgogne was pluckt from the felonious hands of this murdering race, and vntied to the Crowne. Now John of Bourgogne shall commit strange disorders during 12. yeares, from the date of this massacre; and it seemes that blind Fortune hath adorned his temples with bayes and triumph: to guard on these execrable crimes; but he is not freed that drawes his halter after him. He shall soone pay both principall and interest to Gods iust iudgment, which slackes not, although it seeme slacke, but comes in due season, marching slowly, to take all excuse from the obstinate and impudent sinner, recompencing in the end this apparent slacknesse of punishment, by the greatnesse of eternall paine.

But let vs returne to this desolate house: Valentine widow to Lewis, with her 3. sons, and Isabel of France the Kings eldest daughter, wife to Charles, the eldest sonne of Lewis, now Duke of Orleans, by the decease of his father; come all to our poore King Charles, (being sicke) to demand iustice. All cast themselves at the Kings feet, as much discomforted as themselves, for the cruell death of his only brother, whom he had alwaies loved dearly both found and sicke. Lewis of Anjou King of Sicily and Naples, the Duke of Berry and Bourbon, with all the Princes of the blood, accompany them in this lamentable state, wherein Charles promitteth to give them satisfaction.

The Kings Councell being assembled, they require an account of the Prouoff, which had done in search of these murderers. He answers, that having done his duty he could not find any thing. That there were no places vnsearcht, but Princes and great houses, where if he might be suffered to enter, he would doe his best, to discover the murderers. The Princes were all in Councell, and the Bourguignon amongst them, all misle if freely: John of Bourguigne (guilty of the crime) holds his peace: and as they beheld one another, hee rife, and drawing the King of Sicily and the Duke of Berry apart, hee confesseth, that through the deuils motion hee had committed this murder. These Princes (being amazed) conceale it for that day. The next day coming to Councell, the duke of Berry willed him to retire himselfe. Thus amazed hee returns to his lodging, and presently without any stay he flies with five more into Flanders, where the murderers likewise finde a sure retreat. That conscience which at the first had terrified him, is now hardened: and that which had moued him to confesse himselfe the author of this murder, doth now animate him with new motions, to become obstinate, and maintaine by vniust force, that which he had committed by furious violence. Henry sought the loue of all the Cities of Flanders, hee finds them willing to support him, right or wrong in his necessity: vpon this assurance hee calls an assembly at Gand, to which those succours whereof he stood in need.

At the newes hereof, the zeale of Iustice growes cold in Court, they seeke an account with him whom they should pursue the King of Sicily, and the Duke of Berry goe to him to Amiens, being prouder then if he had done a meritorious act, where making open profession of his pride, hee had placed ouer the doore of his lodging, a table wherein were painted two Lances acrosse, whereof the one had a well steeked head for the warre, and the other a bare head for the Tilt, as giuing the choice of warre and peace: publishing generally, that he not onely had done the murder, but that he would and ought to doe it, to the end he might be mad with reason, he findes Diuines in those dayes that comfort him in this passion, and protest to maintaine it by Scripture, as the sequell will presently shew. The Princes that were sent vnto him (not able to moue him to confesse his fault, and to humble himselfe) they command him in the Kings name not to come to Paris. He answers them boldly, that he would presently goe, to informe the King what reason moued him to punish the common enemy of France.

And having reuiued his practices at Paris, by means of his intelligences, hee gathers together a great army, and accompanied with his two brethren, and the Dukes of Lorraine and Cleues, he comes to Saint Denis, and lodgeth his troopes about this great City, who willingly stretch forth their hands vnto him, as to their redeemer, who should purchase them perpetuall rest. The Princes goe vnto him, and entreat him in the Kings name, not to enter into Paris, but with his ordinary traine of 200 men. John makes them answer, That for the fury of his person, he could doe no lesse then to goe well accompanied, and the next day hee arrives at Paris with all his troopes, being receiued by the Parisians with cries of ioy, as a new Monarch. He fortifies himselfe in Bourguigne house, where he is visited by the whole body of the Citie and the Vniuersity, who seeke to support this execrable murder. The next day the game is played with a strange prelude. John Preb, a Doctor of Diuinity, maintained (with wonderfull impudency) that the Duke of Bourguigne had caused the Duke of Orleans to be worthily slaine, by reason of many notable crimes, whereof he doth accuse him. The Originall of the History doth set downe these detestible frenzies, to shew how much disorder preuailes in an Estate without head. The Councell of Consilians shall condemne this Impostor, being accused by the Colledge of Sorbonne, who shall disauow this mercenary man, after the death of the Duke of Bourguigne.

The issue was answerable to his speech. The King being sicke in minde, and the Princes fainting, John of Bourguigne is absolved of the murder committed on the person of his cousin germane. The King (to couer this bad act) declares by his letters patents, That in case he died, he would that Lewis his eldest sonne, Dauphin of Piennois, should haue the govern-

And is absolved by the murder.

A ment of the Realme, and after him John and Charles his younger sonnes one after another, without any Regent. But the Bourguignon was ignorant, that this decree gave him authority that should punish him: being also aduised (for some speciall considerations) not to deale any more with the affaires of France, but with his owne. So he retires into Flanders, not daring to attempt any thing, being thus iustified and absolved.

This insolency, accompanied with some indignities against the Kings maiesty, displeased the whole Court: and not iustifiable by the Bourguignon faction, it caused Valentine and her children to renew their complaints to the Kings Councell, who stoutly made a decree against John Duke of Bourguigne, for satisfaction of the murder committed by him on the person of the Duke of Orleans. But what auales it to report that which took no effect, but onely to proue, That when lawfull authority is suppressed, Iustice is of no force, and the stronger predaies under foot the right of the weaker. As it proued in this ridiculous and imaginaty sentence, giuen in fauour of the children of Orleans against the murderer of their father: for it was scarce recorded for the benefit of the interested, when as newes came of the victorie which John of Bourguigne had gotten against them of Liege, in fauour of John of Bawaria surnamed Without-pity, their bishop. This did quite change all their thoughts, countenances and words in Court, all Commissions for the leauing of soldiers, for the execution of this decree, by force are reuoked. There is no talk, but how to warrant the King and Dauphin from the Bourguignon, who without doubt would (according to his humour) bring his victorious army to Paris, to disannull the decree vpon their heads that should maintaine it. So as the Dauphin with the Dukes of Berry and Bourguigne conduct the King to Tours for his better safety, being vnvilling to leaue him in the Parisians power, who were passionate partisans of the Bourguignon.

The Parisians are wonderfully discontented at this departure: they arme, draw their chaires, as in a time of war: and call in the Bourguignon, assuring him of their heats and meanes. He comes speedily with a great army, and sties at S. Denis, contrary to the Parisians expectation, who thought he would haue kept the more idle, hauing so great forces. But hee wisely weighing the vanity of popular tumults, resolves to husband this occasion, and to make his peace with the King and the House of Orleans, hauing so great an advantage ouer them, to ratifie the abolition which he had obtained against all euent. He then sends his Ambassadors to King Charles to Tours, William duke of Bawaria, the Lords of George, Croy, Vieufuille and Dolehaing, to treat a peace with him and the children of Orleans, making great shewes of humility and loue.

This new course moued the King and Princes, the which they expected not from the Duke of Bourguigne, being so late a Conqueror: so as they easily yeeld to an agreement, vpon conditions, but still to the prejudice of the poore widow, and afflicted Orphans. In this confusion, Valentine Duchesse of Orleans (seeing her paines lost in the pursuit of to iust a cause) dies for thought within few daies after: leauing great trouble & few friends to her children, and great ioy to the Bourguignon, seeing his cause won by the death of this courageous woman, who onely might oppose her selfe. The King comes to Chartres, to solemnize this peace; hee sends for Charles Duke of Orleans and his brethren, and for the Duke of Bourguigne; and all appeare at a prefixed day. A scaffold is made, where the King sits in his seat of Iustice, environed with the Princes of his blood, in great state. The Duke of Bourguigne (approaching neere the King) kneeles downe with Duke of Burgundy, who speaketh thus: Liege Lord, behold the D. of Bourguigne, your friend and cousin is come vnto you, for that he understands you are much offended with him for the deed done, and committed on the person of my Lord the Duke of Orleans your brother, for the good of the Realm & of your person, as he is ready to let you make, and to let you know that I will please you, and therefore my Lord, hee doth humbly beseech you that you would please you to forget the wrath and indignation you haue conceived against him, and to receive him into your favour.

After these words, the King commanded the Duke to retire himselfe: which done the Duke the Dauphin the Kings of Sicily and Nauarre, and the duke of Berry fall out their knees before the King, and the Queens said: Dred Lord, be mercifull to us from the mouth of our Cousin the Duke of Bourguigne: The King answered, We will and doe graunt it for your sakes. The Duke of Bourguigne being called againe, kneeles before the King, who layes vnto him, Faire Cousin we graunt your request, and pardon you all. The Duke having thanked the King, riseth. Behinde the Kings chaire stood Charles of Orleans his brethren weeping bitterly. The Duke of Bourgogne goes vnto them, accompanied with his Aduocate, and hauing saluted them with a vety humble countenance, the Aduocate spake thus vnto them: My Lords, the Duke of Bourgogne here present, intreats you to put out your remembrance that hatred which you may haue against him for the outrage committed on the person of my Lord of Orleans your father, and that hereafter you will remaine good kinsmen and loving friends. The Duke added, And herewith I pray you. But they answered nothing. Then the King said vnto them: My faire Cousins, I will haue it so. And they answered: Liege, knowing seeing it pleasest you to command vs, we yield thereto: for we will not disobey your commandments in any thing. The Duke accepted it, thanking the King and his Cousins of Orleans. Then the Cardinall of Barre brought the holy Reliquient, wheron both parties did sweare a peace, neuer to remember what was past; and to hold a perpetual league of friendship. And the King said We will, that hereafter you live like good kinsmen & friends together, and straightly charge you not to wrong one another, nor any other person that hath fauoured you: neither shew any malice or hatred vnto them, as you tender our displeasure, except such as commeth the said murder, whom we banish our Realme for euer. These are the very words faithfully collected out of the Originall of that age. This hapned the ninth of March, 1409. This followed nothing but mariages. The Duke of Bourgogne married his two brethren, Philip Heire of Neuers with the heire of Couffy, and Anthony Duke of Brabant with the heire of Innerburg. He is greatly in credit with the King and Queene; his traine seemed greater then his Masters: the bounty of his kitchen drawes men from all parts; but hee had made his peace with God, neyther (in his heart) with those poore OrpHELINS, desolate both of friends and meanes, at whose cost this peace was made, the which was but counterfeit, and continued not long.

John Duke of Bourgogne governeth all in the Kings name and the Dauphines. The Faction of Orleans opposeth. The civill warres resume: ended with a peace: and the new authority of the Dauphin, who disposeth the Bourgignon; and restoreth them of Orleans.

From the year 1409, vnto the year 1413.

After this accord the Court takes a new forme. Queene Isabel thinks no more of the poore Nephew of Orleans, shee is wholly the Duke of Bourgogne. The Duke of Berry follows the same traine: For prooue of a cordiall friendship, the Queene doth openly fauour the marriage so long promised, of Lewis the Dauphin her eldest sonne, with the heire daughter to the Duke of Bourgogne, the which marriage is solemnized.

Now John of Bourgogne is farther in law to the Dauphin, then hee, which giveth both his heart and house. Moreover, Charles King of Nauarre, Lewis duke of Bourbon, the Duke of Lorraine, Britany, Barre, Alanson, Cleues, Vandemont, and (after the example) the greatest Noblemen in Court, are all on his side. There is nothing but joy in his house; all ioy, whilst the Orphans of Orleans weep. Paris honours him as a protector, and trusts none but him: and John doth affect nothing more carefully, with King and Dauphin, then the loue of the people. Hee doth all he can to please the chiefe subiect of his discourse to reforme the State, to keepe the people more at ease, to the common weale. In a solemn Feast (where all the Court was present) hee gave his friends, instead of a banquet, plowmen of gold and silver, (showing by this signe, that his first care was to rule the State well; and to shew the effect of his words, that hee practised the same laboure.)

Albion cryed out of the Treasurers, as hoist-leeches of the commons treasure, that chiefe causes of bad husbandry, whereby the King and people were so much impoverished. Wee haue made mention before of one of the Kings chiefe minions called John, who had too sooned the storme: being returned hee growes migræber creole, with the King then before, who giues him the office of Lord Steward, and makes his place to be to the sister of the Lord of Albret, his Constable, although John was not of the meane calling. The shew of his traine exceeded Princes houses, and made him to be all in generally, so as they accused him to haue robbed his Prince, and the public Treasure.

A The Bourgignon begins with him, in the reformation of the State. The Princes of the blood were easily drawne to allow of this proceeding: so as Montagu was taken; condemned, and speedily beheaded. Whether this were done by commissioners, or iudicially (as it was said to be iudified after his death) it is not certaine. This is a good lesson for meane men, that grow rich by the publicke treasure, not to abuse their wealth by excessive pompe: to keep their credit in Court, and to fie the fury of great men, vnder his protection that hath power of life and death, arming themselves with a good conscience, and vnreproucable in their charges. But the Bourgignon had a farther reach then Montagu: for vnder colour of the publicke good, he reuenged himselfe of him, whose selfe might haue crost his designs. His meaning was, not to reforme the State, but to gouerne it absolutely. Thus he seekes to vsurpe all, and in the ruine of Montagu, hee will haue all men know that he hath power to hurt and helpe. This first insolvency furthered his enemies, being in a manner forsaken of all men, euen of their owne blood: for John Duke of Berry (caried away with the vent of this new fauor) had befucted himselfe to the Bourgignon: but finding himselfe contemned by him, who tooke all to himselfe, and reiected such as had serued him to rise, John resolues to ioyne with the house of Orleans, and to oppose themselves against the Duke of Bourgognes greatnesse.

This is the beginning of the two factions of Orleans and Bourgogne, which troubled all France during this reigne. This league (whereof the house of Orleans bare the name (as the first and most interested) was concluded at Gyen in the year 1410, the tenth of March, being defensue and offensue against the house of Bourgogne. The chiefe were Charles Duke of Orleans and his brethren, John duke of Berry, Lewis Duke of Bourbon, John Earle of Alanson, Francis Earle of Clermont, Bernard Lord of Armagnac, and Charles Lord of Albret Constable of France, with their friends and followers in great numbers. Of the Bourgignon faction, were John Duke of Bourgogne with his brethren, Charles King of Nauarre, (sonne to that wretch of whom we haue made mention) the Dukes of Lorraine, Brabant and Britanie, the Marquis of Pont, the Earles of Neuers, Vaudemont, Saint Pol, Ponthieure, and many others. This mournfull diuision continued vnto the year 1419, in the which John was slaine, but it ends not so. During these eight yeares we shall see diuers changes, one in, and another out, as they could enable themselves with the Kings authority, which is the strongest batterie of ciuill warres. Now the Duke of Bourgogne is in quarter, and plants his Ordnance against the Orleans, as guiltie of high treason: but shortly he shall be dispossessed, and they of Orleans shall take their turne.

The house of Orleans complains, that they are not respected according to their degree: they sue to be admitted to the priuiledges due to Princes of the blood, and that the duke of Bourgogne should not command absolutely, holding (as they said) both the bodies and wils of the King, Queene, and Dauphine in captiuitie. They assemble in great troopes, first at Chartres, and after (to manage their affaires with greater shew, neere vnto the capitall City of Paris) they lodged at the Castell of Wincesster, their called Bicer, but now ruined. The Duke of Bourgogne accused the Duke of Orleans for practising to take the Crowne from the King and Dauphin, perswading the King to what he pleased against them, as against rebels and disturbers of the publicke quiet. This fire continued but seuen or eight moneths, wherein there chanced no memorable accident, but only the death of Lewis the good duke of Bourbon, who died for griefe in the beginning of this war, being accused as the motiue of these troubles.

Queene Isabel laboured to reconcile these Princes, but she preuailed not, being suspected by the Orlean faction, whom she had left without cause, to ioyne with the Bourgignon. After some Edicts of confiscation, not executed (like Canon that spent in the aire) a peace was made by means of the duke of Berry, vpon condition that he and the Duke of Bourgogne should ioyntly haue the Dauphin in guard, and the house of Orleans should be respected in their degree, and that Peter of Essards (a swome enemy to their party, and a most passionate seruant to the duke of Bourgogne) should be no more Protector of Merchants. This was concluded at Wincesster, whereof it beares the name, the twentieth day of Nouember in the same year, hauing contended this summer about Paris only, to the hurt of the poore people, discontented chiefly with the Goleus that came out of Armagnac, who gaue their name to the troopes of the Orlean faction, called called for this occasion Armagnacs, wearing for their colours a white scarf, the which they have used in our last troubles. This first Peace continued not long, neither were all promises performed. The Bourguignon did eat the cake alone, and yet he complained first, as having to do with children. Hee sends the Lords of Croy and Douries, to the Duke of Berry, to disloyne him from the Duke of Orleans his Nephew, who having intelligence of their negotiation and passage, caused them to be surprised in Sologne, and brought prisoners to Blois; but he sent back Douries, and detained Croy, as suspected to be guilty of his fathers death, and by consequence punishable by the treaty of peace. The King commands him to let him at liberty: and hee demands iustice of his fathers murderer. Hereupon they goe all to armes. They cause the King to summon him by his Edicts, whereunto Charles Duke of Orleans answers, by a challenge to the Duke of Bourgongne, as the murderer of his father, and the author of all the miseries which then reigned in France.

Beginning of the second warre.

Thus began this second warre, the 20 of Iuly, the year following, 1411. the Princes passions giuing the poore people scarce seven months respite to breathe in so many calamities, which they suffered through their voluntary divisions. The Orlean faction assembles at Gergeau vpon the riuier of Loire, to resolve of the meanes to make warre against Iohn Duke of Bourgongne, whom the challenge by a publike cartell, as the murderer of a Prince of the blood, the Kings only brother: and as usurper of the royall authority, holding the persons and wils of the King and Dauphin captive. Iohn duke of Bourgongne had great aduantages: the Kings authority, and the Daulphins, (who was heire apparent to the Crowne of France) the capitall City of the Realme, the approbation of the best Cities, most of the Prouinces, and without comparison greater meanes of himselfe, both for men and money.

This second war continued a year, it began in Iuly, 1411, and ended the year after, 1412, in the same moneth, far more variable and violent then the first; and memorable in this, that the vanquished was victor, and the victor vanquished. The same authority which had supported the stronger, was in the end fauourable to the weaker: such as most pleased their masters humor, received death of him for their reward. Very necessary observations to iudge of these ciuill wars. The Orlean faction went first to field. They were about seven or eight thousand horse. The number of their foot is not specified. Charles duke of Orleans makes the body of his army in Gasinois: the duke of Bourbon in Bourbonnois, and the Earle of Alanfon in Vermandois. Peronne, Chauny, Neele and Han, yeeld vnto them. Cleremont (which belonged to the duke of Bourbon) is fortified: they seeke to surprize Retel and Bapaumes, but in vaine. This was the first fally begun by them of Orleans: but the Bourguignon takes another course, he prepares the kings Edicts against them, hee employes the peoples force within the Cities, and armes in field, and assailes him at the first. He had a great army both of horse and foot, the which doth presently march into Picardy, where the Orleanois had begun, and easily recouers what they had gotten: then stands resolute: they besiege, take, spoile and sacke it.

The Bourguignon craves aid of the King of England.

The Flemings which were vassals to the duke of Bourgongne, being laden with spoile, craue leaue to returne home, neither could the dukes promises, nor threats retain them, but they leaue his army and depart. This had almost ouerthrowne his affaires, hee demands Mondicler, the which was presently surprised by Peter of Quefnes, Lord of Gamers of the Orlean faction, and putting his army into Garifons, doubting the euent of the war, he sends with all speed to Henry the King of England, crauing succours in this necessity. Henry makes his profit of these ciuill diffentions in France: he presently sends twelue hundred men to the Bourguignon, to supply the Flemings want, vnder the command of Thomas Earle of Arondell. The Orleanois lose no time; and for their nearer approach to Paris, they surprize Saint Denis, and Saint Cloud, places of importance; and fortifie Corbeil for the passage of the riuier; of purpose to famish this great City, which liues by daily prouisions brought from diuers parts. But he finds one to countermeine his practices, vizing the same instrument he had employed to hurt him. The Orleanois keeping the field about Paris, must needs be the cause of great calamities. And all this was acted in the view of the King and Dauphin.

Iohn informs the King of his enemies insolency, who (without appealing to his Majesty) presumed to spoile the heart of France, as if they were strangers or enemies. Charles apprehends this error but too easily, desiring nothing but rest: but Lewis the Daulphine especially is incensed by these informations, and his choler increaseth daily against his cousins of Orleans. The Bourguignon sayd, that they played the Kings, and could not conceal their intention, which was to seize on the Crown, seeing they presumed to take armes against the King. There are rigorous Edicts made against the Orlean faction, as against rebels, and guilty of high treason. All their goods, honours and persons, are confiscate which remaine in this army, if within fifteene dayes after publication of the Kings letters patents, they retire not themselves to their houses. And to begin with the greatest, Charles of Albret Constable of France, and Arnold of Corby the Chancellor, are dispossessed of their dignities, and the Earle of Saint Pol preferred to the first place, and Dolehain the Duke of Bourgongnes Aduocate to the last.

This storme makes worke at Paris, they seeke out all of the Orlean party, and presently cast them into prison: Peter of Effars being restored to his place, remembers the article made against him at Winchester, and armes the people against them. Whosoever is found out by the Parisians, being of the Orlean faction, he is brought with hazard of his life to prison. All is lawfull in this popular rage, so it be against the Armagnacs. All these engines forced from diuers parts, doe strangely shake the Orlean party. Such as were restrained within any townes, durst not breathe: and many in the army slip away daily, fearing the rigour of these Edicts, which were executed with all feuerity.

Charles Duke of Orleans (having taken counsell of the Princes and Noblemen, his associates, what course to follow in this alteration, before a greater inconueniency) resolves to draw the Bourguignon to battell, although hee were fortified with these new forces from England. So as having passed the riuier of Oyse, vpon a bridge of boats, (all the passages being seized on by the Bourguignon in the Kings name) he presents himselfe before the gates of Cleremont in Beauuois, where Iohn his capitall enemy remained. The Orleans army is faire, beautified with the presence of great personages: the Duke of Bourbon, the Earles of Alanfon, Cleremont, Albret, Verus, Vienne, Bouicquault, the Archbishop of Sens (brother to that Montagu which was beheaded) Craon, Montibason, Hangest, with many Barons, Knights, and Squires, all resolute to end this quarrell by battell: and to that end (having desired the Duke of Bourgongne) they attend him, betwixt Cleremont and Cathenay. But the Bourguignon leauing them there to spoile that goodly and fertile Country of the Ile de France, whereby they increased the hatred and curse of the people, more incensed then euer against these Armagnacs, exclaiming of him as of a coward that durst not fight, he arises at Paris, to the peoples great content, who attend him with all deuotion. He presently takes Saint Cloud and Saint Denis from the Orlean party, to their great losse, notwithstanding any diligence of Charles their head, who proclaimed a victory before the combat. Thus Paris is freed without any restraint, and all the Orlean party brought very low. Neither Charles nor his associates talke any more of fighting with the Bourguignon: they had worke enough to retire themselves, and to defend their townes, expecting a present siege. Iohn of Bourgongne failes not to husband this good successe, and to countenance his forces) he doth ingage the King and Dauphin in the pursuit of his enemies halfe vanquished. So his victorious army enters into Beausse, turning head towards the Duchy of Orleans, the inheritance of his chiefe enemy. Estampes yeelds to the King. The Duke of Bourbon is there taken prisoner, and sent presently into Flanders.

Whilest that all things succeeded thus happily for the Duke of Bourgongne, Henry the fourth, King of England calls home the troopes he had sent to his succour, vnder the Earle of Arondels command, entreating the Duke to hold him excused, if he did vfe his owne at his need. He had no meaning to fauour the stronger party, but to succour the weaker, as experience did soone teach. This sudden alteration did somewhat stay the Bourguignons designe to attempt Orleans: but making warre aduisedly, hee attends his enemies proceeding, and taking an honest leaue to retire, by reason of the winter, hee comes to Paris, where (not to lose any time) he continues the Kings thundering Edicts, and executes many of his prisoners, to flesh the people. To blood he adds Ecclesiasticall Excommunications against the Armagnacs, whilest the Orleanois take cold by making war in Charolois, and sending for succours into England, seeking for reliefe in the same place where their enemy had found a scourge to whip them.

Certain letters (caried by a Monke from the Duke of Orleans to the King of England) were intercepted and brought to Paris, being examined in full assembly of the Vniuersity, and from thence imparted to the people, with the Bourguignons Commentaries. They made the Orlean faction so much the more odious, as if the Dukes of Orleans, Berry, and Bourbon (combined together) had sought to take the Crowne from the King and Dauphine, and to dismember the Realme in giuing part of it to the English, and to diuide the rest among themselves. Strange newes without any subiect, which vanish at their breeding, but yet they serue to purpose according to the designe of their Architects.

The King and Dauphin (being possessed by John of Bourgongne) haue no thought but to ruine the Orlean party, and putt vp with this first successe, hoping to finish the rest, they employ all their means to leaue a great army, the which (through the Bourguignons care) was held to be an hundred thousand men. A notable number, after so many miseries, and in so great a confusion.

The City of Bourges was of great importance, for the vining of the Prouinces on that side Loire, where the associate Princes had their greatest supplies of men. The Bourguignons greatest malice was against the Duke of Berry, who not only had forsaken him, but (for his degree and age) vnderstood much in his enemies affaires. They resolve therefore to besiege it, to make the way more easie for the conquest of the rest. In the beginning of the Spring, the King and Dauphin goe from Paris to their army, which assembled in Gastoins: being entred into Berry, the lesser Townes yeeld without question. Dun le Roy, Fontenay, and Sancerre. Bourges being summoned, makes answer: That neither the King, nor Dauphin did make this warre, but the Duke of Bourgongne, who holding their persons and wils captiue, would deprive the Princes of France of their right, hauing imbrued his murdering hands in the blood of the first Prince of the Crowne, seeking to vsurpe the State. There were very many good souldiers within the City, which were supplied with all that might be wished for in a long siege. They invited the enemy (in scorn) that he would approach neere the City; and they leade their gates open in a brauery. Many fortunate sallies are made by them, crying in field, God save the King. They take many prisoners. The waters abroad are poisoned, and many dye before they discover the cause.

All rings out with military railings of Armagnacs and Bourguignons: but the greatest defeat is in spoiling of the Country. All the prouision being caried into the City, what a spoile should an Army of an hundred thousand men with their followers make? and (to increase their misery) all the houses of the champion Country were either sackt or burnt. The English (being victors in France) neuer committed greater spoiles then these French Armies.

As the duke of Berry (the Lord of that country) was much grieved to see these spoils to the Dauphin (the heire apparent of the Crowne) was discontented with his fathers lawes ambition, growing odious vnto him. His blood (which could not degenerate) moued him to compassion, and the blood vniuilly shed, troubled his conscience. For to what end should they ruine a whole Realme to maintaine so execrable a murder? If hee to reforme the State (saith he) be the Bourguignons intent, is this the way? His father (being sicke could not apprehend these things, by reason of his infirmity: what reproach then were it for him (being his eldest son) to suffer himselfe to be baffled by his father in law, like vnto an infant? These apprehensions moued this yong Prince, who nothing dissembling his conceptions, told his father openly, that hee was not pleased with these confusions, and that they must find out some means to pacifie them. It changed one day, as they aduersed the King, that in a fallly made by them of the Towne, they had slain some one of his seruants, the Dauphin cried out in the presence of the Bourguignon: Shall we neuer haue an end of these miseries? I am resolved to make them cease. The Bourguignon hauing before discovered some coldnes in this yong Prince, found his mind now to be wholly changed. He therefore replied mildly: That it should be well done, so as they of Orleans would acknowledge their error. How (saith the Dauphin) shall they acknowledge their fault, if we do not know them for our blood? And then they resolved to make a peace. The Duke of Berry had layed the foundation by Lignac, great master of Rhodes, who failed not to imbrace this occasion, seeing the Dauphin so well affected. The Earle of Sawoy had sent his Ambassadors, to exhort both parties. After a months siege they begin to treat of the means to pacifie these troubles. The Bourguignon makes haste to be the first in all things, and parles with the duke of Berry betwixt two bars. One accuseth, the other excuseth, but in the end a peace is concluded by Deputies.

The Princes, at an enteruiew imbrace one another, with all shewes of cordial loue, such as their blood makes shew of, after long bitterness. The Bourguignon onely is troubled, doubting this peace to them would be a new to him, for that hee had no peace in his owne Conscience.

The King enters into Bourges, where the peace is signed, and for that reason it was called the peace of Bourges, the 25 of Iuly, in the yeare 1412. A Parliament is called at Auxerre, to confirme it by soleimne oath. The Princes are received into fauour with the King and Dauphin, all Edicts made against them, were disannulled, and of no force. They and theirs restored to their degrees and dignities: all things to be forgotten. The names of Armagnac and Bourgongne (as infamous markes of civil dissensions) forbidden upon paine of death: and the English (come to the succour of the associate Princes) to be satisfied out of the Kings Treasure. Without the City of Auxerre, neere to the Abbey of Saint Marian a stately scaffold was made, where the King sitting in his seat of Iustice, enuironed with his Princes, the officers of his Crowne, and the chiefe Deputies of the Parliament, the peace was proclaimed with as great ioy, as the war had been tedious and mournfull. To confirme this peace with John of Bourgongne, Philip Earle of Vertus married his daughter: but all this could not reconcile him to the house of Orleans. The Dauphin reioyced much at this peace, and made all shewes of loue to his cousins lately reconciled, being grieved that there had been so long dissention betweene them: desirous to reparaire what was past, and about all to maintaine an inuolable peace within the Realme. The good sicke King present at all, yeelded his consent and authority, sometimes inclined to good, sometimes to ill. Queene Isabel held with the strongest: but all these good motions were crossed by the Bourguignon, so as all the confusions of this peigne are not yet ended.

John Duke of Bourgongne seeing himselfe, cast by Lewis the Dauphin, and the house of Orleans restored to grace, stirs up new troubles, from the yeare 1412, vnto 17: when as the Dauphin dyed, but the troubles ceased not.

FRANCE began to hope for better, by the means of Lewis the eldest sonne of King Charles: hauing a desire to make a peace against the Bourguignons will. But this was not all they expected of the Dauphins first resolution: yet the weaknesse of the sicke King, and the inconstancie of this yong Lieutenant, gaue the subtil braine of John of Bourgongne too great an aduantage to suffer the French to enjoy the fruits of peace so much desired, who neuer yeelded to bare threats, but grew more resolute. And notwithstanding this alteration of the Dauphin his sonne in law, yet he left not the Court, being always neere the King, keeping the Councell in breath, who were for the most part all of his faction: and although the worshipped they Sunne rising, yet seeing the spirit of this yong Princeto bee weak and inconstant, and the Bourguignons firme resolution, they stood vpon their guard, doing nothing that might openly offend either the one or the other; but vnder hand they sought to please the most politike and redoubted master, who life might proue a most cruell and dangerous enemy. Thus were affaires handled in the Kings Councell. And as for only the Court, but the whole world, is an ebbing and flowing of diuers humours, the which doe change according to occasions; and the soule whereof dissembling, treachery, and reason play their parts diuersly: so at that time the Bourguignon (a principall artisan of these goodly trickes) found an ample libertie wherein to employ his stithy trade. But although he seemed to haue gained all, what hee desired hee desired not to come to pass, and hee was not the full of his desires, yet all his enterprises came to nothing; and in the end hee payed (with the price of his blood) the great debt of his hostile wickednesse. But this Act had many Scenies. In the first, our History shall descowbe the gouernment of Lewis the Dauphin. This yong Prince was not capable of so great a charge, hauing an idle braine, being careless and voluptuous, hee was his owne will, obstinate, taking no orders from any but of himselfe, or from yong men of his owne humour: loth to yeeld to any that that vnderstood more then himselfe, and especially to his vncles, whose graue heires hee disdained: neyther could hee loue his father in law, being refused to gouerne the Realme alone. The Queene seeing her sonnes humour inclined to loue the House of Orleans, made shew to fauour them: but in effect shee was indifferent, being wholly giuen to flatter her husband, and to gouerne him according to the time.

The Bourguignon dissembling his sonne in lawes wayward humours, was alwayes neere the King, giuing him such goodly reasons, as the good Prince could not gaine-say him. The subiect of his futes was pleasing to the Parisians, whose good liking he entertained cheerefully; but alwayes with an intent to be reuenged of his enemies, vnder this goodly name of the Common-wealth, as the foueraigne end of all his designs: but in effect he held one of the chiefeest places, not yielding in any thing to gouerne them which seemed to him, and to keepe backe such as might crosse his authority. By the Peace of Bourges the Constable of Albert should be restored to his dignity, and Arnold of Corby to his Chanceliership. They delay him from day to day, but in the end they are restored with much difficulty. The meanest haue many delays, more trouble some then a flat repulse, being more willing to leaue all, then to make these fruitlesse pursuits. Arnold of Corby being honourably restored to his place, resigned it into the Kings hands, to auoid the danger of so confused time: more wisely then Henry of Marle that succeeded him, being slaine at the massacre of Paris, with the Constable of Armagnac. But the Bourguignon flew a higher pitch then to preiudice the House of Orleans in their goods and honours, or to crosse their affaires and their followers. He found no better expedient then to doe as he had done with Lewis his father: for a dead Lyon doth no harme. To this end hee assembles some of his most trusty followers at Paris, to finde means to murder the Dukes of Orleans, Berry and Bourbon, but Peter of Eßars (one of his most violent partisans) discovered this practice, for the which hee soone after smarted.

By the Treaty of Bourges, the English (which came to the Duke of Orleans succour) must be satisfied. They presse for payment, one part being discharged (to the Duke of Orleans great hinderance) he was forced to leaue his Brother John Earle of Angoulesme in hostage for the rest: being carryed into England, hee was in the end redeemed, after much trouble and many delays.

In this Article the Bourguignon made shew of his good husbandry; soliciting the English vnder-hand, on the one side, for to presse Charles his principall debtor; and on the other side hee cryed out against the disorder of the Kings treasure, so ill gouerned, as they were not sufficient to furnish the ordinary expences of his house: pretending all these great summes to be waisted by the Treasurers, eyther in gifts, or in superfluous expences. This complaint was very plausible, but it was a pitfall to catch his enemies, and to mutine the discontented people, by reason of their great oppression, being easie to bee moued at the name of the Common-wealth. Hee soone obtained from the Kings generall Conuocation of the chiefe Cities, to reforme the abuses of the Realme; and especially of the treasure, for the reliefe of the poore people. To make this party good, the City of Paris must make the first point: but the Vniuersity which stood as a neuter (dealing with nothing but these bookes) should make the proposition and first instance.

The cause was vehemently set downe by a Doctor (chosen for the purpose) and auowed by the City and Deputies of the provinces: such as were subiect to accompts, were mustertified, and the greatest number dead: such as were taken, lost their heads at the Halles Greene, to the peoples great content, who highly commend the Duke of Bourgogne, as the onely Prince which loued the good of the Realme. The Dauphine grows zealous at the found of these praises (as preiudiciall to his honour) vowing neuer to suffer the Bourguignon to attempt any thing against his authority. Such as were interceded, led the young Princes humour: who (by the means of Lewis of Bauxaria his vnckle by the mothers side) perswade him to take the name of Regent for a while of his greatnesse.

He takes this title, and giues notice to the Duke of Bourgogne, that it is now high time, hee were knowne in his degree. The Bourguignon (pretending that he hath no other obiect but the good of the Realme) makes no shew to deale in these affaires, leauing the gouernement thereof to whom it appertained: yet vnder-hand hee caused the Parisians to arme; and (least the better sort should be called into question, hee employed the basest, being led by one Caboch a butcher, followed by a multitude of rascals, who (being (armed) come in troopes to the Regents lodging, and the sight of him by rowle the chiefe enemies of the Bourguignons house, who (they had had gouerned the treasure, or had bene enriched by excessive gifts, amongst the which was a Jew of Eßars, who without any long processe) lost his head, receiving the same for his great wickednesse, by his hands, who had then caused him to commit them. But this was not one dayes stay, the next day the people assemble in great multitudes, and taking white caps for their badges, they came to Saint Pol, where the King lodged, and demand audience, having seized on all the passages to his lodging, after a terrible manner. A Carmelite Friar was speaker for the people, accompanied with the Deputies of this multitude as his ruffians. Being entered into the Kings chamber, after many tedious speeches, he demands reformation of the State, protesting they would not be fed with words; they wring the King to punish such whole names they had contained in a list, being guilty of capital crimes. The Duke of Bourgogne makes a good shew, and answers: That the King would consider thereof. This Friar replies impudently, that they would not depart before they had such as they demanded. Their rage was such; as the King, and Princes tooke white cappes, the mark of the seditious. They demand the chiefe seruaunts of the King, Queene, and Dauphine, not onely men, but all women which had bene in any credit: and above all, Lewis of Bauxaria the Queens brother. There was not any one but stood amazed at these audacious impudencies.

The Queene comes weeping, she intreats the King, the Monke and the deputies of the people. They answer, it is their charge, and they cannot alter it. The people cry from the base Court with a violent noise, that if they deliuer not these prisoners, they will force the lodging. So as after all these intreaties, Lewis the Queens brother with the rest (specified in the rowle) both men and women, yeeld vnto the mercy of these mad and furious men, and are by them led into diuers prisons.

This night passed not without many murders, many were strangled, and many cast into the riuer, without any other formes of iustice, but the Bourguignons seeret commandement: who (with his cold and graue countenance) made shew to haue no interest in the action. The City was neuer in so lamentable an estate, by this shameful contempt of Law, order, and of the King, Princes and Magistrates. There is no talk but of blood, killing, hanging and drowning of poore prisoners.

The horror of this confusion toucht the hearts of the most passionate. The Vniuersity (which had bene the mouth of these captious complaints) repaires to Henry of Marle the first president, and to John Iouenal of Virins the Kings Aduocate, protesting that they were not guilty of these infamous disorders. And hauing taken aduice, they resolute to go to the King, as well to purge themselves of the suspicion of these abominable confusions, as to intreat him to giue eare to a good peace. They giue him means to win the heads of this popular faction, and set vp an Ensigne with the Kings armes, and cry in all parts of the City, Peace, peace good people: an invention which preuailed much in this action.

Euill councill is most hurtfull to him that giues it: the Bourguignons practices light on his owne head. The people seeing themselves disauowed by the Vniuersity (who then had great credit for their esteeme of wisdom and knowledge) hauing the King and his Parliament opposite, being abandoned by their Tribunes, they hide themselves in Bourgogne, and hee himselfe feeling the storme to approach, retires to Champaigne, attending the event.

The Orlean faction repaires to Paris with speed, and were receiued ioyfully by the people, as the anchor of their hope. All the world exclaims of the Bourguignon as the onely moue of the troubles of France, and unworthy to hold so honourable a rancke among the Princes of the blood. The Queene feeds this dislike, for the interest of her brother imprisoned, & the King thunders forth his Edicts against the Bourguignon, the which are seuerely executed vpon such as are apprehended. Scaffolds, riuers and streams witness the reuenge of the murders committed by the Bourguignons vpon the Orleans. All officers preferred by the Bourguignon are displaced, and all such as had supported him are ill intreated. Valeran Earle of Saint Pol, is put from the dignity of Constable, Gaishard Dauphin of Auvergne, from that of great Master, and Charles of Razouzes from being Master of the Crosse-bowes, the which is at this day as the Colonell of the infantry. Three hundred men and women of the Bourguignon faction, are banished banished by a decree of the Court of Parliament. The Duke of Brittany leaves the Bourguignon and comes to Court against him. To conclude, all parties against the Bourguignon, yet he is nothing amazed, but continues constant against all forces. The outward eye of his Cities in Flanders in this necessity being thus perplexed, there fell out a favourable occasion to raise him up againe. The Queen being much discontented with him, intended the Dauphin. This young Prince had some of his household servants from the Bourguignon: thereby the authority of a mother, takes them from him, and puts them in prison: the reason was, for that she feared these men were of the Bourguignons faction. The Dauphin takes this as an affront, and writes to his father in law to assist him. The Bourguignon embracing this unexpected occasion, calls a new assembly of his subjects, and shewes them these Letters. And making his profit thereof, he gives them to understand how needfull it was to leaue an army, to free the King and Dauphin, whom the Orlean faction held in captivity. And vpon this cause he writes to all the Cities of the Realme, intreating them to assist him in so good a work, and worthy of good subjects to their Prince. Hereupon hee leaues an army, and goes to field, making a publike declaration, That he takes armes to set the King and Dauphin at liberty, and is followed by many French, for his army increaseth daily. Having passed the Riuer of Somme, he enters into Champagne, and doth summon Senlis, to send him the keyes of their gates, as marching for the Kings service: but a countermand comes from the Dauphin, which doth frustrate his designe.

The Dauphin
disaues the Bourguignon.

The Dauphin (won by the Orleans) protesteth that he had neuer written these letters, and disaues the Bourguignon: he writes letters vnto him of a contrary tenor, requesting him to forbear to torment the people vpon so vnjust a cause: protesting that he was not only in full liberty, but doth also enioy his authority, by vertue whereof he commands him to dismis his troops, and to leaue France in quiet. The Bourguignon goes on his course, meaning to enter Paris, and to stir the people to a new sedition, and so hee marcheth with his troops neere to the City, and stayes at Saint Denis: but his proiect had no successe.

The Dauphin assures the City walls, and the peoples hearts against him, who seeks by all means to speake to the King or people, approaching himselfe neere the City, sending his Heralds, with Letters, planting his colours neere the gate, and in the end conueyeth staffe with Letters in it: but all this would not preuaile. The King doubles the battery of his Edicts against him, as guilty of high treason, and a disturber of the publike peace: commanding all men that were in his army to leaue him, vpon paine of confiscation. Here the greatest part of his troops fflye away, yea his Flemings abandon him, who had alway protested vnto him in all his assemblies, neuer to cary armes against the King nor Dauphin. In the end the King and Dauphin, accompanied with the Princes of his blood, march with a goodly army, they besiege Champagn (where the Bourguignon had left a garison) and take it by composition: from thence they march to Soissons a towne of great strength: having taken it by force, and Enguerand of Bournouille his right hand in it, hee leaues the towne in peace, and cuts off Bournouilles head at Paris, with many of his companions, to the peoples great content, glad of this new blood: and in the end hee passeth to Arras, the which he besiegeth with his victorious army.

The Bourguignon amazed at these vnexpected euents, demands peace of Charles, and obtains it with much intreaty, by the means of the Countesse of Hainault his sister; and the Duke of Brabant her brother. It is called the peace of Arras, being made at that time. This was grievous to the Dukes of Orleans and Berry, who said, that both the King and Dauphin had promised them, not to lay downe armes, before they had utterly ruined the House of Bourgongne. But God wiser then they, would vnite all the French, to oppose them with a common consent, against the English their common enemy: and will soon shew, that it is a meere vanity for mortall men, to nourish immortall hatred against their enemies, to satisfy their insatiable reuenge. We haue said, that Henry the fifth, King of England, watche all opportunities to feed the confusions of this miserable reigne: and to that end he did sometimes succour the Bourguignon, sometimes the Orleans, still supporting the weaker. And knowing well the Duke of Bourgonnges humour, seeing the Dauphin incensed against him, he leaues a goodly army, to make a benefice of these diuisions. The euent fauoured his desire, but not his proiect: for meaning to assist the Bourguignon, he finds that he had made his peace with our Charles.

Having

Henry landed at Harfleur, a sea towne seated vpon the Riuer of Seine, he sends his Herald to demand his daughter Katherine. This was a matter farrecher, and a strange course, but this daughter must be the ground of many miseries for this Realme, and likewise an occasion to free this Realme absolutely from the English by a strange means, and (as we may say) admirable, as the course of our History will shew.

Henry takes Harfleur by composition. Before he takes possession of this conquest, hee goes bare-footed to the Church, to giue God thanks. He had not his whole army with him, one part attended him at Calais, having an intent to ioine with them, and so to fortifie his troops. With this resolution he lodgeth at Fauille, and passing through Caux to the County of Eu, he comes to Vimet, to passe the Riuer at Blanquetaque (an infamous place by our losse) where the passage being surprised, he takes his way towards Arennes, and from thence to Baillu in Vimet, seeking to passe the bridge at Remie: but not able to force it, he recouers Hangest vpon Somme, and so passeth the riuer at Voyenne and Bethencourt, places ill guarded by them of Saint Quintin: and then he lodgeth at Mouchy la Gache, toward the Riuer of Miramont.

He had in his army six thousand horse, and twenty thousand foot. That of King Charles was farre greater of it selfe, besides the Bourguignons troops (which were drawn together for another intent then to fight with the English): they were in all about twenty thousand horse, and three score thousand foot, and therefore Henry did shun the battell, and sought how to saue himselfe through the fennes. Our accustomed rashnesse, and wilfull forgetfulnesse of two experiences past against the same nation, and in the like occurrences, made vs to note with blacke and mournfull letters that overthrow and calamity. Henry demanded passage to returne into England, yielding vpon Harfleur and other places conquered in this voyage: but we sought our owne decay. The Constable Albret commanded the Foreward that day, and with him were the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the Earles of Eu and Richmond, the Lord of Bouciquault Marshall of France, and the Lord of Dampierre, Admiral. The battell was led by the Duke of Bar, and the Earles of Alençon, Vaudemont, Neuers, Blamon, Salines, Grandpre and Rouffy. The Rere-ward by the Earles of Marle, Dampmartin, and Fouquembergue.

Henry (being denied passage by the Constable) refuses to fight, putting his trust in God and his owne valour, determining to vanquish or dye, he made choice of a place of hard access, and the better to fortifie his archers, euery one had a sharpe stake planted before him. The French ordered as before, attended their enemies, either looking who should begin the game. Impatience forceth the weaker, like desperate men, the English Archers begin the fight with such a fury, as the French foreward cannot endure the violent fall of this furious storme: the Constable Albret was slaine fighting in the foremost ranke. The duke Anthony of Brabant, brother to John duke of Bourgongne, (seeing this disorder) leaues his troupe to redresse it, but he was also slaine by the English bow-men, with his brother Philip Earle of Neuers. The battell was likewise forced after a great fight. The rere-ward fled, and saued themselues in the nearest places of retreat. So as the losse was not so great, as the shame and overthrow. They number ten thousand men slaine, but their rashnesse was inexcusable. The head smarted for it, and the Bourguignons brethren had there an honorable tombe. Charles duke of Orleans and Lewis of Bourbon, the Earles of Eu, Richmond and Vendosme (the strongest pillars of the Orlean faction) with many Noblemen and Gentlemen, were taken and led into England. This defeat chanced the 20 day of October, in the year 1415, called the euill battell of Agincourt. And as one mischiefe comes neuer alone, the bodies slaine at this defeat were scarce buried before Lewis the Dauphin dies. This Lewis (eldest sonne to our Charles, sonne in law, and a terror to the Bourguignon) was little lamented of the people, and lesse of his father in law, who hated him to the death. A Prince of little valour and much toyle; more busied with himselfe then with the affaires hee managed, the which he made troublesome by his insufficiency and presumption to know much, vnwilling to learne from others what hee vnderstood not, for the good of the State and his owne duty.

John duke of Touraine his brother, succeeded him in degree, as the first Prince of the blood, and the Earle of Armagnac was made Constable, in the place of Charles or Albret who shall minister good occasion to speake both of his life and death. John duke of Berry brother to our Charles the fifth, augmented these losses. A wise Prince and young ning, commendable in all things, but for his couetousnesse, the which made his vertues of lesse fame. A blemish very ill becomming a generous and heroicke spirit. These great losses should have made the Bourguignon humble, but he became more insolent, making new practices to raise himselfe, having no competitor. Imbracing this occasion, he gathers together what troopes he can, with an intent to goe to Paris. The Queene and Constable of Armagnac (unwilling he should come armed) command him in the Kings name, not to approach. The Parisians were not then so well conceited of the Bourguignon, being restrained by the Court and Vniuersity, but especially by the Kings authority being present, who spake whatsoeuer his wife and the Constable would haue him, being then alone in authority in the Kings Councell.

The Bourguignon renews the warre.

The Bourguignons troopes kept the field, committing all kinde of insolencies and spoiles: against whom the King made Edicts as against common theues, giuing the people liberty to kill them. But this did nothing mollifie the heart of this reuengefull Prince, borne for his Countries misery, having no other intent but to afflict it with new calamities. To this end (as in the Kings sicknesse the Dauphin had the name and authority of the State) he sought to winne the fauour of John, succeeding in the right of his brother deceased. This occasion was offered, but the issue was contrary to his designe.

The Emperour Sigismund comes into France.

The misery of our France was such, as the common duty of humanity, moued foraign nations to pity, foreseeing our ruine, if the warre betwixt France and England continued. In this common desire, the Emperour Sigismund (by the consent of the Germanes) came into France. His traine and the good worke he vndertooke, deferred an Imperiall Marriage; but the end will shew his intent to be other then he protested. Being ariued in France (to the great content of all the French) he findes our Charles at his deuotion, who receiued him with all the pompe he could giue to so great a Monarch, making shew of the great desire he had to make a peace betwixt the French and the English, for the generall good of both Estates. But this accord was but halfe made.

The Emperour (having remained some time with Charles) goes into England, where he finds Henry of another humour; putt vp with the happy successe of his affaires and the weaknesse of ours, and in truth the measure of our miseries was not yet at full. So Sigismund (having perswaded Henry in vaine) retournes into France. Charles (to honour him) sends his sonne John Duke of Touraine and Dauphin of Viennois into Picardy, to meet him, having married the daughter of the Earle of Hainault, as great a friend to the Bourguignon, as it affected to the French. The Emperour seeing his labour lost, in seeking this reconciliation, takes his shortest course into Germany, leaving a reasonable subiect to the cleare-sighted, to iudge that hee had another intent then to settle a peace in France, by countenancing of the Bourguignon, the instrument of her miseries: for after this young Prince had spoken with the Emperour, hee is wholly changed in fauour of the Duke of Bourgongne, and resolves to bandy with him against the Duke of Orleans. This foundation being layd by the Emperours policy, it was fortified by the Earle of Hainault, father in law to John the Dauphin. Now he embraceth the greatest and most dangerous enemy of all true Frenchmen with a wonderful affection.

The Dauphin comes into France.

But the subtilty is taken in his owne snare; and the end doth bewray the intent. As all things tended to a manifest change by meanes of this young Prince, enchanted by his charmes, having a spirit like vnto waxe apt to receiue any impression, from so subtill artifice as the Bourguignon beheld death cuts off all these hopes, cast in the mould of this new authority, buried in John's tombe, who died during these practices, at Champagney, when as the fire began to kindle in fauour of the Bourguignon, and to the apparent reducing of troubles in France.

To John succeeded Charles Earle of Ponthieu, the youngest son to our Charles the first. He remained also the first Prince of the blood, with the prerogatives of the fundamentall law. A Prince that shall minister much matter to talke of his life in the course of our History, guided by the singular providence of God, to raise vp this Monarchy, almost ruined. The last, but the happiest of all his brethren: for this is that Charles the sixth, who (being corrected by that furious Gyant of Bourgongne) in the end shall expell the English, and braue a fore-way to his posterity, to restore this Estate, to reueer the ruine. But this shall not be without many painfull difficulties, the which the order of our History commands vs to represent in their due places.

John of Bourgongne the murtherer of Lewis of Orleans (having added new troubles to the former) ioynes with Isabel Queene of France: Who having declared her selfe Regent of the Realme, makes warre against her sonne Charles the Dauphin; seizeth upon Paris, and there commits a cruell massacre, where the Constable of Armagnac, and Henry of Marle Chancellor of France, are slaine. But this John of Bourgongne is in the end slaine by the Dauphin.

The Queene takes vpon her the Regency.

From the yeare 1415, to 1419.

A New kinde of misery now supplies the stage, to despite Nature by the franticke drunkenness of our confused passions. An vnnatural mother forgets her onely son; the bandies with his capitall enemy against her owne blood, seeking to transport the hereditary Crowne to strangers, a Crowne inalienable by the Law of State; to the end this Medea might fight both against Nature and the lawes of the Realme. A horrible phrensie, aft of Ciuill warre, that is to say, of the assured ruine of the State. They call it Ciuill (being the ruine of Citizens) but very vnciuill indeed: for if wee shall iudge thereof by the barbarous and brutish cruelties, what is there in the whole world more vnciuill? But alas, behold the image of vnkinde confusions, wherof the fury of our warres hath made vs eyewitnesses; for haue we beheld lesse, hauing seene the Crowne set to sale, and our Kings blood shed vpon our Scaffold? But the History requires audience, to report things in their order, as they haue chanced, according to the causes and motives.

Charles an enemy to the house of Bourgongne.

Charles Earle of Ponthieu had marryed the daughter of Lewis of Anjou, king of Sicilia, a capitall enemy to the Bourguignon. So this young Prince bred vp from his youth in hatred against the house of Bourgongne, must be the instrument to ruine him and his whole race. He loued his pleasure much, and sometime he gaue himselfe vnto it with too great a scope; yet he could apply himselfe well to serious affaires, and force his spirits in necessity: firme in his resolutions, and immoueable in his designs, wherein he happily ended his dayes, restoring the Realme strangely shaken by the errors and losses of his predecessors. In this beginning of his new authority, he was faithfully (though not prelibably) assisted by the Constable of Armagnac, one of the chiefe pillars of the Orleans party, and almost alone, since the imprisonment of the duke of Orleans, and the death of the duke of Berry, the King continuing in his infirmities, sometimes better, sometimes worse, but alwayes weak both of body and minde.

The Bourguignon had his troopes together, to the great spoyle of the Country, who complained still without any redresse. This Prince being resolute in his course, seekes all occasions of new garboiles, his hatred encreaseeth daily against the contrary faction, seeing them advanced and in credit, being out of hope to haue any interest in this new Dauphin, who was wholly possessed by Armagnac, an old fox, and an irreconcilable enemy.

He hath practices in Amiens, Abbeuille, Peronne, and all other good townes of Picardy: who by reason of neighborhood are easily drawne to his party, making goodly protestations to maintaine them in peace and liberty vnder the Kings obedience. Hee writes likewise to all the good townes of the Realme, complaining of the death of John Duke of Touraine, a Prince whom he assured to be wholly giuen to the good of the State, and for this cause had bene poysoned by the enemies of the publike quiet. But his true intent was, to make such odious as were in credit about the Kings person, although hee named them not in his letters, but in noting them he made a still and a dangerous warre against them, encouraged by his forces and perswasions, who entering the Cities freely, and causing his letters to be publicly read, he moued their hearts by the feeling of former confusions, the blame whereof the Bourguignon laid vpon his enemies.

The King (that is to say) his Councell, being encountered both by writings and force, should likewise oppose armes & writings against the Bourguignon; but he sends the Lord of Cagny to treat with the Bourguignon, which negotiation was fruitlesse, both for that the person sent vnto him was odious, as also by reason of his charge, which was not pleasing vnto him. He had an intent to put Cagny to death; but the respect of his Master withheld him, making answer to all his instructions, specified at large in the original of this History. But what availes it to repeat many vaine words without any effect? In briefe, these are but accusations and excuses, plaints and counterplaints. All protest to beate Kings servants, and all ruine the King in troubling the Realme. What plainier Comentarie can we desire of these factions, then what we haue heard and seene in our time? The Bourguignon made a more dangerous war then with papers; he had secret practises within the cities, to winne the inhabitants. Hee also drew the English into armes, and armed himselfe, ioyning their forces together, but with diuers intentions, yet their generall designe was to afflict France, fishing in a troubled water, making their profit of our confusions, and building their affaires vpon the ruine of the realme.

The Dauphin Charles plaies another part, he had scarce knowne the Court, when as he was forced to goe into Aniou, to the funerals of Lewis duke of Aniou King of Sicilia his father in law, and to assure the Duchie, being in some danger by reason of the neighbourhood of the duke of Britanie, a doubtfull friend in the incertitude of those consulted times. Being ariued, beheld a charge of difficulty for the first fruites of his new authority. The people were mutined at Rouen, they had slaine Gaucourt gouernour of the city, the Advocate, and the Kings proctor, and besieged the Caste, and to multiply these calamities the Bourguignon is in field, and besiegeth S. Florentine. The Kings army is not dismissed, but disperfed into diuers parts, according to the necessity of his affaires. The Dauphin hauing need of the greatest part for Rouen, sends the lesser to the besieged; but the succours being weake and slacke, Saint Florentine yeelds to the Duke of Bourgogne. This hard beginning might haue beene preiudiciall to his affaires at Rouen, but they succeed better; for the chiefe of the City met the Dauphin, and excuse themselves of this tumult, imputing it to the people over-charged: they beseech him to pardon this fault, and to receiue their voluntary obedience. Thus he is honourably receiued into the city, already pacified, and settles all things with mildnesse.

But there are other newes of harder digestion; for the Bourguignon marcheth to Paris with a great power, and the English takes part in Normandy with a thousand faile. There were reasons on either side to ballance these great difficulties, and to trouble the Dauphin: for whither shall he goe first? If he march to Paris, the English will conquer without resistance: If he make head against the English, then Paris is lost, being wholly inclined to the Bourguignons practices: who fees not but the losse of the capital city of the realme would be his ruine, and the ouerthrow of all his designses? but Charles did not foresee greater difficulty at hand by his mother, more waythe and dangerous then all the rest, yet must he auoide all these three stormes, not without great danger; that the providence of God, (the preseruer of this Monarchie) might shew it selfe more admirable, restoring this estate, being in shew vtterly lost. For Charles (who in so sharpe an encounter reaped so worthy a victory) owes the homage vnto God, who gaue him meanes both to fight well, and to vanquish happily. The Dauphin standing doubtfull betwixt these two greater treames, resolues to goe to Paris, to defend the city against the Bourguignons practices, and to assure the Kings person, who he knew would speake whatsoever he pleased, being in his power. Henry of Marle Chancellor of France, remained at Paris with the King, being wholly at the Dauphins deuotion. The people stir not, being kept in awe by the Parliament and Vniuersity, who were then well united. But experience will soone discouer the inconsistency of humane attempts, when they seeme most assured; and the vanity of a multitude, being the actors of great mens projects.

The Bourguignon at one instant, doth publish his protestation, and displaies his colours, causing his troopes to march. He makes a declaration, containing the causes for the which he takes armes, that is: To reforme the State, extremely desolate, by the ill government of such as (abusing the Kings infirmity) managed the affaires of the realme at their pleasure, and without pity of the poore people, oppressed them with extraordinary charges, against all right and reason. Hee protested to haue no other intent, but to restore the Realme to her former liberty. But he shall change his copy, imposing new exactions, to the preiudice of the people; and shall grow offended with such as shall oppose themselves: so as it seems all this was but a maske to abuse the people, vnder the goodly shew of ease & liberty. But as at the first all seems goodly, so these glorious beginnings won him great credit with the French nation. Thus his army begins to march through Picardy toward Paris. All Cities open their gates, where he doth presently proclaim an exemption of all subsidies & other charges;

A charges, except of salt, as the gentlest imposition, seeing that all men without distinction paid their part. But about all, he was very careful, that his army should liue orderly and modestly, without any oppression to the poore people, being his ordinary discourse, as one greatly grieved for their afflictions, and being very desirous of their quiet and content.

These examples proclaimed his vertues, and wonne him the peoples hearts. Other cities in Picardy follow this example: Beauvais yeelds willingly vnto him, and shout out for ioy at his entry, he goes presently to Senlis, kept by Robert Denfis for the Armagnacs. The citizens (desirous to imitate the rest) seize vpon their gouernour, open their gates willingly, call in the Bourguignon, and receiue him with all ioy. From thence he marcheth speedily to Beaumont, the which hauing endured some Canon shot (being subiect to the house of Bourbon) yeelds vpon an easie composition. Ponthoife and Melun obey without any dispute. So by degrees he comes before Paris, and to shew his army to the Parisians, he lodgeth at Mont-rouge, but to approach neerer, he incamps slower, in a place called, The withered Tree, vnto this day; by reason their flood a great dried Tree. A presage what should after befall his greene and flourishing designses. Being there, he writes his letters to the King and city of Paris, full of cunning admonitions, beseeching the one, and exhorting the other, to hearken seriously to a good reformation of the State, the true and soveraign end of his armes.

In the meane time hee loseth not an houre. John of Luxembourg (during this necessary aboad at Paris) goes with a part of the army, to try the voluntary cities, and every day made new conquests. Chartres, Estampes, Gaillardon, Montehery, Auneau and Rechefort obey: and after some dayes of rest (to annoy Paris) he besiegeth Corbeil, a place of importance for the victualling thereof. But whilst he pressed Corbeil with exceeding hast, behold he suddenly abandons it against the opinion of all men.

The Dauphin and the Constable of Armagnac supposed, that seeing that he had lost his labour at Paris, he would seeke to possesse himselfe of places of easier conquest, according to his course begonne. But the effect will shew, that his rising was to an other intent, which bred a horrible combustion throughout the whole realme: for Isabel Queene of France, (discontented with her sonne Charles) inuents the Duke of Bourgogne to free her from captiuitie. Shee was then at Tours, with some guard, by the Kings commandement, for the which she blamed her sonne, and the Constable, who then had the gouernement of the Court. They kept not so strict a guard of the Queene, but she had liberty to walke both within and without the City, euen to the Abbey of Marmoutier, where she had her chiefe deuotion. This was a meane to giue intelligence vnto the Bourguignon, and to slip into his hands as we shall shew. Reason requires, the History should set downe the moriue of so vnnaturall a discontent: but she is silent, and reports onely a very light occasion, That the King coming from visiting of the Queene, who held her State at Bois-de-Vincennes, and returning to Paris, he met Lewis Bourdon a Knight going to Bois-de-Vincennes, who coming neer to the King, bowed himselfe on horse-back and passed on without any other reuerence. The King sends presently his prouost of Paris after him, commanding him to apprehend him, and to keepe him safely. The prouost executing his charge, rooke the said Knight and brought him to the Chastelet, where by the Kings command, he was cruelly tortured, and drowned in the riuier of Seine: and some few dayes after, by the commandement of the King, the Dauphin, and such as then gouerned at Paris, the Queene (accompanied with her sister in law the Duchesse of Buarria) was sent to Blois, and so to Tours, to remaine there in meane estate. William Torel, John Picard and Laurence Dupuis, were appointed for her guard, without whose consent shee durst not attempt any thing, no not to write a letter. These be the words of the Originall.

This her imprisonment, was aggravated by a new rigour. All the treasure which she had in Churches, or priuate houses within Paris, was seized on by the Constable of Armagnac, a free executioner of these proceedings. This shewes a notable dislike betwixt the husband and the wife, and the mother and sonne: but the cause is not specified. If it be lawfull to search into this secret, shall we say, that Queene Isabel mother to our Dauphin, louing the one better then the other (as the variety of the mothers affection to her children is too common) had strained all her credit to maintenance John, after the death of Lewis, being thus ingaged with the Bourguignon, whom she did hate deadly, by reason of the imprisonment of her brother Lewis of Bauaria? but as she had first loved, and after hated him, might he not in like sort receive him againe into fauor, as the diuersity of her passions did moue her by new occasions, to loue or hate the same man?

The Emperor Sigismund proceeding made it very suspitious, being the greatest instrument of the alliance betwixt Iohn and the Burguignon. And to what end did the Burguignon goe to him into Sauoy after all this? It is likewise to be considered, that the sodain death of Iohn encreased this womans fury against her sonne Charles, holding it for certaine, that by the Constables councill he had caused him to be paysoned. Ambition and choller are furious beasts, not to be restrained by respect, especially in a woman, in whom hatred and reuenge made deepe impressions. Iealousie might likewise be a violent counsellor vnto Charles. As if Charles (animated by the Constable of Armagnac, fearing lest his mother had some great practice with the Burguignon and his associates) had incensed the King against her, hauing moued him with some other pretext. But in effect she was wholly to restrain this womans power, depriving her both of liberty and treasure; but the euent will shew, that she was not alwaies busied at her distaste, or in her deuotion. The search of the motives is necessary in a History, especially in famous actions, but the doubtfull coniectures are free to euery mans iudgement. This is all the certainty of this action.

The Burguignon joines with the Queene.

The Burguignon being called by Isabel, leanes the siege of Coibeil, lodgeth his footmen in the townes of Beaufe, that were most fauorable vnto him, and with his horse (which were about ten thousand) he goes into Touraine, when as beheld (the Queene, being one morning at her deuotion in the Abbie of Marmoutier, according to her custome) he arriues with his horsemen at an houre appointed. He meetes the Queene, receiues her, and enters the Citie with her, without any difficultie, hauing first cunningly seized vpon the gates. Being entred, hee proclaims an exemption of charges in the Queenes name, and (being accompanied by the people) he presents himselfe before the Castle, which opens vnto the Queene, being exceeding glad, to see her selfe at liberty and to command freely. She referres her selfe wholly vnto the Burguignons will; who likewise seeks to vnderstand her name to make his designs more plausible. Hauing therefore assured Tours, they march to Chartres, a more conuenient towne for their affaires, lying so neere vnto Paris. Being there, & hauing assembled all the Clergy, Nobility, the three estates, and such Cities as they could of their faction, these cauleth Philip of Morueliers to make knowne vnto them, That by reason of the ill gouernment of the Realme, through the great weaknesse of the King her husband, and according to the degree whereunto God had raised her, being Queene of France, she desired infinitely to reforme it. And the rather for that Charles her sonne (corrupted by the ill counsell of the enemies of the State) shewed her not the duty of a child, to her griefe. So as to prouide good and wholesome remedies for the preservation of the State, and for the seruice of the King her husband, by the good aduice of her cousin the Duke of Bourgogne, a prince of the blood, she declares her selfe Regent of France. The which was pleasing vnto them all, with this tide: Isabel by the grace of God, Queene of France, hauing by reason of the King my Lords infirmity the gouernment and administration of the Realme, by an irrenocable grant, made vnto us by our said Lord and his Councill. And for confirmation of this new authority, she caused a seale to be made, whereon was grauen her image, standing right vp, with her armes hanging downe to the earth, as one without comfort and requiring helpe: on the one side were the armes of France, and on the other, that of France and Bauaria quartered, with these words. This is the seale of Causes, Soueraignties and Appellations for the King.

There were two Soueraigne Courts of Iustice erected, one at Amiens, and the other at Troy in Champaigne, with expresse charge not to goe to Paris. The office of Constable was giuen to the Duke of Lorraine, by the deprivation of the Earle of Armagnac, and the Chancellorship of France to Eustache of Laistre, by the giuing ouer of Henry of Marle. As these things began to kindle a new fire of milenes, there were certaine Bishops which labored to reconcile the Queene and Dauphin. The Burguignon accepts of the motion: but the Constable of Armagnac breaks off the treaty. An article which shall make him more odious with the people. The Burguignon hauing retired his army, and put his men into garrison, goes into Sauoy, where at that time the Emperour Sigismund was, (who

A (who erected the Earledome of Sauoy into a Duchie) and there did conferre with him at Mommellian. This was not without some great designe.

In his absence Philip of Bourgongne his sonne held a Parliament to resolute vpon the meanes to make warre with more aduantage. Thus the Burguignon wrought for his part. The Dauphin seeing the fields freed and without any enemy, thinkes good that the Constable of Armagnac should besiege Senlis, and the better to countenance his armes, the King himselfe goes with the army. The Towne being prest, they take a day to yeeld, if by the 17 of April they be not releued. Iohn of Luxembourg (whom the Burguignon had left in Picardy, for the fury of those places) gathers together what troopes he can, and comes at the day prefixed: at which time the townes-men made a great sally vpon the Kings campe, syring their tents and pauillions. The Constable (moued with this affront) cuts off the heads of foure of their hostilages, and they kill fix and fortie of his men that were prisoners. In the meane time Iohn of Luxembourg approacheth towards Creil, meaning to fight with the Constable, vrging him by sundry skirmishes, hauing sent Charles Daily towards Dampmartin with a good troope to stop the passage.

The sieges of Senlis.

The Constable (fearing the euent of a bataille, being loth to hazard the King) would not ioyne, but desirous to find some honest colour to auoyde the fight, he sends a trumpet, to know who commanded these troopes. And vnderstanding it was Iohn of Luxembourg, he answered in a brauery. Seeing it is neither the Duke of Bourgongne, nor his sonne, they are not for vs, let vs goe to Paris. So he returns without fighting, whither the chiefe of his affaires drew him, not fore-seeing the mischief which attended him, by reason of this retreat, being too preiudiciall to his honour: for the Parisians who hated him, and yet feared him for the reputation of his valor, began now to contemne him, noting in this retreat a kinde of cowardise, as hauing refused to incounter Iohn of Luxembourg, who had so brauely offered him the bataille. The brute of this shameful departure was published by the Burguignon faction to their masters aduantage. They embrace this occasion being loth the peoples heart should grow cold by any better successe, observing likewise that the King, Dauphin, Constable, Chancellor, and all the chiefe of that party were at Paris, to be all surpris'd together. The Duke of Bourgongne was vpon his returne from Sauoy, but he departed not without good instructions from the Emperour.

But leauing the Burguignons army in field, let vs note the estate of that great City of Paris, Perrinet Clerc a Smith; Iohn Thibert a Broker, Perrin Bourdichen a Cooper (such were they whom the Burguignon had made his Colonels at Paris) hauing practised all their friends with great secretie, and ingaged many; they aduertise the Lord of Lisle-Adam (who was gouernour of Ponthoife for the Burguignon) of their enterprife, the which was to deliuer him a gate, and a good troope of the Inhabitants within the heart of the City, so as they might haue souldiers to second their attempt. Lisle-Adam accepts thereof, and the euent was answerable to the designe: for these vnder-takers assigne him Saint Germaines gate: Perrinet had the Keyes. Lisle-Adam presents himselfe at midnight, being the houre appointed, with eight hundred armed men. He finds the gate open, and Perrinet attending him. Then he puts his men in bataille, lest hee should be taken in disorder, Perrinet shuts the gate and casts the Keyes into the ditch: and then without any noyse, he marcheth with this troope to the lesser Chastelet, where he had left a squadron of foure hundred men vnder the great vault, to lye more covertly.

Sedition at Paris.

Lisle-Adam hauing ioyned his troope with the Citizens (so as the one might assist the other, hee sends forth diuers troopes to giue the alarm in diuers quarters of the City, with charge to moue the people to armes. Euery troop marcheth speedily to his quarter, crying out with a terrible voyce in the dead of the night, Rise good people, peace, peace, God save the King and the good Duke of Bourgongne. At this noyse all rise, some to hide themselves, others to arme: so as in short time a great multitude (being armed) wander vp and downe the streets ready to fight. Their Captaines appoint them what houses of the Armagnacs they should force. The first troop must seize vpon the King; but before all was ready, the alarm was generall. Such as had most interest are loonest vp. Tanneguy of Chastel, prouost of Paris (a very trusty seruant to the Dauphin) wraps him in a sheet and carries him into the Bastille. A good leuaine which shall one day raise the dow, and the hand of him that kneads it. Some others also retired themselves thither, which shall serue in this Scene. Iohn Leuer, Robert Masson, the Vicont of Naubone and Bouciquaule.

The Constable of Armagnac in a disguised weed faues himselfe in a neighbours house. But all this troope flies to the Kings lodging at S. Pol. These Tribunes cause this poore sicke Prince to rise, without any respect: they force him to promise what they please, and to ride through the Citie, crying, God save the King, and peace: thinking by his presence to increase their troope, and to countenance their confusion.

The Chancellor taken.

This done, every troope seeks his quarter, and many are taken. The Chancellor of Marle is surpris'd in his lodging, and Raimond de la Guerre, who were good supporters of the Armagnac faction: many Presidents, Councillors, and masters of the Accounts were taken without any respect of persons. The Cardinals of Barre and Saint Marce, the Archbishop of Reims, the Bishops of Senlis, Bayeux and Constance, were carry'd away and imprisoned: all the prisons are filled with honorable persons. But what is become of the Dauphin and Constable? They search, they hunt in all places; yet finding nothing, they command by sound of trumpet, that every man should presently vpon paine of death discover the Armagnacs. The Dauphin was safe, but the Constable (discovered by his Host) is taken, carry'd away by one of these Tribunes and imprisoned; hee was in danger as he past through the streets, riding behinde him that had him in guard.

The Constable taken.

Thus was the night spent untill day, yet without any murder; and it seemes this was by commandement. This happened in the year 1418, the 23 of May, a pleasant day, the fore-runner of a mournfull Winter. The Dauphin having escap'd this danger miraculously by the good aduice of Tanneguy of Chastell, he resolves to doe his best in retiring himselfe else-where, and not to hazard his person with this furious and murderous people. By the faithfull meanes of this good servant, hee goes forth secretly in the night, and slips into Melun, leaping from place to place, like a bird that flies from bough to bough. From Melun he goes to Nemours, whether he sends for his most trusty servants, of whose helpes he had neuer greater need. The Marshall of Rieux comes vnto him with many of the Nobilitie: they consult of the meanes to recover Paris before it be supply'd with souldiers.

The Dauphin faues himselfe.

So they gather together fiftene hundred horse with all speed. The Marshall of Rieux hath the charge to leade them: while the Dauphin preserues the fortune of France in safety. A dangerous enterprise, which had no successe, but the honour to haue attempted it a thing altogether impossible, the which was executed with much lesse losse then the danger was great. The Battell held Saint Antonies gate sure, for the Dauphine. The Marshall of Rieux enters it with his troopes, and marcheth boldly to the Kings lodging, but he finds it empty, the King being retired to the Louvre. The alarm is giuen throughout the whole city, they must thinke of their retreat, stones, ryles, arrowes, and all things else fise from the houses & windows, the chaines are drawne, and the streets full of armed men: all cry, kill, kill the Armagnacs. The Marshall of Rieux leads his men happily in this retreat, and fearing Saint Antonies gate, he draws them forth so closely, as he escapes this great and imminent danger with little losse.

The Dauphin secretely to recover Paris.

This alarm had put the people into armes, who hauing chased their enemies out of the heart of their city, were quiet for that time, expecting some further command from the Bourguignon, and an end of this terrible tumult: while they take breath, others are drawne into the like murinie by their example. All the townes of Picardie, fauouring the Bourguignon greatly, make bonfires. Compiegne, Creil, Saint Maxance, Mouchy le Preux, Pont a Choisi, Noion, Laon, Soissons, Chauny, Peronne and Gisors (expelling their garisons) declare themselves of this party. Some dayes are spent thus quietly, since the first taking of prisoners.

But behold a new tumult like vnto a violent wind, which chanced the twelfth of Iune. In the morning all the people arme by the command of their Leaders. This furious multitude goes forth of their houses (like a swarme of Bees creeping from their combs) armed with all sorts of weapons. In short time there are forty thousand men assembled in the streets and market places. John of Luxembourg, James of Harcourt, the Vidame of Amiens, Lisle-Adam, Fosseaux, Chastellus, Cohen, Lambourg the new prouost of Paris, (with many others most trusty servants to the Bourguignon), are on horse-back in troopes, to second this multitude on foote, ready to fight as in a day of battaille, when as about foure of the clocke (like as when the heauens darkned with thick clouds, and theayre overcast, the thundrer tumbling in the ayre, suddenly when the lightning appeares, the crack breaks forth

A forth and teares a Towers top) this furious multitude, flocking from all parts of the City with a silent stillnesse, burst forth into diuers parts. They open the prisons and kill such as they meet, without any pity.

They murder Taylors, their wives and children, men and maides, but especially the poore prisoners are their object. In this tumult all cry, all howle, all are amazed. The confused cries of the murderers and murdered rebound vp to heauen. The Constables of Armagnac, and Henry of Marle (being brought forth with shoutes and reproches) are beaten downe and laid by for the triumph. The Bishops of Constance, Bayeux, Bureux, Senlis, Xaintes, and the Abbot of Saint Cernille got the same way. The Earle of Grandpre, Raimond de la Guerre, Hector of Chartres, Enguerand of Marcouilly, Charles Poupard, the Officers of the Court of Parliament, Chambers of Accompt, Requests and Treasurers conclude, all that are of any account are massacred. The blood runs through the City, the streets and walls ouerflow. The noted Armagnacs are thus murdered, but the fury of this mad multitude extends farther, even against such as had bene with them, and of their owne faction: for many affectionate Bourguignons were beaten downe, every man seeks his enemy to kill him vnder this pretext. The rascalls fall vpon the rich, and killing them as Armagnacs, they spoile their houses, as a lawfull prey of their conquest.

A horrible massacre of the Armagnacs at Paris.

The eye of this furious multitude spares neither sexe, age, nor quality. The Duke of Bourguignes followers are lookers on of this spectacle, and watch that none escape. The History makes mention of sixtene hundred cruelly murdered on this miserable day, noted to the dishonour of these detestable murderers, and to the griefe of France, to see her owne bowells thus defiled with her blood, and her memorie blest with this cruelty. This furie continued from foure of the clocke on the twelfth day, untill tenne the next day, nothing ceasing for the nights rest. These madde men (hauing refreshed themselves) seek out the felt to finish their most cruell worke.

The number of them that were murdered.

The prisoners of the great Chastellet made resistance against their fury: they are beheaded, forced and massacred, the greatest part are cast from the toppes of the Towre, and fall vpon their pikes, halberds and other weapons. The bodies of the Constable and Chancellor, lying naked vpon the stones, are carry'd to the marble table in the palace hall. To note the Constable by his accustomed scarfe, they see a bend of his skinne and yee is about his body. This spectacle is drawne about the City three daies together, and then carry'd out in a dung-cart, to a place where they cast all their carions and filth, without any buriall.

The Bourguignon was at Digion during this tumult at Paris, who was presently aduertised thereof. The History saies, that he seemed very glad of the taking of the City, but very sorry for the murder of the prisoners; but God, who kept a true register, shall one day put him in minde thereof. And in truth, he that shall duely consider all the circumstances of this confusion, cannot imagine, but it was done by his command. He gathers all the forces he can together, to guard the Queene to Paris, as it were in triumph. The Parisians meet him with great pompe, they offer him their most affectionate service, and present the Duke of Bourguigne and the Earle of Saint Pol his brother with purple velvet gownes, pouldred with Saint Andrews croffes, the which at their requests they presently put on, and so (drawing neere the Queenes coach) they enter the city of Paris, the people attending at their entry, and crying, God save the King and the good Duke of Bourguigne, the Coach being couered with flowers which they cast vpon it. And this was the Queenes and the duke of Bourguignes entry after the massacre.

The Queen &amp; the Bourguignon come to Paris.

But this Parisian ioy was soone returned into heauinesse, for within three moneths after this butchery, the plague entred the City, and slue about fourescore thousand persons in three moneths. The History obserues, that Perrinet and his companions (after they had eaten what they had gathered together by spoyle) perished miserably, little enioying their thefts. Most of the Noblemen and Gentlemen which had assisted these murderers died of the plague, except Lisle-Adam, who was referred to receiue his punishment from Henry of England, although vpon another occasion, as you shall see hereafter. And was not this God who reueng'd this cruelty? But let vs returne to our discourse, for seeing the punishment was so sudden, we might not well remit the rehearsal to any other place. Charles lookes but coldly vpon his wife, whom he loued not; neither in health nor sicknesse. Hee welcomes the Duke of Bourguigne with a cheerfull countenance, nance who had wonne his heart, by framing himselfe to his weaknesse with milde speeches, shewes of honour and apparant humility, impressions of common sense, whereof phrensie for the most part doth not deprive madde men.

The Kings Councell assembled presently, many things were propounded the first day, they beganne with Officers, the Constables place was confirmed to the Duke of Lorraine, and the Chancellorship to Eustache de Laune. Lisle Adam and Chastellus are made Marshalls of France, for their well defending at the massacre at Paris. Our Bourguignon creates Charles of Lens Admirall of France, being Captaine of Paris; and Philip de Meluilliers the Queenes Advuocate, first president of the Court of Parliament.

The English take all Normandy.

During this confusion, Henry King of England makes other worke. Hee was in Normandy, taking townes and castles without any resistance. Touques (a castle held impracticable) was forced by him, during the passions of our mad-man, as the first fruits of his conquests, Louviers, Pont Larche, Caen, Cherebourg, Falaise, Argenton, Alembic, Constance, Saint Lo, and other places followed, to make the way open to Rouen without any great difficulty.

Rouen is besieged in a manner the very day of the massacre at Paris. Henry doth assist it with all the force and policy he can, as the Dongeon and chiefe strength of all Normandy. The citizens give a testimony of good and faithfull subiects by their valour and constancy. They demand succours from the King, with a protestation of the event. The Court makes shew to stirre & to provide for their defence, but what remedy can the dead give unto the sicke?

In the end, after all their resistance, seeking to maintaine themselves vnder the obedience of France, Rouen yeeldeth to Henry King of England vpon hard conditions. To pay him three hundred sixty five thousand crownes of gold, and three cities at his choise to doe his pleasure with. And so he suffered them to enjoy their privileges. Of the three which he had chosen to punish, he pardoned two, and caused Alain Blanchet, Captaine of the commons to be beheaded, worthy to be eternized in our History, dying for the service of his King and country, in a time so famous for so desperate a confusion. The sequell was great, for not onely all the townes of Normandy yeeld vnto him, but the Isle of France was so amazed, as all obey him euen to the gates of Paris, where the fury of our miserable dissensions prepared a Throne for the sworn enemy of the Realme.

I am weary to report our shameful losses, as reuiuing our old fores. Henry might haue grauen in his triumph: I came, I saw, and overcame: onely Mont Saint Michel in Normandy was maintained vnder the obedience of our Crowne, through the valour of some Gentlemen Normans, whose names the history owes to posterity. John of Montfort Duke of Britanie (seeing this happy successe) makes composition with the English, surrendering himselfe vnder his protection, but he shall soone leaue him, when a more happy season shall make him turne to the Dauphin. In this shipwracke the Queene and the Bourguignon had meanes to glut their ambition and fury at Paris, beholding the ruine of France, hoping that in all extremities they should make their peace with the King of England at their Countries cost, hauing a Daughter for a pawne and confirmation of this accord.

The Bourguignon treats with the English but in vain.

They send Ambassadors to Henry King of England being a conqueror, and for a bait they carry the portrait of Katherine of France, the Kings daughter, a Princess of excellent beauty, who must likewise bee the leuain of our miserie. But Henry finding this figure to be faire, desires to see the essentiall substance, so as the Queene and the Bourguignon (gouerning the spirit of this poore sicke King) conducts him in person with his daughter, to their enemy neere to Meulan, to aduise of a meanes for a generall Peace; but they departed without any conclusion, by reason of the great demands which Henry made, put vp with this victorious successe, seeking to sell his friendship at too high a rate. Yet the Image of Katherine had made an impression in his heart, being much discontented that they had refused her with these conditions.

He grows discontented, and seeks to reconcile himselfe with the Dauphin.

The Bourguignon likewise found lesse kindnesse then he expected, and returned malecontent, for that Henry (putt vp with these fortunate encounters, and caried away with hope of future victory) spake more proudly then the Bourguignons humour could well digest, which was the cause of his distemperature; for Henry said in his choler, The

A he would haue both daughter and Realme, whosoeuer said nay, and that there was no sufficient security for what they promised, seeing the Dauphin did not consent therunto. A pill which the Bourguignon could not easily swallow. So he chawed vpon this speech of the English, which drew him to his ruine, for euen then he began to study by what meanes hee might reconcile himselfe vnto the Dauphin, hoping to finde a better composition with a young Prince his kinsman, and weary of the warres, then with the English growne insolent by his victories. Charles was not quier in mind, fearing lest in these treaties they should conclude something to his preiudice. So as they both ended in an accord, but vpon two causes, to oppose against their common enemy with a common force. But before we shew the effect of this common desire, wee must see both the estate of our Dauphin (since he retired himselfe from Paris) and of the Bourguignon, since he became Tribune of the people.

Although this terrible storme might haue shaken the young yeeres of the Dauphin Charles, vnacquainted with the affaires of the world, and his disposition (enclining to pleasure) seemed vnfit to endure much paine and toyle: yet the effects of need shewed his constant resolution against all difficulties. They attribute this constancy and resolution to the faithful counsell of his seruants, yet was it much for him to follow La Tranchee, of Chastell, John Louvet President of Prouence, the Viscount of Narbonne, and Robert Maupas, were those which serued him most for Councell in the beginning, but God soone after did raise him vp strong hands to manage armes courageously and valiantly, la Hire, Prin of Saint Treille (whom commonly they call Zintrilles), the barbard of Orleans, with other braue and fortunate Captaines, which shall bee famous in the course of our Historie.

But the Realme was strangely diuided into these factions. The Kings authority and the capital City were for the Queene and the Bourguignon. Picardy, Bourgoigne, and many townes in Bry, Champagne and Beausse obey them absolutely after these massacres. Only Sens in Bourgoigne held out, the which they could not pull from the Dauphin. The Prince of Orange (of the Bourguignon faction) makes war for him in Dauphin and Languedoc, to crosse the affaires of our Charles, who notwithstanding had the greatest part of the Country at his deuotion, with the friendship of Auignon, and of the Earldome of Venissain or Venissie. The English possessed all Normandy, and a great part of Guienne; but Rochel, Poitiers, Saint John D'Angely, Angoulesme, Fontenay, and some other townes acknowledged the Dauphin. All Aniou was his, Auvergne, Berry, Bourbonois, Forest and Lionois obeyed him, so as they are deceiued which thinke that hee onely held the City of Bourges in those dayes, vnder colour that his enemies called him King of Bourges, because he made his chiefe residence there, when as his mother, called her selfe Regent. He likewise tooke vpon him the name of Regent: A name which fortified his title with great authority, and did countenance his affaires in those difficulties and confusions.

The Queene and the Bourguignon laboured by all meanes to winne him, they sent him his wife honorably attended, with all her jewels, promising him his place with respect and obedience; but their meaning was to bee rid of him, not able to know how to conforme him to their humours. In keeping himselfe far from them, hee preferred his head for the Crowne, the which attended him, he pretended the ambitious designs of his enemy, and made himselfe to be more respected throughout the Realme.

At these horrible massacres, his Captaines roused vp their spirits. Borguignans seized on Champagne, Pierre Fons, and Scissions for him, who (molesting Picardy, and the Isle of France with their daily roades) held Paris in iellousie. He himselfe had part of the honour in the execution of these conquests, not leading all to his seruants, for he leapt out of Anion into Touraine, besieged and rooke the City of Tours. The Duke of Britany seeing the happy successe of the Dauphins affaires, leaues the English, and loynes with the Dauphin, as the strongest port.

Behold the estate of our Dauphin, who grows constant and resolute amidst these tempests, and what was the estate of our Bourguignon? In the beginning his partisans were all his name, for the zeale of his seruice; but finding not what they expected at his hands, began successe in his affaires, but rather the discommodities of Paris, and other places vnder his obedience to encrease; this hee abated daily, finding by experience, that the cause of these warres was light, being but humours and priuate quarrells, very prejudiciall to the State, the which the English did sappe, undermine, and ruine, seizing day vpon whole Prouinces, without any difficulty.

Thus Hennies victories were plaine demonstrations to the most passionate, to discover the Bourguignons dissembling: for, who sees not but his end was to gouerne, to the yuine of France? In the end euery one comming to his right wits, findes that of a Frenchmen he is become an Englishman. The folly or fury of a faction could not mortifie the feeling of lawfull obedience, vnder which they were borne. To what end (sayes the common sort of these cleere-sighted) shall we vndoe our selues, for the passions of the Duke of Bourgogne, opposing himselfe against the lawfull heyre of the Crowne? Thus the Bourguignon sees the affections of his partakers to grow daily cold. A worne which mented him hourly, hauing grounded his chief hopes vpon their constancies, who promised to stand firmly to him at all euents.

Doubtlesse, whatsoever the Gyants of States haue imagined, setting one hill vpon another, the Pyrenies vpon the Alpes, with all the Appenin, to scale the throne of the French Monarchy, promising vnto themselves euents according to the moulds of their imaginations, yet cannot the French yeild to any strangers command, no more then to change nature and become a stranger.

But to encrease the Bourguignons hearts grieffe, his chiefest instrument not onely fails him, but is ready to turne violently against him. For what hath he not attempted to win the loue of this multitude at Paris, and of the greatest Cities of the Realme, making them beleue, that he burnt with zeale of their good, and the publike weale, the onely end of all his designs, feeding them with these goodly and popular promises of exemption of charges and impositions? But they beginne all to mutine, seeing he spake one thing, and did thinke another, and oppressed them more then those whom he had condemned as causes of publike oppressions: for whatsoever he imagined, yet had hee need of money. For how could he else make warre? how could he entertaine his great traine? his paynes, and his reputation among strangers? and where should he rayse it, but vpon such as obeyed him? to seeke it at such as could resist, were to mistake, and to make his reckoning alone in vaine. Moreouer, this people (whom hee had so much countenanced, making themselves masters by his power, to become by their means master of his enemies) would be generally obeyed, and why not of the Bourguignon? seeing hee had opposed himselfe, and prescribed a Law to a sonne of France? If the Bourguignon doth worse then he hath done, shall not the people reduce him vnto reason? Hee hath promised exemptions of subsidies, and they are more grievous then before. Wee haue preuailed (say they) against a Constable, against a Chancellor of France, yea ouer the King and Queen, making them to yeeld her brother, and most trusty seruants, and shall we not suppress some few gallants, seruants to the Duke of Bourgogne? This was the Parisians ordinary discourse: and their Tribunes (who were not so well entertained as before) beganne to mutine. They resolute to seize vpon some of the Bourguignons Fauourites, and to punish them, who had perswaded him to renew the impositions, contrary to his promise.

These men (the concealing of whose names, notes the baseness of their qualities) hauing intelligence of this search, fled into the Bastile, and the people follow after as if they would ouerthrow it. A great multitude begins to vndertake it, and had preuailed, if the Bourguignon had not instantly come much discontented, who seeing himselfe enuironed with so great a troope of armed men, fearing the losse of his head, he was forced to deliuer his seruants to the people, who put them all to death, to teach the Bourguignon that they had no lesse authority and power ouer him, then ouer the King, and the Dauphin his sonne. This occasion thrusts the people into greater fury, who (being thus armed) choose a Head, called Cappeluche Bourrel, to finish their executions vpon some such as might recieue these impositions and publike charges. They march through the City and enter into many houses to rob, and spoile vnder colour of apprehending of such as had assisted at these innovations. The rich men feared for their owne particular, but the Bourguignon more then all, knowing himselfe to be the author of this disorder, hauing thrust the people into armes: for what successe should this disordered libertie haue, but to fall vpon the authors thereof? Hauing therefore wonne some of the chief

A Commanders, they choose out a troope of the most wilfull munitious, to bee freed of them, vnder colour of sending them to the warre against the Dauphinois, which had surprised the castle of Montleher, and began to run euen to the gates of Paris. Yet they retained Cappeluche Bourrel, vnder colour of some special seruice. But the Bourguignon being growne the stronger, with the chiefe of the City, he cauleth Bourrel to bee taken and hanged, with some number of his associates. This multitude being at Montleher, discontented with the Bourguignon, leaves the sieg, and returns to be reuenged: but the gates were shut, and the wals well guarded, so as all passed without any more adoe. But the Bourguignon was much perplexed, being troubled in mind to haue put a sword into a madmans hand: being afraid of an vnsecure guard, and a foretelling that his Empire should not continue long.

So, the repulse he recieued from the English, the coldness of the Nobility of his party, and the peoples change, were the motives which made him wish for the Dauphins friendship, who now preuented him, although he had often refused it. That which moued Charles thereunto, was necessity, and the hope of a greater designe, finding no better means to stop the current of the English victorie, and the Bourguignons treacherie, then to ioin with him, attending some better occasion. The successe fauoured this counsell of his followers. He sends Tanneguy of Chastel to the Duke of Bourgogne, to make the first proposition, and after him the Lady of Giac (in whom the Bourguignon had great confidence) to appoint a day and place for a parlee, and to seeke the means of a good peace. They meet at Pouilly the strong, neere vnto Melun, in the open field with their guards. The Bourguignon talked to the Dauphin on his knee, & held his stirrop, although Charles refused this submission. Proofoes to shew with what necessity he sought his friendship, as a man that is beaten with all winds and out of breath. So they conclude an inuolable peace, and to bandy themselves against the common enemy of France, promises are made on either side, with all demonstrations and protestations of a firme and inuolable friendship. The Articles of their accord and contract are set downe at large in the originall of our History. This peace betwixt Charles the Dauphin, and John Duke of Bourgogne, was made neere to Pouilly the strong, vpon Ponchiel, a league from Melun, in the yeare

D 1419. All France reioyced, as after a long and sharpe winter, when the Sunne appeareth in a pleasant Spring. The King and all the Parliaments ratified this accord, which euery man held for the gage of firme friendship betwixt these Princes, and their loue for a firme pillar of the Realmes quiet. But the prouidence of the protector of this French Monarchy had otherwise decreed. These reconciliations could not serue for sufficient cautions against his iustice, worthily incensed against the Bourguignon, being guilty of horrible crimes, and the wilfull abuse of his patience. The course which Charles held to be rid of his enemy, is not commendable: but in one and the selfe-same worke, we must wisely distinguish of that which is of God, and that which is of man, to approue the good which is alwayes iustified in Gods ordinances, and to blame the ill, alwayes to be blamed in man: that we may stop our mouthes, and open our eyes, and not reply against the iudgements of God, but view the strange and extraordinary punishment of the Bourguignons strange and extraordinary crimes, who during the weaknesse of our poore King, hath so much troubled the Realme.

We haue said (and the course of the History will shew it very plainly) that the Dauphin Charles suffered himselfe to be gouerned by his seruants. By their aduice hee had made this accord with the Bourguignon, wherein they had either of them severall respects: although eithers intent was to make his profit with the others losses, in circumuening of his companion. But he that made his account to deccieue (hauing not yet changed his mind, although the present necessity made him to change his countenance) was deccieued: and which is more, he which built his greatest designs vpon murder, is murdered, being the onely expedient the Dauphins seruants could deuise to free him from these troubles, in dispatching the Bourguignon once for all.

This resolution was very great, but to perswade this Prince thereunto, was of greater difficulty: A young man, iust, wise, moderate and of a very milde disposition, so as they had much adoe to perswade him to so bold and violent a remedy. Why my Lord (say they) can you beleuee that the Duke of Bourgogne is anything amended? although hee stop now to necessity, can he bend his heart to reason? haue you forgotten what hee did to your deceased Vncle the Duke of Orleans, when as he held the same degree that you do now: did he not kill him, and maintained it as well done? braued the King in Paris, armed himselfe against him, and forced him to iustifie this execrable murder? Hee masked himselfe with a shew of good meaning, to make his accord with your poore Cousin of Orleans, but was it not with an intent to ruine them with the more facility, seeking to diuide them from your deceased vncle the Duke of Berry, incensing the King and your eldest brother against them, making Edicts against them, as guilty of high treason, and pursuing them with cruell force; when as your brother (discouering his wickednesse) had forsaken him, and that he (yeelding to necessity as he doth now) concluded a peace: did he not arme himselfe by a new deuice, to ruine your blood, opposing both Paris and the States of the Realme, vnder the name of the Common-weale, to put to death the best seruants of the King your father, incensing the people against them, being the furious executioners of this execrable rage? And when as he found these popular furies not to succeed well, hath he not fled to force, yea seeing his great enemy your cousin of Orleans prisoner, and your vncle of Berry dead, hath he mortified his cruell designs in these common calamities? He hath rather stirred vp the Emperour to trouble the State, laboured to draw your deceased brother John to his humour, to kindle new fires, and to consume you and them. You (my Lord) are he who onely troubles him, who onely may frustrate his designs, and therefore he strives to take away your head, and set your Crowne vpon his: what hath he not attempted against you? His last actions are worse then the first: there he sought to abuse your brother with your cousins, here hee opposeth your mother against you. There he did openly fight against the law of State, here he doth openly oppugne the law of nature. There (by his policy) he did nourish ielousie betwixt kinsmen, here by his audacious violence he teares in funder the womb wherein you did lie, to ruine the State. For to what end doth he giue the regency to your mother, (the King your father living) and you being borne Regent during his life, and King after his death? To what end should he flye to a furious multitude, to decide your controuersies? He hath armed forty thousand men in the capital City of your Realme, and accompanied them with his best armes. To what end serued all that, but to make a tragical conclusion of his violent actions? why did he cause that massacre to be made when you were in the City, and sought for you so carefully, but to vie you as they did your Constable and Chancellor, and many of your good seruants as fell into their hands? And after all these exploits, the Bourguignon must call the English King into France, to giue him your sister in marriage: or rather to take your Crowne from you by peace-meales: for seeing hee cannot have all, hee seeks to diuide it. This is the apple for the which he sowes so much dissension. The law reiects him, and hee appeals to faith, to shadow himselfe with her cloake, and to deceiue you with more open shew. He therefore kisseth your hand, hee kneeles, hee kisses your stirrop, to hide his trechery with a shew of humility. Will you beleeme (my Lord) that he is in bad tearmes with the King of England? They ayme both at one common end. They haue sworne both to take away your life, but the Bourguignon may effect that which the English cannot. And that which they cannot worke by open force, they intend to effect by policy, couering it with this goodly shew of peace. What effects hee giuen you of this reconciliation? what towne hath he rendered? nay, what men hath he dismissed? Continuing still in armes he discouers his intent: hee meanes to ruine you with his Forces, being lodged in your bowels. His designs being well knowne vnto you (my Lord) will you suffer him to preuent you? We ought to warch for you and seek to meane to crosse him. It is lawfull to repell craft by policy. Faith is a holy thing, but it can with reason gaine-say, if a thiefe denies his name to circumuent vs, but that it is lawfull to surpriue him with his owne armes? To draw an enemy into a mischief which he had prepared for a good man, is no trechery, but wisdom, especially when there is question to preserve the State. Are you (my Lord) a priuate person? All this great boile (whereof God hath made you the head) stretcheth forth the armes, and craves you out against this thiefe, which hath sworne the ruine thereof. He attends but the houre to dispatch you, and to seize thereon. The safest course is to preuent him: your enemies shall perswade yours, and all your good and faithfull subiects. My Lord, we protest there is no priuate interest of ours; all is yours, and the publike-weales. The faith we haue vowed vnto you, commands vs to deliuer our free aduice. We haue liued, doe liue, and will

A liue, your faithfull seruants, euen vnto the death. The heart makes the mouth to speake, but our hands shall execute your commandments. 1419

The Dauphin (encouraged by these perswasions of his seruant) resolues. Wee haue said, that he parted from Tours, to parlee with the Bourguignon; but after that accord, he made a voyage into Berry to assure those places, and to leaue men, in shew to ioyne with him, and to oppose against the English with their common forces, but in effect it was for the murder of his greatest enemy. He had then twenty thousand fighting men with him. With this troope he comes into Soulogne, approaching neere vnto those places where his men might be best employed. Montreuil-laut-Yonne (a towne in Bry, where the Riuier of Yonne loseth her name, ioyning with Seine) held for him. From thence he sends Tanneguy of Chastel (a very sufficient man of his household, and his trusty seruant) to Troies in Champagne, to the duke of Bourgongne, desiring him to come vnto him to Montreuil, to resolue vpon the effecting of their accord, and to employ their common forces against their common enemy, hauing brought them to that end, protecting that he should be much greeued to see them burthenome vnto the people without vfe. Moreover, hee had some very priuate affaires to impart vnto him, as vnto his best and dearest friend.

Tanneguy had no other answer from the Bourguignon, but that it were better for the Dauphin to come to Troies to the King and Queene, his father and mother, to conclude things in their presence, and by their authority, the which should be very necessary, to reduce the affaires to some good course. Some dayes are spent in refusing and re-intreating. The Bourguignons conscience caused him to feare, & the proceeding was suspicious; but that the apparent dislike betwixt the mother and the sonne, needed the mediation of such a friend as the Bourguignon. This was a goodly pretext, to draw the Duke of Bourgongne to be a mediator of peace betwixt the Queene and the Dauphin; and the charge of their armies (being idle) was not small, the which urged this enteruiew. The Lady of Giac (of whom we haue spoken) was employed againe to sollicite this treaty. So as the Bourguignon comes to Bray vpon Seine, whither the Dauphin sent the Bishop of Valence vnto him, he was brother to Charles of Poitiers, Bishop of Langres, in whom hee had great confidence. This Bishop had in the end power to perswade him to goe to Montreuil, where the Dauphin attended him. The Bourguignon goes accompanied with five hundred horse, two hundred Archers, and many Noblemen, among the which was Charles the eldest sonne of the Duke of Bourbon, whom the Duke of Bourgongne had corrupted to weaken the Dauphins party, being a Prince of the blood. The Dauphin had prepared the Castle for the Bourguignon, but he vnfurnished it of all munition for warre, and vniuall, and caused the bridge to be fortified with three turnepikes, to stop their free entrance into the towne, whither the Bourguignon must come by duty vnto the Dauphin. This succeeded according to his designe, but it caried the shew of an enemy. The Bourguignon sends three gentlemen of his household to the Dauphin, Thoulougeon, Bray, and Sambrier to aduertise him of his coming. They giue him notice of the two Baricades made vpon the bridge, and with him not to adventure. Hauing referred it to his Council, all being on horsebacke, he resolues in the end to passe on: hee lights at the Castle where his lodging was assigned, and lets his guards at the entry of the gate towards the towne. Hereupon Tanneguy of Chastel comes vnto him, who after a due reuerence shewed him from the Dauphin, saying, that he attended him at the bridge foot, at the towne gate.

Then John of Bourgongne, hauing chosen out ten of his most trusty followers, (Charles of Bourbon, the Lords of Nouaille, Fribourg, S. George, Montagu, Vergy, Ancre, Pontauillier, Lens, Giac, and his Secretary Seguinat) hee approacheth to the first barre, where he encounters with some from our Charles, who entreat him to enter vpon his masters word, and assure him by oath. Before he enters, (as if his heart had foretold his harme) hee staves suddenly, and asks aduice of his company, who encouraging him to passe on, hee enters the second barre, the which was presently lockt, and then hee caused some to goe before him, and some behind, he remaining in the middle. Tanneguy of Chastel comes to recciue him, and the Duke laying his hand vpon his shoulder very familiarly, This is he (says the Duke) in whom I trust. I will conclude this bloody Catastrophe with the very words of the Originall. And so hee approached neere vnto the Dauphin, who stood all armed with his sword by his side, leaning on a barre. Before whom hee kneeled with one knee on the ground, to doe him honour and reuerence, saluting him most humbly. Whereat the Dauphin answered nothing, making him no shew of loue, but charged him with the breach of his promise, for that he had not caused the warre to cease, nor drawne his men out of garison, as he had promised. Then Robert de Loire tooke him by the right arme and said, Rise, you are but too honourable. The Duke hauing one knee on the ground and his sword about him, which hung not to his mind, somewhat too farre backe, kneeling downe he laid his hand on his sword to pull it forward for his case. Robert said vnto him, Doe you lay your hand vpon your sword before my Lord the Dauphin? At which words Tanneguy of Chastell drew neere vnto him on the other side, who making a figure, sayd, It is time, striking the Duke with a little axe so violently on the face, as he cut off his chin, and so he fell on his knees. The Duke feeling himselfe thus wounded, laid his hand on his sword to draw it, thinking to rise and defend himselfe: but he was presently charged by Tanneguy and others, and beaten dead to the ground. And suddenly one named Oliver Layet, with the helpe of Peter Fortier, thrusts a sword into his belly vnder his coat of maile. Whilest this was doing, the Lord of Nouailles drew his sword halfe out, thinking to defend the Duke: but the Vicount of Narbonne held a dagger, thinking to strike him. Nouailles leaping forcibly to the Vicount, wrested the dagger from him, being before hurt in the hinder part of the head, as he fell downe dead. Whilest this was doing, the Dauphin (leaning on the other side of the barre) beholding this strange sight, retired backe as one amazed, and was presently conducted to his lodging by John Louet and others his Councillors. All the rest were taken except Montagu, who leaped ouer the Turnepike, and gaue the alarme. There were none slaine vpon the place, but John Duke of Bourgogne and Nouailles: S. George and d'Ancre were hurt. The Dukes men charged home vnto the Turnepike, but they were easily repulsed. His troops retiring to Brayes pursued by the Dauphinois, with losse, and in the end the Castle is abandoned by him that had it in guard. The Dukes bodie (strip of all but his doublet and boots) is drawne into a Mill, and the next day buried. This happened the tenth of September, in the year 1419. Behold the end of John Duke of Bourgogne: Seeing then this murder committed the Dauphin, who had caused it to be committed, what stony heart would not be amazed therat? Truly the breach of faith is vnexcusable, howsoeuer it be disguised: for as faith is the ground of humane society, so doth it extend euen vnto enemies, with whom it must be inuolubly kept.

This blow shall be deare to Charles: Through this hole the enemy shall enter to stir into the Realme, as he shall put him in danger, and in the end he shall be forced to confesse his fault: not able to excuse himselfe without accusing of his Councillors. But from what man, let vs ascend to the wisdom of that great Iudge of the world, who is alwayes iust. The Oracle cries, He that strikes with the sword, shall perish with the sword: and The Lord will all to the dysloyall. They loved misery, and misery found them out. And wise Antiquary sayes God punisheth great wickednesse with great paines, euen in this life. And, Hardly can we defend into the graue with a dry death, that is, without blood or murder. Oh iustice of God, alwayes iust, alwayes wise, and alwayes good! Thy iudgements are righteous O Lord! Thou doste the error of men, yet I held my peace because thou didst it. Draw the curtaine. John of Bourgogne hath playd his part vpon this Theater. Hee had slaine the Duke of Orleans traitorously, and now he wallowes in his owne gore, being treacherously slaine by the Dauphin Charles. Now let vs see the care his sonne Philip Earle of Charolais had to the reuenge of Charles for this cruell murder: but all is not yet ended.

The Catastrophe of this miserable reigne.

Philip sonne to John Duke of Bourgogne stirres up great troubles against Charles the Dauphin, in reuenge of his fathers death. By whose means Isabel, an unkinde mother, makes warre against Charles her sonne, and peace with Henry the fifth, King of England, then a capital enemy to the State. She giues him her daughter Katherine in marriage, and procures King Charles the sixth, her husband, to declare Henry his lawfull heyre, and to disinherit his owne sonne Charles the seventh from the Realme of France.

During these occurrences Henry the fifth, and Charles the sixth dye, leauing the Crowne of France in question betwixt Charles the seventh, and Henry the sixth, proclaimed King of France at the Funerals of Charles the sixth.

From the year 1419, to the year 1422.

After this tragical and strange murder of John of Bourgogne, Philip his sonne, Duke of Bourgogne, by his decease, seeks to be reuenged vpon Charles the Dauphin, and Charles to defend himselfe. Philip was then in Flanders. The Parisians (passionate partisans of the Bourgignons) who had seene the Duke of Orleans murdered without moving, and they themelues had massacred the chiefe officers of the Crowne, and had shed the blood of many good men for his pleasure and passion, hauing repayed the blood formerly slaine by him in the same coyn, they now grow into a greater mutiny then if the King himselfe had beene slaine. They send their Deputies to Philip, and promise not onely to be faithfull, but to assist him with all their meanes, to reuenge the murder committed on the person of his father. And at the same instant, Montagu being escaped from the Turnepike, writes to all the Cities vnder the Bourgignons obedience, of this accident, the which he could report as an eye-witnesse. Charles on the other side writes to all the good Cities of the Realme, yeelding a reason of this murder, and imputing the fault to the Bourgignons bad dealing, who would haue slaine him at a parlee, exhorting the people not to moue for the iust execution of a man borne for the ruine of France, who had willingly thrust himselfe into this mischief: offering all his meanes to settle the Realme in peace, according to the authority whereunto God had called him. But in talking, he seeks to assure himselfe of some Countries, Stephen of Vignoles, called la Hire, and Peter of Xaintrailles, winne Crespy in Laonois, and Caradoz of Quefne with Charles of Flauay take Roze, places very important to trouble the Cities of Picardy, where the Bourgignon was chiefly obeyed. The strong Castle of Muin opposite to Crespy, and Roze is surprized by the industry of his seruants, and keeps all Vermandois and Laonois in alarme. This beginning caused Philip to seeke all speedy meanes to crosse Charles his proceedings, being resolute to continue what he had begonne: yet the Parisians were in some feare, pressing Philip againe not to abandon the seruants of his house, the which made him more prompt in the execution. Philip being assured of his Fleuings, obtains a suspension of armes from Henry the fifth, King of England, and a day and place appointed to treat a generally peace betwixt the two Realmes. Then marching with his army through Picardy, hee recouers Crespy, Roze and Muin, to the great content of his partisans: and so he arriues at Troies in Champagne, the appointed place for this Treatie.

Isabel Queene of France (a cruell Medea, and an vnnatural mother) continued her tragick choller against her sonne, who hauing defaced the common feeling of nature, did soon forget the honour he had receiued to be married into the House of France. Being thus wedded to the Bourgignons passions, hee tormented her poore husbands spirits, being exceeding weake, perswading him that his best course was to disinherit this wicked sonne, to declare his daughter heyre, and (in marrying her to the greatest King vpon the earth) to giue her likewise the Realme after his decease, and to her issue, as descended from the blood of France. Philip comming to the King, found new worke: for presently Henry the fifth, King of England, concludes a peace with King Charles the sixth, weddeth Katherine his daughter, and doth obtaine by Letters Patents, That establishing a firme and free peace in both the Realmes of France and England, in regard of the marriage of Katherine of France.

France, he is declared Regent of the Realme during the life of King Charles, to whom the title of King remains, and to label his wife the title of Queene during their lives. But presently after the Kings deſceſſe, the Crowne and Realme of France with all their rights and dignities ſhould remaine unto him, whom King Charles the ſixt calls by his Letters Patents, his moſt deere and welbelov'd ſonne, and to his heyrre in chiefe. They cauſe this poore ſicke King to ſwear vpon the holy Bible, and to promiſe this for him and his, with all exemptions and neceſſary claules in ſo great and important a buſineſſe. This goodly act (the fruit of the furious paſſions of ciuill war) was made at Troies the 21 of May, in the yeare 1420.

This done, the French and Engliſh forces ioyning, and marching vnder the ſame colours, acknowledge one Commander, and for their firſt exploit they winne Montfauſt-Yonne, where they take vp and bury Iohn of Bourgongne againe, and ſo marching on as againſt Rebels, they take Melun, Meaux and Moret, and beſiege Champagne. The left matters ſhould grow cold, Henry of England (whom they call Regent) returnes to Troies, and with a goodly traine, conducts the King, Queene, and his new wife Katherine, to Paris, being better followed and ſerued then the King himſelfe. The Pariſians ſolly & wonderfully embrace the comming of this new Royalty, promiſing vnto themſelves a new heauen: but this humour laſted not long, hauing tried the power of foraigne Princes, and the command of their Kings by very contrary effects.

The Bourguignon craues juſtice againſt
the Dauphin.

The Regent held a Councell preſently in great ſtate, in the Palace of Saint Pol, being the Kings lodging. Two thrones were erected for the two Kings, and a ſeat vnderneath for Philip of Bourgongne. The Kings Councell (being few in number) is ſupplied by the Court of Parliament, and the Vniuerſity. Philip demands juſtice of the murder committed on the perſon of Iohn of Bourgongne his father. His Advocate Rollin made this ſtance. The Kings Advocate and the Vniuerſity aſſiſted him in the perſuait. King Charles promiſeth juſtice againſt his ſonne the Dauphin, and to doe all good offices for King Henry his new ſonne. This was the firſt act of the new Regency, againſt the onely ſonne of his Houſe. And moreover they decreed, that hereafter all the treaſure ſhould be governed by the Regents authority and command. Henry reſolues preſently to call a Parliament for the neceſſity of his returne into England, whither he meant to conduct his new Spouſe. A Parliament was held according to this decree, but all were amazed at this ſudden alteration, euen the very report of my Hiſtory hath ſome feeling thereof: for who canſt thou ſee herein (gentle Reader) but frozen ice, in the remembrance of theſe conſiderations, renewed by the feeling of our owne? Thus the Regent cauſed Charles Duke of Torraine, and Dauphin of Viennois, to be called to the Marble table. All ſolemnnities obſtained, and he not appearing, by a decree of the Councell, and of the Court of Parliament, he was baniſhed the Realme, and iudged unworthy to ſucceed in any of the Seignories, as well preſent as to come. The Dauphin appeales from this ſentence, To God and his ſword, who in the end doing him juſtice, ſhall bleſſe his ſword, and make it victorious over his enemies.

The Dauphin
baniſhed.

The Pariſians (diſcontented with the violent courſes of the new Regent) began to abate their ioy within few dayes after, before Henry returne into England. Philip of Bourgongne Earle of Saint Pol, Couſin germane to the Duke of Bourgongne, with ſcuerall of Paris by the appointment of King Charles. Henry diſplaceth him, and appoints Thomas Duke of Clarence his brother. He ſets Engliſh guards in all the ſtrong places of the City, and diſplaceth the French and Bourguignons, and yet durſt they not depart. The Lord of Liſle-Adam made Marſhall of France (for that he had aſſiſted at the taking and ſacke of Paris) was as much out of fauour with this new King, as hee was welcome to the Pariſians. The Regent ſends men to apprehend him, whom (as they ſaid to the Baſtile) the people made an offer to reſcue, but they were ſharply reſiſted by the Engliſh, and well beaten: a juſt reward, hauing wiſhed for a ſtrange King, that they ſhould ſooner haue other employments, to teach them to know new bread from old, which they had ſo much diſdained. Thus Henry the ſixt made the Pariſians to knowe time that he had authority to force obedience, in puniſhing fooles and rebels grown contentious in conſuſion.

On the other ſide, the Dauphin ſaints not at the firſt brute of this new royaltie, but growing reſolute againſt all ſtormes, hee loſeth no opportunity to aduance his affairs. We haue ſhewed how that Aniou obeyed him. The new Regent commands the Duke

A of Clarence his brother to make war in thoſe parts. So hee enters the Country with his army, as it were to take poſſeſſion of his owne. He preſents himſelfe before Angiers the chiefe City of that Prouince, preſuming that all would preſently obey him: but the iſſue did not anſwer his hopes, for he found all the French reſolute to defend theſelves againſt a ſtranger, and to obey their naturall King: hereupon the French ioyned together, they arme and goe to field. The Engliſh being out of hope to take Angiers, turne head againſt the French army lodged at Little Bauge, which attended reſolutely the force of a mighty and victorious enemy. On the other ſide, the imaginary hope of victory thruſt on the Duke of Clarence againſt our men, whom he held to be halfe dead, but he findes them reſiſting, ready to ſell their liues at a deare rate. The battel was very bloody, the one fighting for Empire and honor, and the other for their liues and altars. The event was vnfortunate for the Engliſh. The Duke of Clarence was ſlaine, and the Engliſh army loſt 1500 men vpon the place, for the firſt fruits of their new Regency, and a gage of their pretended Royalty. This famous encounter hapned in the yeare 1420, the 9 of April. As in the firſt of a dangerous diſeaſe, the firſt motions of nature are very important, ſo is it in State. A light beginning after a great danger, drawes a great conſequence either to good or euill. This firſt action had a great traine. Charles his party began to riſe, as if the good hap of the lawfull heire requiuing, had taken a new forme in ſetting his authority. Iohn of Montfort Duke of Britaine fauoured this firſt ſucceſſe of Aniou. After that the Engliſh had ſeized vpon Normandy, he put himſelfe vnder his protection: but now he turnes taile, and allies himſelfe with our Charles againſt him, in a deſenſive and offenſive league. What remains of the Hiſtory of Britanie, I will reſerue for another place: let vs now returne to our diſcourſe. At the ſame inſtant James of Harcourt leaues the Bourguignons partie. He makes warre in the Country of Vimeu and takes diuers places; Pont Remy, Saint Riquier, la Ferte, Mareuill, Diancourt, Araines, and other ſmall places. The Bourguignon goes to field, the ſmalleſt townes yeeld vnto him. He beſiegeth Saint Riquier being well defended by the Lord of Offemont, but newes comes that the Dauphins Army approacheth. The Bourguignon reſolues to meet them: he ſends forth part of his forces, they are diſperſed vpon a falſe alarm, that the Duke of Bourgongne was dead. As they were in this diſorder, behold, he ſhewes himſelfe to his ſouldiers full of reſolution, and ſo ſtily, as hauing rallyed his men and encouraged them, hee not onely repels his enemy, but defeats them, takes Riquier, and frees Picardy from feare. Such is the variety of our encounters: the conqueror is here conquered.

The Engliſh defeated, & the Duke of Clarence ſlaine.

The Bourguignon being in field, our new Regent comes from his Realme of England with new forces: hauing reſolued to employ all their means ioynly to ruine the Dauphin, before he ſhould fortiſie himſelfe with any new ſucceſſe: they diſperſe their forces into diuers parts of the Realme, hauing more men and money then the Dauphin. The Prince of Orange held the Dauphin in awe. The Lord of Roch-baron made warre in Foreſt and Auuerge, and the body of the Army with the Regent and Duke marched againſt the Dauphin, who was retired to Bourges a ſtrong City, and of a ſite ſituation, lying in the miſt of ſuch Prouinces as obeyed him. This army marching with a victorious ſhew, beſiegeth Dreux, and takes it by compoſition. Chartres yeelds willingly: from thence he marcheth with an intent to draw the Dauphin to fight, but the Regent (ſeeing him retire to a place of hard acceſſe) reſolues to free all the Townes about Paris, but eſpecially Senlis and Soiſſons, townes of importance. He hoped to vanquiſh him by degrees, and in the end to giue him the mate.

The great exploits of Henry.

But all enterpriſes ſucceed not: Man purpoſeth, but God diſpoſeth, who meant to try, but not to ruine France. All ſucceedes not wiſhfully to the Engliſh, being King of France in conceit. The Prince of Orange is beaten in Languedoc, and Tanneguy of Chateaufort Steward of Beaucaire, hauing happily recovered Pont Saint Eſprit, (a towne of importance, vpon the paſſage of Roſne) all the reſt yeelds to the Dauphins command: ſo as he could hardly keepe his Towne of Oranges. Auignon fauoured the Dauphin. Roch-baron was taken at Seruette by Iohn of Groſſe, Senecaſſ of Lions, and to Auvergne and Foreſt were ſubiect to the Dauphin: who ſeeing himſelfe without an enemy, and forces ready for his defence, he beſiegeth la Charite and takes it. From thence he goes to Coſne, where he finds great reſiſtance, yet he doth preſſe it with ſuch violence, as they are forced to come to a parlee. They preſcribe a certaine day to be ſuccoured by the new Regent

Regent, or to yeeld to the Daulphin. The Regent assures them of reliefe, exceeding glad of this occasion, to draw our Daulphin to the combat, wherein he hoped to vanquish him.

But he had not made his accompt with death, who holds his assignments more certaine, then all Monarches: for resoluing vpon this voyage, although hee had many other affaires in hand, he fell sicke, and of a strange disease, which the vulgar sort tearme Saint Pierre, and Physicians * Physiasis. Enguerand assures, that the chiefe disease whereof he died, was Saint Antonie fire: but it is more credibly reported, that hee died of a Plurisie, a disease in those dayes so rare and vnknowne, that Physicians being not therewith acquainted, nor with the cause whence it proceeded, could not prescribe nor apply any remedy. Henry hauing his mind fixed vpon this voyage, and his supposed victory, parts from Senlis, hauing taken leaue of the King, Queene and wife, (whom he shall see no more) he caused himselfe to be caried to Melun in a litter: but feeling himselfe prest by his infirmity, he returned to Bois de Vincennes, where hauing taken his bed, hee sent his army into Bourgogne vnder the command of the Duke of Bedford his brother, and the Earle of Warwick, commanding them to pursue the Daulphin. At the brute of this great army, the Daulphin Charles leaues Cosne and retires to Bourges: and so the towne was freed.

Henry was not so freed from his sicknesse, the which increasing daily, made him to thinke of his end, disposing as he pleased touching his sonne Henry the sixth of that name, whom he had by Katherine the daughter of France, and the Duke of Excester his Vnde to bee Regent of England, commanding them expressly to liue in concord with Philip Duke of Bourgogne, and neuer to make any peace with Charles of Valois (for so hee called him) vnlesse they might haue Normandy in souereignty, neither to release the Duke of Orleans and Bourbon, vntill his sonne were of a competent age.

And thus Henry the sixth dies, being neere about 40 yeares old, in the vigor of his age and spirit, borne and aspiring to great matters, hauing already giuen proofe of what he might haue done if he had liued longer. But God would punish France by an Englishman, yet would he not suffer France to haue any other King then a French-man. This vnexpected death, in the great course of Henry the sixth's victories, hapned the last day of August in the year 1422, followed soone after by one no lesse memorable. For Charles the sixth our good King, (but subiect to the miserablest reigne that France had euer seene to that day) fell sicke and died the 22 of October in the same year, fifty dayes after the decease of Henry of England. A sicknesse and death remarkable in so great a King, for after that he had languished in so long and infamous an infirmity, he died in a manner alone. They name but the Chancellor, the first chamberlaine, his Almoner, with some groomes of his chamber which were present at his end. After his death hee was visited by such as had caused him to die liuing, and by his miserable life had made all the Realme to languish. At the funerals of this poore Prince, after the Herald had proclaimed, The King is dead, another cryed, God saue the King, God send a long and happy life to Henry the sixth, by the Grace of God King of France and England, our Soueraigne Lord. To the end that passion might triumph over the infirmity of our King, euen in his graue. This Henry shall be crowned King at Paris soone after. But where is that Isabel, or rather Isabel, who had so much tormented her poore husband? I seeke her in all the corners of this History, yet cannot find her: She who caused so great diuisions, dies without any memory, but to haue liued too long for France and her children. Oh the vanity of this world! which doth interre the most busie in the forgetfulness of the graue, when as they thinke themselves raised to the toppe of their desires.

Thus Charles the sixth reigned, thus hee liued, and thus hee died, miserable in his reigne, miserable in his life, but most happy in his death, as well to free himselfe from paine, and by this occasion, his whole Realme from confusion. His manners, his race, his reigne, and his age doe appeare by that which we haue written. He liued 54 yeares, and reigned 42. He had many sonnes and daughters. Katherine is famous, hauing bene the mournfull gage of many mileries. Of three sonnes which came all to the age of men, Charles only remained successor of his Crowne, but not of his fortunes, for hee shall settle the Realme, redeeming it out of Strangers hands, as shall appeare in the following discourse.

CHARLES the seventh, The 54 French King.

After the long and painfull carriere of the fore-past reignes, were it not time now to breathe? Since the vnfortunate battell of Cressy, we haue felt nothing but thornes, tempest, combustions, and shewes of ruines. And if we shall abate that little happinesse which Charles the sixth brought vnto our Ancestours, there are not lesse then seuentie yeares of confusion. But all is not yet ended: we must passe 30 yeares more before the conclusion. And as if we felt the crosses of our fore-runners, wee must shut our eyes, recouer new Forces, grow resolute against all stormes, and end courageously with them the remainder of this painfull course (in the troublefome discourse, which we shall find in the beginning of this reigne) to see in the end a happy Catastrophe in the restoring of this Estate, and the vnion of the Church, diuided by a long and dangerous schisme, which disquieted Christendome, during the troubles of this raigne.

Here our Frenchmen may read with admiration and profit, that, as it is not now alone, that France hath bene afflicted, so God doth now begin to watch over it, deliuering it by miraculous meanes, when as it seemed nereest to ruine. Here Charles the seventh the least and last of his brethren, shall deface the ignominy of France, and triumph over the victories of a stranger, who had in a manner dispossessed him of his Realme. Of a truth God meant to punish vs by meanes of the English, but not to ruine vs. The French cannot bee commanded but by a French-man. The Ocean is a strong barre to diuide these two Estates, content with their owne rights: This reigne abounding in miraculous accidents, is the more considerable being the perfect Idea of the reigne of Henry the fourth lately murdered.

But to represent so variable a subiect with profit, it is necessary to distinguish it in order. There are three parts famous both for the subiect and successe. The first shewes the confused and troublefome beginning of this reigne, vntill our Charles was solemnly installed King, and thereby acknowledged of all the French, for vntill that day the greatest part called him Earle of Ponthieure, or King of Bourges, in mockery: and such as were more modest termed him Daulphin of Viennois. The second puts him in possession of his royall authority, shewing by what meanes he reduced the Cities subdued by the English to his obedience, beginning with the City of Paris, and so proceeding to the rest of the Realme, expelling the English from all, but only Calais. The third shewes the end of this reigne, discovering the Kings domestically dissentments, which hastened him to his graue, after the happy euent of all his difficulties.

So this reigne continued thirty nine yeares, variable in good and euill. The beginning difficult, the midst happy, and the end mournfull. This is the Theater of mans life, where joy, sorrow, happinesse and misfortune, play their parts diuersly both with great & small. Charles the seventh was 21 yeares old when hee began to reigne, and reigned 39 yeares: for after the decease of his father Charles the sixth, he tooke vpon him the name of King of France, (notwithstanding the pretension of the English) the 22 of October in the year 1422, and he died the thirteenth of Iuly, 1461. He was married at eleven yeares of age, to Mary Daughter of Lewis Duke of Anjou and King of Sicily. By this marriage hee had three sonnes and five daughters. His sonnes names were Lewis, Philip, and Charles. Lewis the eldest shall succede him to the Crowne. Philip died very young: Charles liued somewhat longer, but without any great successe, hauing only the titles of the dukedomes of Berry, Normandy and Guienne. His daughters were Radeconde, Yoland, Katherine, Isabel, and Agnes. The first died, being betrothed to Sigismund Duke of Austria. Yoland was married to Amadee Duke of Savoy: Katherine to that great Charles Duke of Bourgogne, who shall be his owne ruine: Isabel to John Duke of Bourbon, and Magdalen to John Earle of Foix: and this was rare. His manners will appeare by his life: he was of a tractable and gentle disposition, capable of counsell, but louing his ease too much, and suffering himselfe to bee often caried away by his seruants. And yet as God would

Regent, or to yeeld to the Dauphin. The Regent assures them of reliefe, exceeding glad of this occasion, to draw out Dauphin to the combat, wherein he hoped to vanquish him.

But he had not made his accompt with death, who holds his assignments more certaine, then all Monarches: for resolving vpon this voyage, although hee had many other affaires in hand, he fell sicke, and of a strange disease, which the vulgar sort tearme Saint Fiacre, and Physicians * Phyrisis. Enguerand assures, that the chiefe disease whereof he died, was Saint Anthonies fire: but it is more credibly reported, that hee died of a Plurisie, a disease in those dayes so rare and vnkowne, that Physicians being not therewith acquainted, nor with the cause whence it proceeded, could not prescribe nor apply any remedy. Henry hauing his mind fixed vpon this voyage, and his supposed victory, parts from Senlis, hauing taken leaue of the King, Queene and wife, (whom he shall see no more) he caused himselfe to be caried to Melun in a litter: but feeling himselfe prest by his infirmity, he returned to Bois de Vincennes, where hauing taken his bed, hee sent his army into Bourgongne vnder the command of the Duke of Bedford his brother, and the Earle of Warwicke, commanding them to pursue the Dauphin. At the brute of this great army, the Dauphin Charles leaues Cosne and retires to Bourges: and so the towne was freed.

Henry was not freed from his sicknesse, the which increasing daily, made him to thinke of his end, disposing as he pleased touching his sonne Henry the sixt of that name, whom he had by Katherine the daughter of France, and the Duke of Excester his Vnckle to bee Regent of England, commanding them expressly to liue in concord with Philip Duke of Bourgongne, and neuer to make any peace with Charles of Valois (for so he called him) vnlesse they might haue Normandy in souereignty, neither to release the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, vntill his sonne were of a competent age.

And thus Henry the sixt dies, being neere about 40 yeares old, in the vigor of his age and spirit, borne and aspiring to great matters, hauing already giuen prooffe of what he might haue done if he had liued longer. But God would punish France by an Englishman, yet would he not suffer France to haue any other King then a French-man. This vnexpected death, in the great course of Henry the sixts victories, hapned the last day of August, in the yeare 1422, followed soone after by one no lesse memorabile. For Charles the sixt our good King, (but subiect to the miserablest reigne that France had euer seene to that day) fell sicke and died the 22 of October in the same yeare, fifty dayes after the deceased Henry of England. A sicknesse and death remarkable in so great a King, for after that he had languished in so long and infamous an infirmity, he died in a manner alone. They name but the Chancellor, the first chamberlaine, his Almoner, with some groomes of his chamber which were present at his end. After his death hee was visited by such as had caused him to die liuing, and by his miserable life had made all the Realme to languish. At the funerals of this poore Prince, after the Herald had proclaimed, The King is dead, another cryed, God saue the King, God send a long and happy life to Henry the sixt, by the Grace of God King of France and England, our Soueraigne Lord. To the end that passion might triumph ouer the infirmity of our King, euen in his graue. This Henry shall be crowned King at Paris soone after. But where is that Isabel, or rather Iezabel, who had so much tormented her poore husband? I seeke her in all the corners of this History, yet cannot find her. She who caused so great diuisions, dies without any memory, but to haue liued too long for France and her children. Oh the vanity of this world! which doth terrer the most buisie in the forgetfulness of the graue, when as they thinke themselves raised to the toppe of their desires.

Thus Charles the sixt reigned, thus hee liued, and thus hee died, miserable in his reigne, miserable in his life, but most happy in his death, as wel to free himselfe from paine, and this occasion, his whole Realme from confusion. His manners, his race, his reigne, his age doe appeare by that which we haue written. He liued 54 yeares, and reigned 4. He had many sonnes and daughters. Katherine is famous, hauing beene the mourning gage of many miseries. Of three sonnes which came all to the age of men, Charles only remained successor of his Crowne, but not of his fortunes, for hee shall settle the Realme, redeeming it out of Strangers hands, as shall appeare in the following discourse.

CHARLES the seuenth, The 54. French King.

After the long and painfull carriere of the fore-pastd reignes, were it not time now to breathe? Since the vnfortunate battell of Cressy, we haue felt nothing but thornes, tempest, combustions, and shewes of ruines. And if we shall abate that little happinesse which Charles the sixt brought vnto our Ancestours, there are not lesse then seauenty yeares of confusion. But all is not yet ended: we must passe 30 yeares more before the conclusion. And as if we felt the crosses of our fore-runners, wee must shut our eyes, recouer new

Forces, grow resolute against all stormes, and end couragiously with them the remainder of this painfull course (in the troublesome discourse, which we shall find in the beginning of this reigne) to see in the end a happy Catastrophe in the restoring of this Estate, and the vnion of the Church, diuided by a long and dangerous schisme, which disquieted Christendome, during the troubles of this raigne.

Here our Frenchmen may reade with admiration and profit, that, as it is not now alone, that France hath beene afflicted, so God doth now begin to watch ouer it, deliuering it by miraculous meanes, when as it seemed neere to ruine. Here Charles the seuenth the least and last of his brethren, shall deface the ignominy of France, and triumph ouer the victories of a stranger, who had in a manner dispossessed him of his Realme. Of a truth God meant to punish vs by meanes of the English, but not to ruine vs. The French cannot bee commanded but by a French-man. The Ocean is a strong barre to diuide these two Estates, content with their owne rights: This reigne abounding in miraculous accidents, is the more considerable being the perfect Idea of the reigne of Henry the fourth lately murdered.

But to represent so variable a subiect with profit, it is necessary to distinguish it in order. There are three parts famous both for the subiect and successe. The first shewes the confused and troubleome beginning of this reigne, vntill our Charles was solemnly installed King, and thereby acknowledged of all the French: for vntill that day the greatest part called him Earle of Ponthieure, or King of Bourges, in mockery: and such as were more modest termed him Dauphin of Viennois. The second puts him in possession of his royall authority, shewing by what meanes he reduced the Cities subdued by the English to his obedience, beginning with the City of Paris, and so proceeding to the rest of the Realme, expelling the English from all, but only Calais. The third shewes the end of this reigne, discovering the Kings domesticall discontents, which hastened him to his graue, after the happy euents of all his difficulties.

So this reigne continued thirty nine yeares, variable in good and euill. The beginning difficult, the midst happy, and the end mournfull. This is the Theater of mans life, where ioy, sorrow, happinesse and misfortune, play their parts diuersly both with great & small. Charles the seuenth was 21 yeares old when hee began to reigne, and reigned 39 yeares: for after the decease of his father Charles the sixt, he tooke vpon him the name of King of France, (notwithstanding the pretension of the English) the 22 of October in the yeare 1422, and hee died the thirteenth of Iuly, 1461. He was married at eleven yeares of age, to Mary Daughter of Lewis Duke of Anjou and King of Sicily. By this marriage hee had three sonnes and five daughters. His sonnes names were Lewis, Philip, and Charles. Lewis the eldest shall succede him to the Crowne. Philip died very yong: Charles liued somewhat longer, but without any great successe, hauing only the titles of the dukedomes of Berry, Normandy and Guienne. His daughters were Katherine, Yolande, Katherine, Isabel, and Margaret. The first died, being betrothed to Sigismund Duke of Austria. Yolande was married to Amade Duke of Sauoy: Katherine to that great Charles Duke of Bourgongne, who shall be his owne ruine: Isabel to John Duke of Bourbon, and Margaret to Gaston Earle of Foix: and this was Race. His manners will appeare by his life: he was of a tractable and gentle disposition, capable of counsell, but louing his ease too much, and suffering himselfe to bee often caried away by his seruants. And yet as God would would use him for the establishing of the French Monarchy, so did he bring him vp in the schoole of affliction, to fortifie him against all difficulties, assisting him with great and worthy persons, both for warre and counsell, by whose meanes he did raise vp this Estate, yet with great and confused combats, and by a long and painfull patience. But let vs proceed to that which hath chanced vnder his reigne, most worthy of obseruation.

Such was the estate of Charles, when his fathers death called him to the Crowne. We haue seene after that the miseries of France had caused his mother Isabel to forsake her owne blood, making him to bee reiected from the Crowne, and Henry the fifth King of England substituted in his place, yet he fainted not in these extremities, but did valiantly withstand the pretended designs, by whose death God soone laid the foundation of the Realmes restoring. Yet after the death of King Henry the fifth, Charles was encountered with infinite difficulties. Hee had small meanes, fewer friends, and many mighty enemies. Hee scarce enjoyed the least part of his estate, followed by intreaty, and obeyed by halfe, euen of such as made profession to be most faithfull. The Cities had diuers motions, as priuate interest drew mens mindes to that party which they held most profitable. There were but too many which followed the fortune of the English, being Conquerors, the corruption of man inclining commonly to the stronger. But amidst these vncertaine humours of people, hee had enemies which encountered him with advantages apparently victorious: for Henry the sixth although hee were very young, yet did he exceed him in all things: hee had a Realme hereditary and absolute: the best part of the French Monarchy: the assistance of the Duke of Bedford his vnckle, with many worthy men, and great meanes. To these enemies were ioyned some great men, which fished in a troubled streame, euery one imagining to haue a part of this garment, building their designs vpon the Sepulcher of Charles, and the alteration of the State. Among the chiefeft were Philip Duke of Bourgongne, Amedeus Duke of Sauoy, Peter Duke of Britanie, with his brother the Earle of Richmond. Diuers instruments vnder that great engine of England: but all these motions were to ruine France, and to build their greatness vpon her ruines.

The Bourguignon (who had a great hand in the State) was most interested and most opposite to Charles, being apparently the author of his fathers murder. Yet Philip (a iudicious Prince) so hated him, whom necessity commanded him to hate in this accident, as if hee should loue him in time, not wedding himselfe absolutely to the English: yet did hee so worke for him in shew, as making himselfe in effect the stronger, hee might counterpoise him, if necessity required, and strike the last stroke for him to whom the French should incline. Reason likewise taught him, that the people would respect the lawfull heire of the Crowne, louing their Prince naturally, and in the end would reiect the Stranger, as an vnlawfull tenant, who made himselfe daily insupportable by his imperious carriage. Amedeus Duke of Sauoy being on the Stage, and farre from blowes, kept the stakes, and entertained Charles, as if he should be an assured mediator in these quarrels, to end them with more advantage then any Christian Prince, and so hee nourished this diuision, by a strict intelligence which hee had from the Bourguignon. As for the humour of the two brethren of Britanie, the course of the History will shew it.

Thus Charles charged by many enemies, had few faithfull and confident friends, and in that golden age, so small meanes to entertaine his friends, as hee could hardly supply the ordinary charges of his traine, selling and ingaging peace after peace of his inheritance. So as he had nothing more assured then the equity of his cause, and his resolution in the great necessity. He had yet some good friends remaining in Scotland, whom he bought, dearly, aduancing them to the greatest dignities of the Realme: for hee made Charles

Steward

A Steward Earle of Boucquan his Constable, and James Earle Douglas Marshall of France: and to honor the Scottish-mens faith, he gaue them the guard of his person, an institution which continues vnto this day. He had likewise some friends in Spaine and Italy, who succoured him in due time, according to their meanes. We haue shewed what Provinces followed the party of our Charles, amongst the which Languedoc was a principal. The importance of this country did much aduance his affaires. This reason moued both the Bourguignon and the Sauoiard against this Prouince. The instruments fit for this enterprise, were John of Chaalons, Prince of Orange, and the Lord of Roch-baron, a Nobleman of Velay, one of the 12 diocesses of Languedoc. The first by the commodity of his neighbourhood did win Nismes, Pont saint Elprit, Aiguefmortes, and all the rest of bate Languedoc, vnto Beziers, except the castell of Pezenas, the tower of Villeneuve by Auzon, and the castell of Egaliers, now wholly ruined, neere vnto Vez. This losse was somewhat repaired by the fidelity of the inhabitants. Aiguefmortes set vp their Ensigne of liberty, by the direction of the Baron of Vauuerbe, and kils the garison of Bourguignons, which the Prince of Orange had placed there. To this day they shew a great vessell of Stone, wherein they did slay the Bourguignons. The example of this strong and important Citie, awaked the rest, and euen vpon the approach of the Earle of Foix (who came with a goodly army) all the townes yeeld vnto him except Nismes and Pont S. Elprit, townes of great importance in that country, the one being the head of that Seneschauce, the other a passage vpon the Rofne towards Dauphine. But as the liberty of time made the seruant presume about the Master, so it chanced, that the Earle of Foix, hauing tasted the sweet of command, and transported with the common humour of men, seeking to make their profit of the common confusions of France) detained the reuenues of Languedoc, by his absolute authoritie, imparting none to Charles, being exceeding poore in this confused time. This necessitie was accompanied with a cruell warre, stirred vp in Velay, by the Lord of Roch-baron, a partisan to the Dukes of Sauoy, and Bourgongne, who furnished him both with men and money for this rebellion: for it was rather a horrible theuery then a warre. These two occasions drew Charles into Languedoc, to confirme his authority, and his voyage succeeded according to his intent: for he chased the Prince of Orange out of Nismes and Pont Saint Elprit, he pacified the troubles of Velay, & put the Earle of Foix from his gouernment, giving the place to Charles of Bourbon, Earle of Clermont, a Prince of the blood, to the great content of all the people. Hauing thus happily provided for his affaires, he takes the way of Velay, to returne into France: being arriued at Elpaly, (a castle belonging to the bishop of Puy) he is aduertised of his fathers death, after Henry the fifth his Competitor. Hee falls presently to teares and mourning, yet hee buries not his affaires in care. His Councell aduertish him to change his blacke robes into scarlet, to set vp the banner of France in his name, and to proclaime himselfe King, for the first fruits of his coronation: the which being performed at Puy, to the peoples great ioy, Charles goes to Poitiers, where he caused himselfe to be crowned King, and receiued the homage and othes of the officers of the Crowne, Princes, Noblemen and Gentlemen that were about him, with such pompe as the strictness of time would permit. Then he entiauled himselfe King of France, and made shew of more authority and greater pompe. But on the other side, the duke of Bedford began to bandy more strongly against him. Henry the sixth, his pupill, a yong infant, was in England. He caused him likewise to be crowned King, till that seven yeares after he should be solemnly installed at Paris, in the yeare, 1430. He set his name vpon the money of France, making a new stampe, but without any other change, then of his name.

So that hereafter two Kings, two factions, two armies shall contend for this goodly Crowne. The heire being the weaker shall fight against a strong pretender. Law fauours the one, and force the other: but the protector of this estate will giue a fauorable doome for the weaker, that the honour of so memorable a preservation of this Monarchy, apparently drawne out of the graue, may be giuen to him, who rules the deluge of our confusions, by his miraculous providence. Scarce had Charles receiued the first fruits of his royall authority, when as the dukes of Bedford and Bourgongne, his capital enemies, assemblable at Amiens, to crosse his new dignity in the breeding. There shall be seven yeeres of exceeding bad time, but after this sharp winter, there will come a goodly spring, when as all seemed lost: and in the end, Sommer shall follow with a plentiful harvest of rest, to this this Realme, whereof the lawfull heire shall remaine in quiet possession, and the pretender expelled with losse even of that which he might haue ciuilly inioyed.

In this Assembly at Amiens, great plots are laid against Charles, whose ruine was the soueraigne end. All is done at the charge of the English. Peter duke of Britany and John Earle of Richmond his brother, are there present. Amedee duke of Sauoy, sends his Ambassadors, vnder another colour; but he casts the stone and hides his arme. The duke of Bedford, Britany and Sauoy, make a defensive and offensive league against Charles. The soueraignty of the crowne should remaine to the English: the commodities to the duke. They set the scale of mariages to this alliance. John duke of Bedford maries with the sister of Philip duke of Bourgogne, and Marguerit his other sister takes Arthur the Earle of Richmond. Then they seeke the fruits of this alliance with the preiudice Charles. Euery man takes his quarter, to torment him on all sides. The Bourguignon undertakes Picardy, where he settles John of Luxembourg, to expell the Dauphinois out of some places which they held there. Henry of Lancaster Earle of Salisbury, went into Champagne and Bry, to cleanse the Country about Paris, and to bridle Orleans. The Earle of Warwicke vnderooke Guienne, to make warre against those townes that held the Dauphins party. Lewis Prince of Orange had charge to arme in Languedoc and Dauphine. Behold a great storme rising against the lawfull heire of this crowne.

Amidst all these difficulties, Charles must needs be in great perplexitie: nor I read ioy, that he whom God had chosen to restore this Estate, was not amazed, nor daunted, but hauing commonly in his mouth this Oracle, We must haue God and reason on our side he hath recourse vnto God, and failes courageously to worke. He flies to Rochel, to sure it vnder his obedience. Being in the towne, there happens a notable accident, as was in counsell, a part of the chamber funke, and James of Bourbon with diuers others were slaine in this ruine. The King was but hurt. From this danger, he passeth on to chiefe of his affairs. He sends into Scotland, Milan, and Castile, to summon his friends succour him, who speedily will send him notable aides. He prouides for all the part vnder his obedience. He assures himselfe of Languedoc, from whence he drew his helpers by the Earle of Clermont: from Dauphine, by the Lord of Gaucourt: from Lyons, Lyonnois, Foret, Beaucaulois and Maconois, by Imbert of Grolece, Senechal Lyons: from Galscogne, and other countries of Guienne, where he was acknowledged the Vicount Narbone, and the Master of Orual. He sends James of Harcourt into Picardy, accompanied with Poison the Kaintrailles, or Saint Treille, & Stephen Vignoles, la Hire, the flower of his captaines. And likewise the Bourguignon sent thither the best part of his forces. Ambrose de Lore goes into Maine and Perche, Pregence of Combray into Champagne. The Earle of Dunois (a bastard of the house of Orleans) keeps Orleans. The townes lying vpon the Riuer of Loire, aboue and beneath Orleans, were vnder the obedience of the French, La Charite, Gyan, largeau, Meung, Baugency, Blois, Aboise, Tours, Saumour, diuers small townes in Beaulle, La Ferte de Gaules, lanulle, Enay, Pluviers. And in the countries of Gastenois and Vrepolis, Montargis, Chailly, Milly. Neerer vnto Paris, Mont-lehery. Orsay, Marcouilly (very strong places) but now desolate) kept Paris in alarm.

Thus the cards were shuffled, but the English had the better part, keeping the greaties and the Kings purse, and (as the stronger) he begins the game, which had this issue the remainder of that year. The English besiege and take Bazas, and the French win Melan vpon Seine, with great slaughter of the English, but the duke of Bedford (loath dure such a thorne in the sides of Paris) doth presently besiege it. Charles sends succors, vnder the command of the Earle of Aumale, the Constable Boucquillon & Reguy of Chastel. Too many commanders, to doe any great exploit. Icalousie of command bred such a confusion, as all these troopes marched in disorder, no man acknowledging but his private commander. Hereupon the English Army arriues, who had an conquest of those disordered troopes, and then Meulan yeelds to the Duke of Bedford.

The sharpnesse of Winter could not temper the heape of these Warriours: as the fortune of the Warre is variable, one winnes, another loseth. Ambrose de Lore, John of Belay (thinking to take Fresnay le Conste) lost a notable troope of their men. The Lord of Fontaines hath his reuenge vpon the English, and defeats eight hundred of them.

The French defeated by the English, at Meulan yeelded.

1423

A at Neuville, and John of Luxembourg, a Bourguignon, defeats the Lords of Gamaches and Amaury with their troopes. The Earle of Salisbury takes the townes of Vertus and Espernay, and the strong places of Montaguillon and Oisy neere vnto Paris: the composition is strange, the souldiers yeelding at the Regents discretion, are brought to Paris, bare-headed, halters about their necks, and swords at their backs.

This miserable troope thus tyed, and led in triumph, passeth through Saint James street to goe to the Tournelles, where the Regent was lodged, and from thence to be drawne to the place of execution, if the Duchesse of Bedford (moued with the pity of a French woman, at so pittifull a spectacle) had not begged the liues of these poore condemned men. Thus that year passed, wherein Charles the sixth, and Henry the fifth died, but God to restore our Monarchy, began in the same year to lay a leuain against the attempts of Strangers, who sought to ruine it. Isabelle of Baunary, Countesse of Hainault and Holland the onely heire of those two states, had married with John D. of Brabant, who by a blind and ambitious avarice, gaue her selfe to Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, vncle to the King of England, and married with him, reiecting her lawfull husband. Her excuse was, that the Brabantin was her cousin germaine, but this shall be a meanes to dissolve that alliance so cunningly conioyned by the Dukes of Bedford and Bourgogne, who shall breake vpon this occasion. The year begins while that losse came by heapes vpon Charles as the current of an vnauoidable ruine: whatsoever he vnder-tooke, succeeded not.

James of Harcourt was Gouernour of Picardy, placed there ouer some remainders of the shipwracke of that country, he surpriseth Dommartin in Ponthieu from the Bourguignon, and spoiles the neighbour Abbeies, and the country. Hauing ruined these poore disarmed men, he is charged by Ralph Buislar an English Captaine, loseth all his conquest, escapes hardly with his life, and sees Crotoy taken before his face, the chiefe dungeon of his delignes, Rue, Saint Valery, and in the end the goodly city of Abbeville, sufficient to stay the English forces, if it had been guarded by good men. After these shameful losses he comes to Charles to excuse himselfe, he pardons him, but God made him soone pay the interest of his thefts, being the cause of his owne ruine.

Hauing no place of aboad, he retires to Parthenay, to his vncle, who entertained him courteously, but Harcourt not content with this kind viage, would be master of the castle, his practice fell vpon his owne head, being slaine by the guards, suffering the punishment of his treachery as he had done of his couetousnesse and cowardise. A lesson for bad seruants to their Princes, detestable either for their robberies, or for their treacherous cowardises, whom God paies in due season.

The entrance of this year was also infamous, in two shamefull losses, happened to two great captaines: to Ambrose of Lore, who loseth the castle of Tenny in the country of Maine, and to Olinor of Magny beaten by the English, at the Bishops parke neere Auranche, but from final accidents, we must come to great actions. Champagne was in no better case then Maine. The Earle of Salisbury made warre with all violence against Pregence of Coityny, who defended the Kings party the best he could, but not able to beare so great a burthen, he flies to Charles, who sends him his Constable with forces, the which were imployed both in another cause, & with other successe then he had designed: for behold the come of Creuant in Bourgogne (situated vpon the riuer of Yonne, vpon the frontiers of Champagne) is surprisid by the bastard of Baume, for the King. The Constable flies thither, but too late, for la Baume, not able to take the castle, abandons the towne. In the same time, the brute thereof drawes forces thither, from all parts, as a cupping glasse doth humours. The Dowager of Bourgogne (mother to Duke Philip) sends a goodly troope vnder the conduct of Toulangeon Marshall of Bourgogne. The Duke of Bedford doth suddenly furnish a notable supply, for the respect he bare to the Duke of Bourgogne his brother-in-law: Charles fearing lest his Constable should miscary, assembles what forces he can, with all speed, and sends them vnder the conduct of the Lord of Senece Marshall of France, the Earle of Ventadour, the Lords of Fontaines, Velay, and Gamaches. The number was very equal, but the incomber fell vpon our army. And this was the occasion. The Constable hauing made his choise of a little hill, a place of advantage, to ascend his country, the English comes, with a Conquering brauery, as hee that was accustomed to gaine euery where, without any stay: hee forceth our guard, placed vpon the ridge to keepe the passage. Hauing thus passed in view of our army, la Hire seizes seizeth on our men by this proud contempt, and they cry out to the Constable, who galled with despite for this affront, resolves to the combat. So all with one fury leave the hill, march towards the English and offer him battell.

The notable battell of Cre-uant vnfurnate for France.

The Earle of Salisbury makes a stand, to temper the heat of our French, who durst not approach very neere, fearing the fury of their English arrowes. This first motion thus slackt, the Earle of Salisbury gives the signe to battell. Those of Creuant halfe mad, having beene some few daies besieged, issue forth, and charge on the one side. On the other side; the body of the English army, doth march with such violence against the Scots (which were in the first battailion) as not able to withstand this storme, they open, & give them entry against the French, who having fought resolutely, in the end they leave the place to the victors. All are in rout. The Marshall of Senerac forgets his honor, and in this disorder. They account the losse about three thousand men. Of make, the Lords of Fontaines, Guitry and la Baulme, of Scottithmen, the Lord of Karados, nephew to the Constable, Thomas Seton, William Hamilton, with his son David and John Pillor, all worthy of the memory of France, seeing they died for her in the bed of honor.

There were many more taken prisoners then slaine, by the resolution of the captaine, who in this generall overthrow (rallying their troops) intrenched themselves, and fought for their lives with the English, and saved themselves honourably with their armes. The chiefe prisoners were the constable of Boughan, and the Earle of Ventadour. It is a thing worthy remembrance, that either of these two lost an eye in the battell: it was the 29 day of Iuly. The gaine of this victory to the Bourguignon, was, that Malcon, a towne of the French obedience, yielded unto him without any force, but feare.

This continuance of so many losses, was exceeding grievous: but as God meant to destrose France, and not to ruine it; so he counterpeyled these great losses with some small gaine. These victorious troops returning without feare, all disordered, were defeated by the Earle of Aumale, sent by the King to preserve the rest of Champagne: eight hundred English were slaine. But this checke awaked the Earle of Salisbury, Governour of Champagne for the English, who having recovered new forces, goes to field to cleanse the Country. He besiegeth and taketh the strong towne of Sedan, in the Country of Wallis, and then Rembouillet in Bry, and Neelle in Tardenois. Then the tide flows for the French.
The Bourguignon exceeding glad of the seizure of Malcon, (a town very important upon Saone) commands Thoulangeon his Constable, to rid all that the enemy held there-bouts, and to leave the trafficke free. La Buissiere a most strong castle betwixt Tournay and Malcon, did much annoy it. He resolves to take it by one meanes or other. But he did not foresee, that in seeking to take, he should be taken. He had some familiarity with the Captaine of the place. And trusting to the vsuall practices of those times, he discretely hope to corrupt him with money. He sounds him, and findes it pregnable: they agree vpon the price, but he was ignorant of the Captaines meaning, to haue more of his money. A faithfull seruant to the King, and worthy to be named in this Register, Captaine doth aduertise Imbert of Grosselee, the Governour of Lions, of this trafficke, wisely prouides to take him.

The Constable of Bourgogne taken by his owne practice.

Lewis of Cullant Admirall of France, was then happily at Lions, attending some for the King, from Philip Maria duke of Milan. The plot is laide to surprize this of Bourgogne, and the successe is answerable. Thoulangeon comes to Buissiere appointed houre, and brings with him men and money. He enters the Castle, where many men as he held sufficient, and counts the money to the Captaine. He hauing his troope in the field, behold the Lionois issue forth their Ambuscado like Lions some seize vpon the castle gate, and assure the place, others charge his troope, who easily defeated. The Constable with the chiefe that had followed him into the castle taken, a conterchage which shall deliuer the Constable of Boughan and the Earle of Ventadour, after the battell of Cullant.

And almost at the same instant, Stephen of Vignoles, called la Hire, and Pothon of traillies, roused themselves. Vignoles surprized Compagne, and Pothon, Han, vpon the riner of Somme. But this ioy lasted little, for Iohn of Luxembourg, governour for the duke of Bourgogne, in Picardy, lies thither, besiegeth, and recouereth both the one & the other with a happy saley. Pothon saues himselfe with much difficulty in Guise (being pursued by the Bourguignons, to their cost that were ill mounted.) Luxembourg managing the victory

1423

A victory wisely, attempts other places: he takes Oysil, Broissy and other small townes of Ti-raiche, and in the end he besiegeth Guise, where Iohn Poissy commanded for the King: Pothon (to annoy the besiegers) issues forth of Guise, but being too farre engaged in the fight, hee is taken prisoner, to make the siege of Guise the more easie, but Poissy doth his best endeavour to defend it. The towne belonged to René of Aniou, Duke of Bar, and brother to the King of Sicilia. Hee intreats the Duke of Bourgogne to leave it him in peace, but it was in vaine. The siege is vehemently continued, so as in the end Guise falls into the Bourguignons hands, and so he remains master of all Picardy. And as if this storme had fallen vpon Charles from all parts, la Charite (a very important towne vpon the riuier of Loire) is surprized by Perrinet Graffer, for the Bourguignon: and so the terror of the war came into Berry, much troubling the quiet and commerce of the Court, for that the King most commonly was resident at Bourges, or at Meung.

Pothon of Xaintreilles taken prisoner;

The like mishap fell vpon La Hire at Vitry, the which he yeelds to the Duke of Bourgogne, by a composition very preiudiciall for the King and the Realme. And at the same time Beaumont vpon Oyse surprized by the French, was taken againe by the English with much blood and sacke. In like sort the fort of Saint Michels Mount, is besieged by the English, and well defended by the French, which caused the victory of Granelle, happily taken by the Baron of Colances from the English, as it were to coole the heat of our continuall feuer with some little water. In sooth the Estate of France was then most miserable.

There appeared nothing but a horrible face, confusion, pouerty, desolation, solitarinesse and feare. The leane and bare labourers in the Country, did terrifie euen theecues themselves, who had nothing left them to spoil but the carcases of these poore miserable creatures, wandering vp and downe like Ghosts drawne our graues. The least farmes, and hamlets, were fortified by these robbers, English, Bourguignons, and French, euery one striving to doe his worst. There was no speech but of forts and contributions. Al men of war were well agreed to spoile the countryman and the naked Merchant: euen the cartell accustomed to the larume bell (the signe of the enemies approach) would run home of themselves without any guide by this accustomed misery. This is the perfect description of those times, taken out of the lamentations of our Ancestors, set downe in the original. Who D seeth not here the perfect Image of our times, during the confusion of our vacuill Ciuill

But amidst this horrible calamity, God did comfort both the King and Realme: for about the end of the yeere, he gaue Charles a goodly sonne by Queene Mary his wife, a happy gage for the establishing of this Realme, whereof he shalbe a peaceable King. He was borne at Bourges, and there honorable baptized in Saint Stephens church, and was named Lewis, King of France after the decease of his father. Charles would haue Iohn of Alençon a Prince of his blood, and then his trusty friend, to be his God-father. But alas! both by this God-father, and this God-sonne, shall grow a horrible confusion, euen when as Charles expected an end of all his troubles. Whereby we may learne, that there is nothing but E vanity in worldly affaires, remarkable for great men, in that which seemeth most firme in mans life.

Lewis the 2d the eldest son of Charles borne.

This was the flux and reflux of this yeare. The beginning of the new yeare shewed a better countenance: but these small gleames of good hap, were soone overcast by horrible losses, which seemed to giue the last wound to this Monarchy, and to alter the name, if God had not staied it with his mighty hand, in laying a foundation whereon he shall build the meanes to restore it to her ancient beauty, without any shew of the industry or force of man, when as all things seemed desperate. But the providence of God creeps on insensibly by degrees to perfect his worke. The losse of the Scots was very great in the vnfur-tunate battaile of Cullant. To repaire this losse, Charles lends into Scotland Renauld of Charre his chancellor and Archbishop of Rheims, accompanied with the Earle Douglas, Marshall of France. And being reduced to a miserable want of money, he engageth the Duchy of Tourain vnto him. A title which Douglas shal not long inioy. But whilst they make this leamy in Scotland, and shal returne to their troopes, let vs consider the humour of the French and English during this medly.

New supplies
come out of Scotland.

As the success of the English was happy, so their harts swelled with pride, and they exceeded dayly in Insolency, especially in great cities, where they braced it disdain-fully, as treading the name of French-men vader foot. This contempt bred an extreme discontent,

The French grow discontented with the infolency of the English.

discontent, even in the most senseless, to see themselves thus intreated, their Kings oppressed, and their Lawes abolished. There were not two yeares past of this new royalty, and yet disturable. How farre say they, will this English Empire exceed, being augmented and fortified by the authority of many yeares? Shall it bee eyther to transpore new Colonies beyond the seas, or to plant others here, and in the end to extinguish the name of the original French, to the end that no man shall dare to repine at the ruine of his Countrey, reduced into the power of strangers? These imaginations were generally in all mens mindes, but complaints in the mowthes of few, the which they whispered softly to their well assured friends: but the time was not yet come, although the blood (which cannot degenerate) shewed many signes of hearts discontented with this servitude, both at Paris, and especially at Rouen, where the English government was most heauy. One Michael Lallier was the beginner of this liberty, and was put to death at Paris, & a woman was burnt, worthy to liue amidst the flames, & to shine in the goodly light of our History.

The Nobility of Picardy was much discontented with this new command. Tournay began first to stirre for the Kings seruice. So immouable is the French obedience to their Kings, and so sweet and pleasing is their command. It was a capitall crime to speake of the King of England, but as the lawfull King. Spies were set in all places to restrain the liberty of the French. These executions were threatnings of worse, if any should minde. Yet the Nobility of Picardy were so wearied with the English and Bourguignon yokes, as they resolute to free themselves at what rate soeuer. The heads of this resolution were the Lords of Longueval, S. Simon, Mailly, Maucour, Recourt, Blondel, and many other Gentlemen which had followed the Bourguignons party. These are named. The Original should not conceal the rest, whom I could not specify without some Author. Behold the first fruits of the French liberty. These Ensigne-bearers assemble at Roy, they forsake themselves for the King against the English and Bourguignon, and take diuers towns in Picardy at a prefixed day. John of Luxembourg thunders against them that were suspected, and some he takes and hangs. At these terrors some drew backe and left this league: yet the greatest part remained constant, though with the apparent danger of their liues. These were the pure and true sparkes of the French fidelity to their King, but the day spring was not yet come, which mounting to our horizon, should in the end shew forth the goodly light of liberty to all France.

These first motions put Charles in some good hope of a better estate: but behold a new check which cooles his courage. At the same time that hee made his leauy in Scotland, the duke of Exeter prepared a great army in England to releue the duke of Bedford his brother, that he might haue meanes to continue the warres in France. There comes two him eight thousand archers, and eightene hundred men at armes. For the employing of these men he besiegeth Galaron, and taketh it at his first approach, and without the loss of an houre, hee plants himselfe before Yury, and at the same instant all his forces come to him, vnder the command of the Earle of Salisbury. The army being thus encreased, he pressed the siege. Girauld of Paliers held the towne for the King.

The due of Bedford summons him to yeeld it. Girauld demands respite to aduertise the King. Charles was then at Tours, well accompanied both of his subiects and foraine friends: for after the defeat of Creuant, fore-seeing that the English would pursue the cause with more violence, he had provided men to oppose against them. The Marshall Douglas duke of Touraine by his new purchase, had brought him succours from Scotland. The Vicont of Narbonne a goodly troop from Languedoc, which was the flower of the whole army. The duke of Alençon, the Earles of Aumale, Ventador, Tonnerre, Douglas, Moiry, the Vicont of Narbonne, the Lords of Faiette, Tournon, and other Noblemen of marke, with their followers, were ready to doe their best endeavour. So he had eightene thousand fighting men. The rendezvous is in Perche, and they were shortly to march to Yury. The King styes at Chasteaudun. The Constable of Bourgh sends to view the enemies countenance. The Scouts report the greatnesse of the English Army, and their diligence at the siege, who being discovered and pursued, hardly escape. They resolute that in stead of charging the English army, they should besiege Vernueil (a towne obeying the English) eyther to take it, or to make a diuersion from Yury. The first succeeded, for our men approaching neer to Vernueil with a victorious countenance and bragge, as if the English army had beene defeated, Vernueil opens the gate Compleats against the English.

New forces raised in England.

Vernueil yeelds to the French, Yury to the English.

A without any question, and yeelds to the Kings seruice. But this shew of victory cost our Frenchmen deare, who had done better to succour Yury, then in losing it, to hazard their owne ruine, as it happened afterwards.

Girauld of Paliers, hauing long and in vaine expected succors, and doubled the prefixed time, he yeelds to the Duke of Bedford, who hauing now no other impediment, he resolues to fight with our army at his aduantage: for the effecting whereof, hee had the better meanes by their long stay. Hauing intelligence of the estate of our army, he resolute to draw them to battell, knowing how much it did import to send a victorious souldier, against one whom he hath usually beaten. He therefore sends a Herald to desie them, by giuing him charge to direct himselfe to the Duke of Touraine, a Scottish man Marshall of France. To whom he sayes, The Duke of Bedford my master commanded mee to tell you, that he comes to drinke with you. Douglas answers him: That he should be welcome, but hee must make some haste, for that dinner was ready. Vpon this brauado they goe to Councell. The mischief was, the army had no head, hauing indeed too many. A multitude of commanders and commandments, is a plague to all good order, and especially in militarie discipline, which consists wholly in authority. Euery one had varied in his opinion. Some were of aduice to attend the enemy, others thought it fittest to take him at his word, without enduring of these brauadoes.

Thus their diuident opinions diuided the army, and those which in shew made the army, ouerthrew it, Douglas and Narbonne. Douglas said, Seeing the army is well lodged, hauing a good towne to backe it, to what end should they runne rashly against a victorious enemy? The Narbonnois replies, To endure these brauadoes, were to take away the hearts of the French souldiers, and to coole their courage without any reason: and what greater indignities might a vanquished man beare? The Duke of Alençon, and the Constable were of the first opinion, but the contention grew so great, as the Viscont said, That if the wiser had no mind to fight, he would goe and defend the honour of France with the hazard of his life. So being retired to his quarter, he commanded to found a march, notwithstanding the Duke of Alençon entreary to stay and march together. On the other side, the Duke of Touraine, discontented at the Visconts choller, keepe backe the Scots. But necessity drew forth the whole army, one battallion after another. This disorder was the cause they could not chooe a fit place of armes, nor dispose of their battallions. All were in grosse confusion without any vanguard. The chiefe of the army were on foot. They place two wings, and to euery wing a thousand horse. The Italians had the right, and the French the left. In the fore-front of this battell they planted foure hundred horse, to beginne the skirmish.

The Duke of Bedford had opportunity to dispose better of his armie, he makes a body all on foot, where he placeth his chiefe forces, and lodgeth there himselfe. In the front of this body he placeth great store of Archers, and euery Archer hath a stake stickt in the ground, to withstand the charge of the horse. Vpon either wing he plants the choice of his most resolute Archers: behind, are his vnarmed people with the baggage, the horses being tyed close together, taile to taile, with two cords or withs: but for their guard hee left two thousand choice Archers. In this order he attends the French, whom he discouers comming as farre off, resolute to fight, with the countenance of Conquerors. They were long before they could set their troopes in order, and ranne a full gallop to their death. So as in hurlie burlie and haste to fight, they were out of breath before they came to blowes. All the morning is spent in approaches, the two armies fronting one another: a little after noone, a signall is giuen to the battell: our aduenturers goe to the charge, to tie if they can force the grosse of the English army.

The foure hundred Italian Lances (led by Cameran with one eye) made the point, and at the first charge beat back the English Archers: that were in the front. At the same instant, our two wings of horse charge the English army in flanke, seeking to breake their ranks. The fury of the fight was violent on either side: our men striving to enter into the body of the English foot, and the English labouring to withstand our men with a continual storme of arrowes. Then, behold our Lanciers, hauing forced one side of the battell, beginne to cry victorie, but the first ranks being forced, they are seconded by the rest without disorder: and with the like impression, the whole body of the English army raise a great cry, and aduance to the combat. Thus the two armies ioyne with a horrible conflict, which continued about an houre, one fleshed against another with a cruel & bloody fury. And (saies the original) there were neuer seen two parties of so great power fight so long without knowledge who were victors. But beheld a new change in our army, our French and Italian horse appointed to force the English battell, being valiantly repulsed, fled, and leaues our footmen open to the English shot.

The battell of
of Vernueil.

Both the battells had continued long in fight, and that which had made it equal, was not onely the equality of their forces, but the counterpieze of horses, which serued honorably. But the English had a supply of 2000 Archers, referred at the taile of this Army to guard the baggage. The Duke of Bedford seeing our foot naked of Lances, resolves to employ them. So as this fresh Squadron, doubling a fearfull cry, fall violently vpon this wearied troope, and being halfe disordered, dispereth them. Then all are in a rout: some fly, others kill. The massacre was exceeding great in this first fury, kindled by the obstinacy of the fight. Yet after this first heat, the English accustomed to our blood, fell to take prisoners. Vernueil was the nearest retreat, but the gates were shut, fearing lest the English should enter pel mel, with them that fled, so as the ditch serued for a graue to prison to many. Thus the English had the victory, but they bought it full dearly, for they lost aboute fiftene hundred men; and our losse was farre greater. Our Historicks confesse foure thousand, the English report fiftene thousand. Yet all was not lost, for Xaintrailles, and La Hire gathered together a good number of them that fled, and saued them in Mans the nearest place of retreat.

The French
defeated.A braue retreat of Italians.

There happened a memorable thing in this rout. The Italian troope which had fled, being intrenched in a neere village, to fight for their liues, hauing a false aduertisement that our men had won the victory; they presently part, and come to the place of battle, being knowne, they are charged by the English, but their retreat was exceeding hardy, in despite of their army they saued themselves. Being to passe a riuer at the end of certaine hedges, by so narrow a passage as they could goe but one after another, these Lombards plant their cornets there, as the mark of their way, with 16 armed men to make stand, while the troope should passe. All escape this way without any other harme, the feare: So much order preuailes euen in disorder.

The Nobles men that were slaine.

This ouerthrow changed the 6 of August. The losse was the greater, for that it did separate the former: many great personages were slaine. The Earle of Bouquhan constable of France, the Marshall Douglas (a short time Duke of Touraine) the Earles of Aumale, Harcourt, Ventadour, Tonnery, Moiry: the Lords of Graulley, Montenay, Combrest, Fournay, Brunel, Tumbler, Guirry, Peisy, Mathe, Rambels, Lindefay, Gamaches, Malchey, Boyn, Rembouillet, Harpedane, la Treille, Fourchouinere, la Salle, Lappe, Rochey, la Tour, and many others in great numbers. The Vicount of Narbonne (a rashment of this misfortune) was taken by the Bourguignons, and presently hanged, for a punishment, hauing assisted at the massacre of John D. of Bourgongne. The chiefe prisoners were, John of Bourbon Duke of Alençon, and the bastard of this house, the Marshall Fayette, the Lord of Hormid, Peter Herisson, Lewis of Vaucourt, Roger Broutier, Henry S. Marke, Jamies du Phis, and many others, from whom the English drew great summes of money. Vernueil (to augment this misfortune) was yeelded by Rambures, vpon an honorable composition, with their liues and baggage freed, except that which belonged to the army. The insolent English, spoiled the poore iouldiers, when as the Earle of Salisbury, ruing, slue one of these trecherous wretches, causing these poore vanquished men to be conducted into Berry or Touraine in good safety. After this notable victory, the Duke of Bedford hauing triumphed at Paris, managed this profitable accident: to our losse. He presently deliueys these victorious troopes (carying in their hearts and forehead, the fortune of England) to the Earle of Salisbury, a wife and valiant captain of his army, who employed them with great successe, for he tooke from Ambrose de Lore (a braue and valiant captain) the forts of S. Susanne, Mahans, la Hines, la Ferre-Benard, as the reminders of this shipwrack, and in the end he caried it to the towne of Mahs, although the fidelity of the Inhabitants yeelded him their obedience more slowly, & with greater difficulty.

The prisoners.

Vernueil taken.

The English insolencie increased daily & apparently, like the swelling of a riuer. Vannes were left to obseue all such as did but mutter for their liberty. The Lords of Maucourt and Rocomp were put to death, as guilty of high treason. The goods of such as were sent, were confiscate. In France it was a great crime to be a Frenchman.

1424

The miserable estate of Cicilia
in diuers sorts.

But as one mischief comes not alone, and griefe vpon griefe procures no health, these misfortunes which touched the members, had almost ruined the head: for this lamentable battell of Vernueil (which made all France to mourne) had almost thrust Charles into his graue. Besides these general losses, this poore Prince was surcharged with many difficulties: the incredible burthen of his pouertie, and the reproches of his subiects, accusing him as the author of these banquerout losses, which chanced daily to his armies and townes. Thus he was abandoned both of himselfe and his subiects, his great and many afflictions hauing killed his courage, and lost his credit with the people. In this disgracfull necessity, there was no speech but of engaging the reasonies of the Crowne to paye the Garisons of places, which else would bee lost. The Kings table failed daily: hee eate no more in publike, but sparingly in his chambers attended on by his domestick seruants. The History notes, that as Pothon and la Hire came to him to Chasteaudun, to require succours, they found him at table with a rumpe of Mutton; and two Chickens: and yet in this extreame pouerty of his, the great men got of all hands. The Duke of Alençon had Niort in Poitou, and the bastard of Orleans the Countie of Gyan, for money they said had been lent for the Kings seruice, who auowed all and payed all, for nothing. But that which was of harder digestion, was the continuall discontent of his subiects against him; as if (neglecting his affaires) he had abandoned himselfe to the loue of faire Agnes: A blot which doth yet blemish the name of Charles the seuenth, in the generall conceit of the French Nation, registred as a certain truth, by the writers of our time, which haue written of that reigne. As it is my counse to searce the Originals, and not to alleage any new writer for an author, so haue I carefully noted what the ancients did obseue. Alain Charretier the Kings Secretary layes nothing, Monfret speaks but, vpon occasion in the end of this reigne.

The King
for the loue of faire Agnes.

And for as much (saith he) as the King did see her willingly, the common fame was, that he kept her dishonestly, for the vulgar is more inclined to speake ill then well. But the loue which the King did shew her, was for her pleasing behaviour and eloquent speech, and also for that she was of all faire creatures the fairest. The History of Saint Denis written by the Historiographer of France, doth cleerly excuse him in these tearmes. In Chronick, desiring to write the truth, haue duly informed my selfe, and without falsifying of the truth, doe find by Knights, Councellors, Physicians, Surgeons, and other domestick seruants, examined by oath, as appertained to my charge, to the end to free the people from scandall; that during fise yeares that faire Agnes liued with the Queene, the King neuer frequented her but in great company, nor in the absence of the Queene: he neuer vied any lasciuious countenance vnto her, nor touched her beneath the chin. And after his sports, Charles retired himselfe vnto his lodging, and Agnes vnto hers. But he loued her for that she was pleasant and young, among the fairest, seeking all kind of delights to sweeten his thoughts and cares. These are his very words: But howebeit, this fear remains vpon Charles his face, that he neglected his affaires, losing both his time and iudgement with this woman, and in his gardens; the which blemished his reputation much, euen with his enemies, who held him for an idle person, and of small valour. But as this report made him contemptible, so the insolent behaviour of his Minions made him hateful, for that under his authority, these horrible leeches oppressed the people, and tooke all reward from such as had ventured their liues for the Kings seruice.

Thus this poore prince, surcharged with many difficulties, was so discouraged, as he had no care to preferue himselfe by armes, but employed all his spirits to find some means of an accord at what price soeuer, with the Duke of Bourgongne and Britany. But hee was much deceived, for they had all conspired, his ruine, and euery one pretended a part in this confiscation. The Duke of Savoy looked for a share, and John of Chalon Prince of Orange, was in hope to make himselfe great with the remainders of this spoile. But where the wilde doctrine of mankind; there the prouidence of God began; who provided means for Charles, the which he could not foresee, neither by his industry nor authority; that the restoring of this Realme might be knowne, to proceed from the miraculous bounty of God, the Guardian of this Estate. He did so gaine all his vnto him, but hee lost to such as hee had shewed him what hee had to do. The Duke of Bedford had both an union with the Duke of Bourgongne and Britany, to confirme the English affaires in France, and the Duke of Britany, brother to the Duke of Britany, began to be attracted to his alliance. He had married one of the Daughters of the Duke of Bedford, and Bedford tooke the Duke of Britany.

Prince

Prince of good iudgement, who gouerned his brother wholly, and had a great interest in his brother in law of Bourgongne. He shall helpe much in the restoring of this France, uniting the hearts of Princes distracted from the King; but his foure complexions did much distemper Charles, who shall pay dearly for the fruits of his seruice, as the combe the History will declare. The Duke of Bedford being at Paris, mightily putty with his victories, played the King: this insolent greatnesse, which made him odious to the French (although they durst not shew it) was likewise hatefull to his owne faction.

Bedford & Rich- most brother to the duke of Britany at iarr, being Brothers in law.

Man hath alwaies the miserie that he seeks, and is the plotter of his owne misfortune. This pride bred a iarr betwixt him and the Earle of Richmond, and made a way to the general diuision of these confederate Princes, and re-union of the whole Realme. Richmond was come vnto him, to be imploied in some honorable charge fit for his house and person, making great esteeme of his loue, whereof their alliance seemed an assured gage. But he found nothing but discontents. Arthur was of a French humour, nourished in the miserie of our King, bred vp in their armes, and had beene prisoner for them at the battell of Azincourt: the time onely had with-drawne him from the King seruice, whom every man held lost. The pride of Bedford reuiued in him this first affection: so as not able longer to accord with the English, he resolves to seeke all meanes to recouer the King good grace and fauour, and to ingage his brother the Duke of Britanie.

Arthur of Britany leaves the English.

Thus he leaues the Duke of Bedford, and retires to his house with this discontent. This falls out a fit occasion to aduance this businesse, to the good liking of Richmond: for the office of Constable was void, by the death of the Earle of Boucquhan, slaine in the battell of Vernueil. Charles sleeps not at these newes; but as if he had attended some good opportunity, he presently sends a trusty Gentleman to the Earle of Richmond, to offer him his loue, and for a gage thereof, the dignity of the Constable of France, with all aduantage that a King may honour his seruant with. This first summons Richmond tooke reasonably well: but he answered, that he could not doe any thing with-out his brother the Duke of Britanie: with whom hauing conferred, he would presently aduertise Charles of his resolution. But as the Kings vrgent necessity made him to reckon the minutes, so the tediousness of the Brittons answer made him to languish.

His Councell likewise allowed well of this league, the which shall proue more trouble some vnto him, then honourable, and more preiudiciall then profitable vnto France. Charles (without attending any answer from Richmond) sends John Louet, President of Prouence, one of the chiefe fauourers then in credit; but he remembered not that he was in dislike with these Princes, so as Louet returned without any effect. Yet Charles (loose this opportunity, and to give the English any time to reconcile himselfe to the Brittons), sends to him with all speed a very honourable Ambassage, which was Tolmei Arragon, Queene of Sicilie his mother in law, with Tanneguy of Chastell, being very acceptable to these two brethren. Their coming did greatly aduance this businesse. They prevailed so farre as the Duke of Britanie, and the Earle of Richmond: his brother, was both ready to embrace the Kings friendship, and to doe him seruice, so as the Duke of Bourgongne would yeeld vnto it: and in the meane time (to draw this businesse to some good end) Richmond should goe and take with him Maieesty, upon good hostages for his safety. This condition was accepted by Charles; and to lose no time, the Lord of Albion and the bastard of Orleans, were sent vnto him for hostages, and the townes of Chin, Loches, Lusignan, and Meung, were given him for assurance vntill the end of the Year, and ample passports made to goe and come with all liberty. This worke began this year in November, and shall end the next year, with a notable success.

But the Duke of Bourgongne embraced another notable occasion, which shall preiudice the English in this occurrent of Britany. We haue said that this league was laid in the year 1423; by the marriage of Jacquelin Countesse of Hainault, Holland and Zealand, a wife conuenced for by her husbands, the duke of Bourbon, cousin germain, and a daughter to the Duke of Bourgongne; and the duke of Gloucester brother to the duke of Bedford, and vnto the King of England, two great parties, which shall diuide the dukes of Bedford and Bourgongne, and shall be the meane, so to reconcile the Bourgignon to Charles, and restore him to the obedience of this Queene, and the English out of France, and restore the Realme to the providence of God, which goes insensibly by degrees about this conceit, may be distinctly considered.

About

A notable process of Jacquelin against her husband, supported by the Bourguignon.

About the end of this year, Jacquelin of Hainault comes out of England with the duke of Gloucester her second husband, fortified with an army of fife thousand English. Shee caused the Nobility and the Cities to renew their oathes, both to her and the Duke of Gloucester her lawfull husband. All the Nobility obeyes this commandement, except the Earle of Conuerfan, John of Lumont, Angilbert of Anghien, and all townes except Hals. The Duke of Bourgongne greatly affected this quarrell. The Duke of Bedford foreseeing the danger that might grow by the Bourgignons discontent, labours to suppress it in the breeding, and to that end he drawes them to Paris with their friends, but in vaine. The one strives to enioy his Estates, and the other to hinder him. So as whilest the cause is disputed in the Court at Rome, the armies prepare on either side to end it by blood and spoile. The Gloucester begins, and the Bourgignon followes. So the end of this year is the beginning of a war of foure whole years, but it shall be ended in fauour of the Bourgignon. This new year shall be spent in the alterations of the Court and Britany.

The Earle of Richmond comes to Tours to Charles, as he had promised to the Queene of Sicilie, but not able to resolve any thing without the consent of the Duke of Bourgongne, (as we haue sayd) the King seeing it very necessary he should goe to him, doth send him a very honorable Ambassage, James of Bourbon, Earle of Clermont, a prince of his blood, the Archbishop of Rheims, and the Bishop of Puy. The end of their negotiation was double, that the duke of Bourgongne should like of the alliance betwixt the King and the Princes of Britany, and that he himselfe should be reconciled vnto him, to liue and continue good friends, as they were neere in blood. The first was fully concluded with the Bourgignons consent, the other was suspended. The causes are specified, for that Philip could not with honesty let slip the death of his father, whereof Charles was the author: this reconciliation could not be well effected, yntill that Charles did chafe from him all such as had dipped their hands in this massacre, either as fauours or as executioners. They were specified by name, John Louet President of Prouence, Tanneguy of Chastell, William d' Auangour, John of Gyac, sonne to that Lady of Gyac, who perswaded John duke of Bourgongne to goe to Charles at Montreuil-faut-Yonne, where he was slaine. But these were but colours, for notwithstanding their absence from Court, yet the Bourgignon seemed to be nothing inclined to the Kings seruice. In effect he stood watching the opportunity to effect his designs, and so entertained time, to keepe the stakes, as the whole course of the History will declare.

an ambassage to Philip of Bourgongne.

Charles employing all his friends and meanes, entreates Amedee duke of Sauoy to bee a mediator of this accord. In respect hereof he comes to Monuel in Bresse, but in truth this was but a shadow. They all sought to get from Charles, and so watched for opportunity. Yet the Bourgignon made all shewes of his seruice vowed to the King, and the establishment of France, which he lamented infinitely to be fallen into the hands of strangers. He spared no cheere nor entertainment for the Ambassadors, and for a gage of sincere loue, Philip gives his youngest sister Anne in marriage to the Earle of Clermont, but with an intent to winne a Prince of the blood neere the King. Thus the Bourgignon leuelled alwayes at this marke, and did nothing but with an intent to maintaine his greatness at what price soeuer.

The minions chafe from Court.

In the meane time the meaner smart for the folly of great men. At the returne of these Ambassadors, the Court is in an vprore, Charles grieues to chafe away his seruants, which could not be done but in contempt of his authority. And yet the Ambassadors cried out that without it they should not effect any thing; and the more they stayed the execution, the more they hindred the Kings seruice. D' Auangour parted first with the good liking both of King and Court. Gyac made his peace, by the mediation of the Queene of Sicilie, who had all power in this action. The King was wonderfully discontented for the departure of Tanneguy of Chastell, whom he called father. A man beloued, and of amiable conditions. But there was no remedy. He had given the chiefe stroke to John of Bourgongne. So likewise he protested without any difficultie, to retire himselfe whither soeuer his master should command him.

He beseeched him to give him an authentically certificate, that it was not for any fact of his, but for the good of his seruice. He obtains it, and a promise withall that his offices should be continued him. Thus he retires to Beaucaire in Languedoc, and the officers of Prouost of Paris remained to him still, with the fee, and a good reputation with all men, to haue have been a good servant to the King, and careful of the public good. John Louvet president of Provence, disprised his departure with some bitterness and obsequy. When justice is it (saith he) to condemn a man without hearing? What breach, to vnto the King servants thus, for an others pleasure? but not only the Bourguignon and the Britton hated him to the death, but also the Court and people did detest him. A man of a shrewd minde, cunning, obstinate, revengefull, cruell. Great men hated him, as crossing their faires with the King, abusing his tractable disposition: and meane men, as the horse-leech and the sponge of the public treasure, and a man without mercie. The Bourguignon hated him as the first motiue of his fathers murder, and the Britton, as having giuen counsel to the Earle of Ponthieu to take him prisoner at Cantoneaux. Having gotten great wealth, and impoueriſhed the King and the Realme, he had matched his daughter with a good house. The one, with the Earle of Dunois a bastard of Orleans, the other with the Lord of Ioyeuse. The respect of this alliance saved his life. He was safely conducted to Auignon, & from thence he retires into Provence, without any other fame then to have governed the King ill. His daughter of Ioyeuse died with thought, for her fathers disgrace. Gyac returns into grace more then before, having purchased the fauour of the Queen of Sicily: but he shall soone pay for these imaginations of happinesse, not onely succeeding the President in his misfortune, but also losing his life after an ignominious sort.

The Duke of Britanie comes to King Charles

These men thus chased away, the Constable of Richmont went for his brother John Duke of Britanie, who came to Charles to Saumur: he took the oath of fidelitie, offering him all service. The Bourguignon speaks not yet one word for the King; onely he forbears to make warre against him, having a plausible excuse, for his not sending any more men to the Duke of Bedford, being buſied for the Brabantine, against the Glouceſtrian, in the war of Hainault and Holland. So this accident bred some ease to Charles, but no release. During these confusions in Court, Mans was lost, and after it the rest of Mayne obeyed the Earle of Salisbury. But the Constable of Richmont, (being freed from those domestic crosses which might hinder his credit with the King) would make proofe of his valour, arming the Brittons against the English. And as in the beginning all is good; at this command all Britanie riseth, and runs to this war. But these troopes being raised, and yet ioyned to frame the body of an army, behold the Earle of Warwick marcheth suddenly with a goodly army, gathered out of all the garisons of Normandy, the inhabitants of Townes, and the Nobility of the country, with great speed, who besiege and take Pontorion, a towne vpon the confines of Normandy and Britanie, neere Saint Mirin Mount. This prick forward the Constable, to whom this scorne belonged. After that Warwick was retired, having left a garison in his conquest, behold the Constable comes to Pontorion with his Brittons, hee besiege it, beats, and takes it by force, making great slaughter of the English.

The Constables ill success.

This success gaue him courage to passe on: the towne of Saint James of Beuerron much disquiet that country. He attempts it, hoping to be succoured with men and money from France: but having words alone without effects, his Brittons (being for the most part voluntaries) slip away daily, notwithstanding any preuention of the Constables: who resolved (before this warlike multitude had abandoned him) to make profit of his presence, and to giue a generall assault. The neerhess of Auranches (where the Earle of Suffolk with Scales, famous captaines among the English) remained with goodly troopes) took him occasion of feare, lest they should charge his men in the heat of the assault. To this end, he sends forth two thousand men out of the body of his army, to meete with the imagined English.

The Commanders having discovered euen to the gates of Auranches, and found nothing, they resolve to returne to the army, not giuing the Constable any other advertisement. The Brittons being at the assault, seeing those men come, suppose them to be English, and fearing to be coopt in, having an enemy both before and behind, they resolve to leave their ladders, and retire to their campe. Their retreat was somewhat difficult, by reason of a poole with a narrow causey, which they had wonne with great labour and paine. The besieged seeing the Brittons forsake the wals, fall forth courageously after them, and recover the quarter abandoned, where there was a point that flanked the poole, in which they plant three score archers. There were eight or nine hundred Brittons shut up betwixt the wals and the poole: so as from this recovered point, they might choose them

one after one. The rest of the English garison issuing forth the towne furiously, put these amazed Brittons to the sword, who are either gauled with English arrowes, like beasts in a toyle, or with a desperate courage leape into the poole. Thus leſt then 500 hundred men overthrew about eight thousand. The campe was abandoned and spoiled, 18 ensignes lost, with the banner of Britanie: many prisoners were taken, after the English had bene wearied with killing. The principall that were slaine, were the Lords of Molac, Coitiuy, la Motte, and many captaines of marke. The artillery, engines, and all the rest of the munition remained for a pawne. This vnreasonable alarum, greatly troubled the Constable, who was now become all the hope of the French, as if he carried all France vpon his shoulders like another Atlas. To repaire this ridiculous disgrace, hee raiseth new forces in Britanie with all speed, hee ioynes vnto him the troopes of Ambroſe of Lore to be assisted with his valour, and having giuen them their pay, he causeth them to march into Aniou, where he takes la Fleſche, Galerande, Beaufort, Malicorne, and so recouers the hearts of his men after so notable a losse, and keeps his enemy in awe. From thence hee goes to Court, where there were other designs then to fight with the English. A man fitter to braue it in a Councell of State, then to dispute a battell or the siege of a towne. He came to Court to bee the author of many confusions during this yeare: and on the other side, his brother the Duke of Britany, before it passe, shall leave the party of France, and reconcile himselfe vnto the English, that the honour of our deliuerance might be giuen to God, the guardian of this Monarchy, and not to these Princes of Britany, to whom Charles was too much affected, in buying their friendship so deare, being euen then vnprofitable, when as he had greatest need: yet in their sear, all these instruments worke to restore our decayed estate. But these were the Constables good seruices. After this shamefull disgrace, he seeks to couer his fault, exclaiming first against the King, as if hee had bene the cause of this infamous disorder happened at Saint James, and having too freely discovered his griefes vnto the King, he presumed to take John of Malefront Chancelor of Britany prisoner, as being particularly charged to sollicite the payment of such money as was appointed for this Britton Army. Charles was much offended with this presumption, & in despite of the Constable, caused Malefront to be presently released, and sent into Sauoy. The Constable was greatly discontented with this proceeding, the which hee took as an affront done to his person, and resolves to be reuenged. So great were the confusions of that age, as the Estimate durst prescribe a Law to his master, and his counsell bandy against him to controul his will. Yea the Princes of the blood (so great was the corruption of that wretched age) were the chiefe controllers of the Kings actions. Then was there nothing more miserable then France, who discontented with her King, nourished the ambition of many Kings. This iealous ambition did nothing cure the infirmities of our Estate. Charles found it lost, he could not raise it alone. To debase his authority was no meane to cure the confusions of the Realme. And as there is nothing more troublesome then confusion, the French Nation being then extremely afflicted, did nothing amend their condition, in casting vpon the King the reproaches of their calamities.

He exclaims against the King.

This was to deprime themselves of their head, wherein consists the whole life of the body. An vnreasonable discontent. The whole body of the State was sicke, and this distasteth people would haue their heads found. A notable circumstance, for it is strange, that (after so many miseries) this domesticall confusion had not bene the vtter ruine of the State. But let vs returne to our discourse. The Constable had great credit with the Council, whom in the beginning the King had greatly countenanced: but the private practices, and the generall discontent of great persons, had made him halfe a King, to crosse the Mignons whom all men hated. Great men hated them, as possessing the King, and the people detested them, as managing all things at their pleasure, to the preiudice of the common weale. There were two Mignons that did greatly vex them, Gyde and Canuel of Beaulieu. They resolve by a generall consent to dispatch them.

The Princes, with the Lords of Albret and Tremouille (who had a great interest in the State), where of the party. But the Constable must doe the execution. The matter concluded betwixt them, was thus executed: Gyde was taken in bed with his wife, carried to Dunle Roy, condemned and executed: that is, he was put into a sacke and cast into the river. The Constable performed this office, without any other forme of law, then his his bare command. Afterward Camus borne in Auvergne, as hee walked in the Kings lodging, was ventrouly slaine, by a souldier belonging to the Marshall of Boufflac. Charles vnderstood it, and in a manner, toucht the blood of his two domestick seruants, being wonderfully discontented: but the time (which did authorise these confusions) caused him to swallow this pill quietly. Tremouille married Gyacs widow, the heire of Lifle-Bouchart, and entred newly in credit with the King, giuing him to vnderstand that all warres his seruice, so as there was no more speeche thereof: euery man shut both eyes and eares. But Tremouille shall haue his turne: he shall leaue some of his haire, and hardly face the mould of his doubler. Thus the affaires of the Court ebbed and flowed, the which raised vp one, and cast downe another. In this deceitfull manner of life, there is nothing certain, but uncertainty, fauours being giuen not by desert, but most commonly by a blind appetite, which hath no other iudgement, but the apprehension of weake heads, diuiding the piness of a Courtiers life into quarters, this day to one, and to morrow to another. A goodly lesson for such as are fauoured in Court, not to bee transported with vain hope, toyes to deceiue the indiscreet. The surest guards of prosperitie, are integrity, wisdom, modesty and patience, to remember aduersity in prosperitie, according to the precepts of the wise.

This was the good government of the Constable of Richmond, a bold practiser of these domestick confusions, whilst the Bourguignon plyed his businesse. Wee haue made mention of the suite of Iaqueline, Countesse of Hainault and Holland, for Humphrey Duke of Gloucester, her pretended husband, against John Duke of Brabant, her lawfull husband, for so had Pope Martin pronounced it, in fauour of the Brabantin; but from law they came to Armes. The Bourguignon supported the Brabantin. These Princes (hauing increased their forces), begin by writing. The Gloucesterian accuseth the Bourguignon of contumeliousnes and treachery. The Bourguignon giues him the lye: but from reproches they fall to Armes. The Bourguignon offers the Gloucesterian to end the question by combat, and by that tryall to auoyde the effusion of their souldiers blood. The Gloucesterian accepts it: all is prepared for the combat: but the Duke of Bedford interposeth his authority. To this end he calls the chiefe men of all estates to Paris, to quench this fire by common aduice decrees; That, that day should be disannulled, neither should it be iudiciall to either party. That is to say, All being well viewed and considered, there is no iust cause for either to call the other to this wilfull combat, from the which they must not depart, although it were accepted, without great preiudice to both their honours. In the meane time, neither the Popes authority, nor the Regents decree, by the general iudice of the States, could preuaile, but all burst forth into open warre. The Bourguignon proued the stronger: so as the Gloucesterian (leaving Iaqueline at Mons) posted into England for new Forces, but all was in vaine, the Bourguignon making his profit of the Princes absence, did easily effect his desire, hauing no opposit but a woman, dishonoured for her infamous adulteries. He failes not to enter Hainault with a strong Army, and vseth all force to reduce this people to reason.

The Country seeing it selfe pressed by the Bourguignons forces, (neither hoping nor desiring any succours from England, and perfwaded that Iaqueline supported her cause) resolute to obey the stronger. Hauing to that effect protested vnto their Lady what they thought fitting for their duty, they leaze on her person, and deliuer her into the hands of the Duke of Bourgongne. Philip receiues her honorably, and promisseth all offices of friendship to comfort her. From Mons he causeth her to bee conducted into a goodly traine to Gand, by Lewis of Charlons, Prince of Orange, a braue Nobleman. The Gantois employ their meanes to honour her. This great liberty gaue her meanes to make an escape from this goodly cage: so as hauing practised some for her guide, she disguised herselfe in the habit of a man, and retires from Gand to Breda, where the doth arrive the riuier of Gagide, and doth sollicite the townes of Holland by her Agents. The Bourguignon (foreseeing by these beginnings a long continuance of trouble) flies thither with his Army. He enters the Country, at the first they all resist him, for the respect the subjects bare to their Lady. But as the inconueniences of warre increased daily, and that Philip did shew by publike writings and priuate practices, that whatsoever hee did, was to maintain the right of the lawfull husband, many townes yeelded vnto him. At this time the Duke of Brabant, the lawfull husband of Iaqueline, dyes in the Castle of Lennuere, being inductured Philip of Bourgongne his heire. The Cities seeing the Bourguignon supported both by force, and right, follow him by a common consent, as twice a Conqueror, did persuade their Lady not to appose her selfe obstinately against so reasonable a necessity. So without any other force, but the happy successe of the stronger, an accord was made betwixt Philip Duke of Bourgongne, and Iaqueline Countesse of Hainault and Holland, vpon these conditions: That Iaqueline doth acknowledge her Cousin Philip Duke of Bourgongne, for the lawfull heire of her countries, and from thenceforth doth make him gouernour of Hainault, Holland and Zeland. All these estates should take their oath and doe homage unto Philip. All fortresses should be deliuered into his hands, and the promises neuer to be made without his consent. Thus Philip was honourably receiued throughout all these estates, to the content of some & discontent of others, according to their diuers humours; but force controlled all. Iaqueline made a good shew, yet greatly discontented to see him her master. Such was the Tragi-comedy of this long suite; for the quiet of these Estates, and the gearnesse of the Duke of Bourgongne, who made his profit of all sides, for soone after William Earle of Namur, left him the Earldome of Namur, whereof he takes possession, to the great discontent of the Liegeois, as we shall see hereafter. This greatnesse of the Duke of Bourgongne bred ialousie in the Duke of Bedford, he being assisted by the Duke of Britanie his open enemy, and the Earle of Richmond Constable of France, whom he sees hourly to grow great in his authority.

Thus fearing more mischief to fall vnto him by that meanes, he resolues to fortifie himselfe with new helpes, and to this end he goes into England, leauing the affaires of France in charge of the Earles of Warwicke, Suffolke, and Salisbury. His stay was not long, necessity pressed him. He obtains both men and money, fit remedies to prevent a storme. He returns into France with ten thousand men, and a notable some of money for their pay. For the good employment of these new forces, he resolues to besiege Montargis, a dangerous thorne, both for the necessitie to Paris, and the conuerse of the Bourguignon, who continued his designes notwithstanding the still ialousie of these Princes. The charge of this siege was giuen to the Earles of Warwicke and Suffolke, with three thousand men: the rest were dispersed in Normandy, and in townes bordering vpon Picardy, for feare of the Bourguignon, in whom hee had no confidence. Montargis is besieged, and although the waters hindered their approach to the walles, yet with in few daies it was fiercely battered by the English, and valiantly defended by the French.

They cry out for succor, but the affaires in Court were wonderfully confused, (by the intestine ialousies of great men) that one gazed vpon another, yet no man stirred, although Charles continually cried, to armes. In the end they begin to march: & although the Constable had busied himselfe in this leaue, yet fearing the example of Saint James, he would not hazard himselfe in the leading therof, pretending many excuses to saue himselfe from blowes. For want of him, the charge was giuen to the Earle of Dunois a bastard of Orleans, to William of Albert Lord of Orual, to the Lords of Gaucourt, Guirry, Grauille, Villars, la Hire, Gyles of Saint Simon, Gualter of Brossard, John Steward a Scot, and other valiant Capitaines, who led fiftene or sixteene hundred fighting men. Their purpose was onely to vniuersall the besiegers, whilst the King raised new forces in the Countries of his obedience. The Constable remained at largeau attending the issue, which succeeded more happily then the designe of so slight a succour. The Earle of Dunois doth aduertise the besieged of his approach.

The winter forced the English to make three ledgings, these within the towne had cunningly surprized the bridges vpon the riuier of Loing, and after the succours had severely requested the Rendezvous, those within the towne stopped the course of the water to artificially raise the riuier ouerflowes the bridges. At the same instant all the troopes charge the English: la Hire leading the first troope, chargeth the quarter where the Lord of la Poole, brother to the Earle of Suffolke commanded, and crying Montjoye S. Denis, he fills all with confusion, killing, burning, and spoiling: de la Poole with much adoe saues himselfe with scant more in his brothers lodging in the Abbey without the towne, vpon the way to Nemours. The Earle of Dunois (whose Rendezvous was towards the Castle,) hauing ioynd with the Towne-men (who were issued forth with great resolution) chargeth the body of their armie, the which he wholly defeated.

The slaughter was great, for so small troopes, for they numbred sixteene hundred slaine vpon upon the place. In this charge the Earle of Suffolke, favoured by the waters, gathers together all he can in his quarter, and recouers the hills, to make his retreat to Chateau-Landon, and Nemours, places vnder the English command, and of nearest retreat. The honour of this happy successe, was attributed to the Earle of Dunois, whereat the King received an incredible content, as a refreshing to this burning feuer, and the Constable Richmond a grievous discontent, being absent: and so this year ended.

But the new year will then what fruits Britany yielded to France during her great calamities. This check at Montargis did somewhat coole the Duke of Bedfords heat, but the Constables ambition nothing at all; who having undertaken to play the King with the King, sought to crosse all the humors of this Prince: he hated what he loved, disallowed what he allowed, and dispraised what he commended. After the violent death of Gyac (of whom we have spoken) he had favoured Tremouille, to plant him in the Kings good favor. But as ambition hath neither faith nor honesty, Tremouille finding himselfe inward with the King, retains all favour for himselfe, little esteeming both the Constable and the Princes. He didd onely affociate vnto him in credit, Prie and la Borde, men of small account, to use them at his pleasure, jealousie mounts again vpon the Stage the Princes, Constable and chiefe officers of the crowne, in stead of taking counsel to pursue the good successe at Montargis, they combine themselves together to worke their wils vpon Tremouille, and his Partisans, as they had done vpon Gyac. The plot was orderly laid. James of Bourbon, Earle of Clermont, and Charles of Bourbon Earle of March, Princes of the blood, become heads of this league against Tremouille and his companions. The league is thus plotted, And much as the King is governed by base people, to the contempt of the Princes and Officers of the Crowne, and to the great oppression of the poore people, the confederates mean to punish the flatterers, abusing the Kings name and authority, and to approach neere vnto his Maiestie, to govern the affaires for the good of his service, and the ease of France. The execution must begin with the seizure of Tremouille, and continue with Prie and la Borde. The Constable should take Tremouille, and the Princes were to seize on the citie of Bouges, where Prie and la Borde were in the great Towre, and so to punish them.

But this enterprise came to naught, for Tremouille having intelligence of this designe, not only preserved himselfe, but having perswaded the King, that this complot was made against his own person and authority, it so troubled Charles, as he came in person to Bouges, and prevented the Princes entry, and without any more disguising he was strangely incensed against the Constable, as the author of these troubles and confusions, forbidding the cities to receiue him. The Constable notwithstanding smothered this disgrace, and shew the deuotion he had to the Kings service, he goes to field, gathers together a goodly troope of Brittons, and puts himselfe into Pontorion, a towne abandoned: he fortifies it, and mans it with a good Garison, vnder the command of Monsieur de Restrenan and Beaufort. This done, he dismisseth his Brittons. The Earle of Warwicke watched all occasions to surpris the towne, when as beheld these two gouernors minister a fit meane: for making a roade towards Auranches, they are both taken. Warwicke marcheth presently to the Walls of Pontorion with his army. The Constable sends Bertrand of Dinan, Marshall of Britany speedily with great succours. Yet the siege continues obstinately. New supplies are sent them by the Duke of Britanie, the which were cut in peeces. Pontorion after much paine comming to a parlee, in the end yeelds to the English, the besieged departing with bagge and baggage.

But this was not the end of this victory: the English army increased both in number and courage by this happy successe, and threatens Britanie with fire and sword. They prepare to enter. John Duke of Britanie wearied with so many losses, and fearing worse, making no account of the succours of France, (to whom he was coldly affected) takes par with the Duke of Bedford, renounceth all other alliances, promiseth to acknowledge the King of England for King of France, and to take the oath of obedience, such as his predecessors were accustomed to doe to the Kings of France. Behold the great good which Britanie brought to our country in her extreamest afflictions, after so many hopes & embracing. This year is painfull, shameful, and confused, but the fore-runner of a worthy deliverance. Take courage then my countrymen in the remainders of this tempest. We have said that after that miserable battell of Veruail, the towne of Mans yeelded to the English. The inhabitants not able to beare the impetuous command of the English, resolute in the end

A to shake off that yoke: For the effecting whereof, they seaze vpon a gate, giuing intelligence thereof to the Lord of Oruall, brother to the Lord of Albret, who happily attunes, takes the City, and cuts the English in peeces. The Earle of Suffolke was within the Castle. Talbot that renowned Captaine was at Alençon, he aduertiseth him of this surprize. Talbot prepares his succours with such silence, and flies thither with such speed, as hee arrives at Mans the third day after the surprize. Our French-men transported with ioy for so noble a conquest, and fearing no enemy among so many enemies both politicke and discontented slept securely in their beds after the French manner, without feare or guard, when as Talbot (having entred the Citie by scaling) surprizeth them in their beds, killing them without resistance.

A notable example, both to imitate and to flye: to flye, that through carelesnes wee suffer not our selues to be surpris'd like swine; it is the very terme wherewith the History doth blemish this brutish sloath: to imitate, not to hold any thing impossible when as resolution doth accompany him that hath any notable attempt in hand. But this victory lyes not at Mans: the Earle of Suffolke with his braue Talbot, goes to field, they march to Laual (a towne of importance, vpon the confines of Aniou and Britany) they take it easily, by the onely terror of their victorious armes, encountering no enemy to withstand them. The whole Court was in confusion; the Princes of the blood, and our Constable durst not to make warre against the English, but against the Mignons. It was their proiect, as if the whole State depended vpon the Kings fauour, who lost daily to the generall discontent of all the French. So this year had nothing memorable, but that our warriors had lost both iudgement, courage, and force: that through their defects God might raise vpon some extraordinary meanes, for the delivery of this monarchy, almost ruined. Our Captaine then did some exploits, taking Rochfort, Bertan-court, Lanul, Chateau-neuf, Puster, Tourny, Mompieau, Nogent-le-Rerrou, and Lude: but what toyes are these, in regard of the stately triumphs of the English?

That which was most admirable this year: amidst all these domesticall discontents, amidst these ruines and desolations of the State (which might well haue quailed the best affected) those of the Citie of Tournay (after long contentions) in the end abandon both English & Bourguignon, protesting solemnly, not to acknowledge any other King then Charles the 7. sonne to Charles the sixt, as the true and lawful King of France, and by consequence their lawful Lord: yet they made a truce with the Bourguignon, being their neighbours, with the Kings good liking. In the meane time, the Duke of Bedford leaues that men and money he can, both in France and England, for some great attempt, Charles hath intelligence from diuers parts, but what could he doe in so deepe despaire of his affaires, and in so visible an impossibility.

The famous Siege of Orleans.

ALL the cities on this side Loire, from the Ocean Sea were lost, with the whole Counties of Normandy, Picardy, the Isle of France, Bry, and Champagne. He had nothing left but the townes lying vpon the riuier of Loire, from Gien to Angers, for the Chastels held for the Bourguignon. The chiefe was Orleans, this being wonne, what could hold out long for the French: Bourges could make small resistance, if the English had for Orleans. The enemies of our State (who called Charles King of Bourges) threatened warre from him this small and languishing Royalty. Orleans then was the mark whereat the Duke of Bedford aimed, who having wonne the Britton, it greatly fortified the English affaires in France. As for the Bourguignon, he had in a manner recouered the Counties of Holland, Hainault, Zealand, and Namur. And although ambition and covetousness might be restrained: yet these Princes (nothing friendly among themselves) began to be enemies to this Crowne, agreed well in this, to make their private profit by the ruin of our State. But man purposeth, and God disposeth: we shall see how much hee teaches their vanities.

In this lamentable time, mans reason could not discern by what meanes Charles might resist so mighty enemies. But in the last of this Prince, I trade with Ioy the words of the Originall, which saith, During the time of this English Siege, the noble Citie of Orleans, King Charles was very weak, being surrounded by the greatest greatest part of his Princes and other Noblemen, seeing that all things were opposite unto him: yet had he still a good trust and confidence in God. He was not deceived in this hope, as the sequell will shew. The charge of this siege at Orleans was given to the Earle of Salisbury, a wife and resolute Commander: having given good testimonies of his sufficiency for the well managing of this siege, he resolved to take in all the Forts neere to Orleans; that obeyed the French, and beginning with the weakest, parting from Paris, (taking his way through the Country of Chartres) he seized upon all the small townes wherein our Capitaines had so much toyle but a few moneths before. Nogent le Rotrou, Pithu, Rochfort, Bertancourt, Janville, Toury, Mompieau, the Castle of Pluieris, and la Ferte of Gaules, and approaching neere the Citie (both above and beneath) Meung, Baugency, and Largesau.

The Earle of Salisbury before Orleans.

In the end he plants himselfe before Orleans, the sixt of October, in the year 1428. A day to be observed, for that the 12 of May, the year following was the last day of our disface, which changed the estate of our miserable Country, like unto a pleasant spring after a long and sharpe Winter, when as a goodly summer crownes all our labours with abundance of peace and plenty. So this siege continued iust seven moneths. The brute of this great preparation did wonderfully disquiet both Court and Country, vnder the French obedience, in the weakenesse and confusions of the State. The King after the taking of la Charite, was commonly resident at Poitiers, hee now retires to Chinon, to be neerer to Orleans. The townes willingly contribute men, money, and victuals. Many great personages sie to this siege, to defend the chiefe strength of our King and Kingdome. Lewis of Bourbon the sonne of Charles Earle of Clermont, the Earle of Dunois, bastard of Orleans, the Lords of Boussac and Fayette, Marshalls of France: John Steward Constable of Scotland, William of Albret Lord of Orual; the Lords of Thouers, Chauigny, Grauille and Chabannes. The Capitaines la Hire, Xaintrailles, Theobald of Valpergue, and John of Lessego, Lombards, with many other great personages. There were not any of the Provinces of Dauphine and Languedoc: for that the Dukes of Bourgogne and Sauoy, at the same instant prepared a great army, by the meanes of Lewis of Chalons Prince of Orange, to invade those Countries being wholly in the Kings obedience. The Orleansois resolves to defend himselfe. Hee presently beats downe all that might accommodate the enemy, suburbs, houses of pleasure, wine presses, yea, and the temples themselves.

Charles his diligence to relieve it.

Salisbury doth likewise use great dexterity and diligence to plant his siege, towards Beaulieu and the port Banziere, he builds a great Bastille, which hee calls Paris. Another at the port Renard which he names Rouen. Towards S. Lawrence another, to the which he gaue the name of Windfore. At the port of Bourgogne he fortified a ruined Temple, called S. Loup, and neere vnto it another, named S. John the White. At the Portereau hee build a great fort vpon the ruines of the Angustines Church, calling it London: from the which hee wonne the Towre vpon the bridge, and all with wonderfull speed. All the City is environed, having neither issue nor entry, but with sore fighting. And in the towre they spend the rest of the year.

The first day of the new year, the English (for a new years gift to the city) bring the scaling ladders courageously to the bulwark at the port Renard, but they were valiantly repulled by the defendants: the next day the Admiral of Cullant having passed the river of Loire at a ford (winter being very drie this year) visits them of the citie, and brings them divers necessities: vpon this return, he encounters some English troops which came relieving from forage. He chargeth them, cuts them in peeces, and so retires without danger. Thus the moneth of January passeth without any other memorable exploit; but hee happened a strange accident the 20 of February following. The Duke of Bedford gave them provision to the Earle of Salisbury, with some munition of war, vnder the conduct of John Fastolfe and Simon Bowyer, with 1700 men for their guard. The Duke of Bourbons brought a goodly succour of foure thousand men to be besieged. He resolves to charge this English troope, having well viewed their numbers. It was likely the stronger should haue the victory, but the issue was contrary to the designe. For it chanced (as it may be marched confidently, as it were to an assured victory, without any iudgement) the English seeing them in doubt, how they should fight, either on foot or horse-back, and irresolute at the end they resolve to charge the French: falling out many times in this exercise, that he which begins, wins. To conclude, without any further aduice, the English embrace this occasion, charge our troopes, who were so surprised with this vnspected impression, as they presently giue way to the English Bow-men. All fye, some here, some there, without order, without command, and without courage, and few fight. Those that made head were slaine, the rest saue themselves within Orleans. There were five or six hundred of our men slaine vpon the place. The English lost but one man called Briffanteau. The chiefe of our side were the Lord of Orual, of the Noble House of Albret, John Stuard, Chasteburn, Montpel, Verduisant, Larigot, La Greue, Dinray, Puilly, with better then an hundred Gentlemen.

This ouerthrow was called the Battell of Herings, for that they caryed them to the besiegers the amazement was greater then the losse, for that the Earle of Clermont a prince of the blood, who should haue beene a ring-leader, full of resolution and valour in these extreme accidents, was so amazed with this losse, as he retired with his men, leaving the City to the bastard of Orleans, who resolves to attend the end of this siege, at what price focuer. In this gallant resolution, he was veriously seconded by the Lords of Guity, Gaudcourt, Grauille, Villars, La Hire, and Xaintrailles, lights of great hope in this cruell storme, and worthy of eternall memory, in that they despaired not of this monarchy, in so apparent despaire. And that which is chiefly to be observed herein, the King (vnderstanding this retreat of the Earle of Clermont) said that he did see no meanes to saue the rest from shipwracke.

To increase this feare, the Duke of Bourgogne comes to Paris at the same instant with a troope of sixe hundred men armed richly appointed. Our Commanders (being full of resolution) were not only to encounter with the English, but with the confusion of times; the Kings misfortune, and (which was worst of all) the amazement of the men of warre who discouered plainly the disorder of the State. They were loth to cast the helue after the hatcher, but sought the most assured meanes to saue the City in this storme. They aduertise the King hereof, who was so irresolute, as he referres all to their discretions; who resolve to deliuer the towne into the Duke of Bourgognes hands, to keepe it for the Duke of Orleans, or the Duke of Angouleme his brother, being then prisoners in England, with the Kings good liking. Patbon of Xaintrailles, and Peter of Orson (wife and valiant men) goe to Paris to the Duke of Bedford, vpon his assurance. Hee heares them, and returns them presently, both for that hee distrusteth the Duke of Bourgogne, and held the conquest assured. The Bourguignon was greatly discontented with Duke of Bedford for his refusal, whom after that time he neuer ioued.

The Duke of Bedford discontented the Bourguignon.

The English triumphed as victors, so as our Ambassadors could hardly saue themselves with their passport. Then the English (saith the Originall) being in great prosperity, had no consideration that the wheeles of Fortune hath power to turne daily. But the holy verity of the Church, which draws vs to the wise providence of God, cries, I haue said to fooles, Play not the fooles: and to the wicked, Lift not up your hornes, speake not with so great pride: for E greatness comes not from the East nor West, neither from the North: it is God that raiseth up and casteth downe. He holds a cup of wine in his hand, he imparts it to euery one as he pleaseth.

Truly the pride of the English, who possessed a great part of this monarchy, being drunke with this good fortune, was now come to his height: there remained nothing but the hand of the soueraigne Iudge to suppress him, but he shall not long hold it.

O my Country! forget not the time of thy visitation. Reade in this true discourse the estate of thy predecessors. Remember their afflictions, behold their feare, see the image of that time wherein thou hast borne a part, and iudge if now only thou beginnest to be afflicted.

In this extremity as the French were exceedingly distressed, so the English were transported with ioy, for their late victory; and reioicing with a new hope as if all were won, they cry to the besieged, Will you buy my sayre Herings: at the same instant the townsmen issue forth along the river, the Earle of Salisbury stood at a window in the towre vpon the bridge beholding the skirmish, when as one of the Capitaines named Glacine, said vnto him, My Lord, behold here your Citie, here may you view it plainly. But behold a Cannon charged with stones was shot from the towne, which ayimed at the Earles head, stricke him and left him dead in the place. This vnspected blow (comming as it were from heauen) changed this exceeding ioy of the English into mourning, being a man of great valor, who by his carriage had wonne great credit among them, beloued and honored of all, for the mildnesse of his manners. So this losse troubled both the wits & affaires of the English army, the which had greatly disband, if the Earle of Suffolke, Talbot, John of Arles, and Scales, famous Captaines, had not happily been there, to reuue their spirits and courage, attending the Duke of Bedfords pleasure, who gaue the charge to Talbot, being the chiefe of their best men, and sending him few forces. So as the sieges continued with more vehemency then before, with great presumptions, that all would goe worke with the besieged.

In this occurrent, Charles knew not what to doe, to whom should he flie? his Prince forsake him. Orleans being taken, whither should he retire? Bourges was ready to yield, and withall, the country adioyning. He had no whole Province vnder his obedience, in Languedoc and Dauphine. And at the same instant the Bourgaignon and Sauiyard made worke for him in those countries. The taking then of Orleans (which in reason was vnauoydable) was the ouerthrow of Charles and his estate: There was no winking that which was too apparent. That considering the estate of his affaires in generall and his House in particular, if Orleans should be lost, all the townes vpon the riuier of Loyn and in like sort the rest (already wauering) would abandon him.

Amiddest these fearefull considerations, what could the brave and Noble Commander within Orleans doe, but plant their hopes in God and in themselves? A fortie dayes he died in extreme dangers. So (to purchase an honorable and profitable composition) he set a good face on it, giuing the English to vnderstand, that if they desired their liues, they should buy them dearly. France reduced to so great an extremity, and truly such, as she could doe no more, beheld God raised vp an extraordinary meane, the which reason could not foresee, and much lesse provide. A meane which reuied the daunted spirits, changed the face of our affaires, and dismaid the enemies. And to conclude by miraculous meane, gaue a happy successe both to our King and Realme: and thus was the occasion.

Charles his miserable estate.

A young Maiden named Jeanne of Arc (borne in a village vpon the Marches of France called Domremy, neere to Vaucouleurs) of the age of eightene or twenty years, is from base parents, her father was named James of Arc, and her mother Jabel, poore country folkes, who had brought her vp to keepe their cattell, she said with great boldnesse. That shee had a reuelation, how to succour the King: how he might be able to chase the English from Orleans, and after that to cause the King to be crowned at Rheims, and put him fully and wholly in possession of his Realme.

After she had deliuered this to her father, mother, and their neighbours, she presumed to goe to the Lord of Baudricourt Prouost of Vaucouleurs, she boldly deliuered vnto him (after an extraordinary manner) all these great mysteries, as much wished for of all men, as not hoped for: especially coming from the mouth of a poore country maide, when they might with more reason beleue to be possessed by some melancholy humour, she diuinely inspired, being the instrument of so many excellent remedies, in so desperate season, after the vaine struing of so great and famous personages. At the first he mocked her and reprobed her, but hauing heard her with more patience, and iudging by her temperate discourse and modest countenance, that she spake not idly, in the end he resolves to present her to the King for his discharge. So she arriues at Chinon the first day of May, attired like a man.

Jeanne the Virgin, or rather witch.

She had a modest countenance, sweet, ciuill and resolute, her discourse was temperate, reasonable and retired, her actions cold, shewing great chastity. Having spoken to the King or Noblemen with whom he was to negotiate, she presently retired to her lodging with an old woman that guided her, without vanity, affectation, babbling or courtly lightnesse. These are the manners which the Original attributes vnto her. The matter was found ridiculous both by the King and his Councell, yet must they make some trial. The King takes vpon him the habit of a countirman, to be disguised: this maide being brought into the Chamber goes directly to the King in this attire, shewes him with a modest countenance, as if she had beene bred vp in court all her life. They telling her that she mistooke, she assured them it was the King, although she had neuer scene him. She began to deliuer vnto him this new charge, which (she sayes) she had receiued from the God of heauen, so as the turned the eyes and minds of all men vpon her.

A This matter being referred to counsell, it was concluded, they should take the aduice of Diuines. They answer, that in desperate diseases, the prouidence of God doth commonly raise vp extraordinary remedies, and employes women, when as men grow faint-hearted: as in the afflictions of Israel, he hath mightily vied Deborah and Abigail. The one to teach the people, the other to kill a furious tyrant: and Judith, which slew that great tyrant in the midst of his army. So as necessity, which made them to seeke all sorts of remedies, caused the King to try if this Maide spake truth, but without the hazard of any thing. This Jean (held for a Prophetesse by many) is reported by Gyraud, Seigneur of Haillan, and many other French Writers, and plainly said to haue beene induced to this impossibility by three Noblemen, who had incited her thereto, and layed that plot, onely to encourage King Charles to fight, despairing of his estate.

She desires of the King, that she may be conducted to Orleans, to beginne the worke which she said she had in charge. A sword remaining in Touraine, in a place called S. Katherine of Fierebois was brought vnto her, to be armed therewith. They gaue her, armes and horse, with a sufficient troupe to enter the cite. Lewis of Cullant, Admirall of France, and James of Rieux Marshall, had charge to accompany her with some victuals to the besieged, and to haue a care, that all should be wisely caryed without hazard. She prepares her colours, and being armed at all points, she went to take leaue of the King, with a grace worthy of a great Captaine: beseeching him to trust in God, in whose name she spake.

C This she parts from Chinon the twelfth of April.

Now they reckoned the sixt moneth of the siege, the besieged cry out for hunger. This victualling provided at Blois, is conducted by the aboue-named Commanders, with great care, as well for feare of the English (who had their centinels in all places) as for the distrust they had of this new Commander. She marched in the fore-most rancke, betwixt the Admirall and the Marshall, carying the countenance of a very resolute personage. They arrive (with this prouision) safely at Orleans, the English making no shew of arming, although the passed before their forts, in view of the armie, yet had they scarce fixe hundred men in this supply.

The power of Gods prouidence is admirable in the hearts of men, making them to yeld D infinitely to what he hath decreed. This first exploit stirred vp the spirits of the French. Orleans begins to reioyce at the sight of this Maid, attired like a man, standing vpon the point of yeelding. This first releefe was not sufficient for so great a multitude. They resolved to fetch more victuals, and to that end would returne to Blois. But before their departure the Maiden writes this letter following, to the chiefe of the English army, and sends it by a trumpet. I haue truly set it downe out of the Original, in the same words and style, both for the reuerence of antiquitie, the noble courage of this virgin, and the truth and state of the subiect.

King of England, doe reason to the King of heauen, for his blood royall, yeeld vp to the Virgin the keyes of all the good Cities which you haue forced. She is come from heauen E to reclaim the blood royall, and is ready to make a peace, if you be ready to doe reason: yeeld therefore, and pay what you haue taken. King of England, I am the chiefe of this war, wherefoever I encounter your men in France, I will chase them, with they or no. If they will obey, I will take them to mercie. The Virgin comes from the King of heauen, to drive you out of France. If you will not obey, she will cause so great a furie, as she like hath not bene these thousand yeeres in France. And beleue certainly, that the King of heauen will send her and her good men at armes, more force then you can haue. Goe in Gods name into your country, be not obdurate, for you shall not hold France of the King of heauen, the Sonne of Saint Mary, but Charles shall enjoy it, the King and lawfull heire, to whom God hath giuen it, he shall enter Paris with a goodly traine. You William de la F. Poole, Earle of Suffolke, John Lord Talbot, Thomas Lord Scales, Lieutenants to the Duke of Bedford, and you Duke of Bedford, rearming your selfe Regent of the Realme of France, spare innocent blood, and leaue Orleans in libertie. If you doe not reason to them you haue wronged, the French will doe the goodliest exploit that euer was done in Christendome vnderstand these newes of God, and of the Virgin.

This letter (being deliuered to the Earle of Suffolke) was read with laughter. Charles and his Councell was scorned, as seeking remedies without reason, and transported with following of these vanities. They now assure themselves of a speedy victory, saying that Joan the Virgin, or rather witch.

that Charles is vncertaine what to doe. The Trumpeter is imprisoned against the Law of Nations, ready to be burnt in the sight of the besieged: when as suddenly there was other worke prepared for them. A new supply of victuals is made at Blois, through the care of Renold of Chartres, Chancellor of France, & Archbishop of Rheims, a great personage in his time. The Virgin goes to field for the safe conducting thereof to Orleans, but with a greater troope then before for the fame of her actions, and of his new successe, had drawn together seven or eight thousand men: like vnto a cheerefull spring, which causeth trees being dead in fiew, to sprout and spring againe. The Commanders were not greatly moued with these popular brutes, giuing but cold beleefe to the Virgins visions and promises, so as they passe another way for their greater safety. The Virgin lets them go, forbearing to speake any thing before their coming to Orleans: then she said, You hide your selves from me, as if I were ignorant of your intentions, but you must not doubt of the performance of that which God hath decreed. This was the 20 of April.

Orleans relieved the second time by June.

Orleans being thus fortified both with men and victuals: the Earle of Dunois, and Patheon of Xaintrilles, hold a Councell what was to be done: they call her, and intreat her to deliuer her opinion. My aduise is (saith she) that without any farther delay, we charge the English that besiege vs, for that (God being on our side) they cannot escape vs: but before we proceed, let every man dispose of his conscience, and banish all lewd and naughty persons out of the Army. Although there were small hope or likelihood to vanquish a Conquerour, yet the Commanders resolute to accept and embrace her Councell as an Oracle from God.

The Earle of Dunois made choice of fiftene hundred strong and lusty men for the fight, meaning to begin with the fort at Bourgongne gate, called S. Loup. The virgin goes in the foremost rancke, with the chiefe Captaines of the Army. The souldiers incouraged by her presence, assaile this Fort furiously, being guarded by foure hundred English: neither arrowes, pikes, nor halberds, could stay the planting of their ladders. The Virgin enters the Fort first, crying, Montrei, Saint Denis, the Fort is wonne. The English abandon their defences, and suffer themselves to be slaine by the French, who (seeing themselves Master of the Fort, and wearied with the execution) take many prisoners. The Artillery, and munition being drawne forth, they set fire on the Fort. This chanced the fourth of May, a remarkable day, being the first fruits of the deliuey of Orleans, and the generall restoring of this Realme.

Thus the Virgin returns into the Citie with her victorious souldiers. All the people followed her with cries of victory: she can hardly retire to her lodging: all the world runnes to see her, and to commend her, both men, women, and children: all cry out confusedly with a ioy mixt with teares: Blessed be the Virgin which comes to deliuer vs. On the other side, the English seeing their men carryed away, like chickens before the Eagle, and their Fort consumed as with fire from heaven, were greatly amazed, being in so great possibility to vanquish the French on euery side. Suffolke and Talbot make Orations to their men, to reuiue their spirits, daunted at this new and strange spectacle. But we must proceed, and not suffer the courage of the victorious souldiers to grow cold. The Virgin goes to counsell with the chiefe of the City, causing them to resolute to continue the next day, what they had so happily begunne.

At the breake of day, the virgins colours are carryed through the Citie: she resolves to passe the Riuer, and to take the Forts on the other side. She passeth happily betwixt the Fort of Saint Loup that was ruined, and the new Tower, where she furiously assailes and winnes the Fort called Saint Iohn the White, and cuts all the Souldiers in peeces: from thence she marcheth to the Portreau, where the great Bastion of London was built, vpon the Augustins Church. This place was valiantly disputed throughout the resolutions of both parties, but in the end it was forced. The victory was double, in vanquishing of the enemy, and in deliuey of friends: for there were many French prisoners found therein. There now remained the Tournelles, and the Bastion vpon the Bridge, being the dungeon of their principall defence. The Virgin held this exploit sufficient for that dayes worke, leaving the rest vntill the morrow, to giue the Souldiers breath. So the Fortresse being besieged, they prepare for the last assault.

The next day (being Saturday, the sixt of May) ended this dangerous siege, which had continued seven months. The sharpest Thorne remained yet behind: the Tournelles adioyning

A adioyning to the Bridge, was kept by Glacidas (one of the most resolute Captains among the English) having well incouraged his men to defend themselves, and to fight for their lives.

The skirmish begins at nine of the clocke in the morning, and the ladders are planted. A storme of English Arrowes, falls vpon our men with such violence as they recoil. How now (saith the Virgin) haue we begun so well, to end so ill? let vs charge, they are our owne, seeing God is on our side. So euery one recouering his forces, floods about the Virgin: the English double the storme, vpon the thickest of the troopes. The Virgin fighting in the foremost ranks, and incouraging her men to doe well, was shorthorough the arme with an arrow: She nothing amazed, takes the arrow in one hand, and her sword in the other. This is a fauour (layes she) let vs go on, they cannot escape the hand of God. At this womans voyce, amidst the found of warre, the combat growes very hot. Our men greatly incouraged by this Virgin, runne head-long to the Bastian; and force a point thereof. Then fire and stones raigne so violently, as the English being amazed forsake their defences. Some are slaine vpon the place, some throw themselves down head-long, and flie to the Tower vpon the Bridge. In the end this braue Glacidas abandons this quarter, and retires into the base Court vpon the Bridge, and after him a great troope of his souldiers. The Bridge greatly shaken with Artillery, tryed by fire, and ouer-charged with the weight of this multitude, sinks into the water with a fearefull cry, carrying all this multitude with it.

Many English drowned at Orleans, the bridge broken; king.

Thus the riuer of Loire was a Sepulchre for Glacidas, and all his troope, alwayes accustomed to vanquish, but when they were vanquished. An example of mans vanity, who (drunke with their victories,) cannot conceiue that the rodde of the Iudge of this world may touch them. The English lost in these three dayes skirmishes, about eight thousand men, and we scarce a hundred, the which was Gods handy worke. If the ioy of Orleans were great, and the Virgins honour proclaimed in this happy successe, being proofes of her true fore-tellings; If her triumphs were double; when as passing through the Citie (having her arme honourably hurt) she was inuironed by the Earle of Dunois, Pothon of Xaintrilles, and all the most famous Captaines: the perplexitie of Suffolke, Talbot and Sir John was not lesse, fore-seeing the vnauidable course of their misfortune, if they should obstinately defend the other Forts that were towards Beaulieu, although a good part of their army remained there. So they take counsell from danger to abandon all these Forts, to retire into some place of safety, and to aduertise the Duke of Bedford of their misfortunes.

Orleans freed from the English.

The same night they gather together with great silence, about nine thousand men, and take the way to Baugency. The Orleanois are watchfull, observing their departure, prepare to charge the enemy, but the Virgin would not consent thereunto. And in truth this remainder was appointed for other victories. The inhabitants thus freed; issue early in the morning out of the Citie, they come to the Bastions, where hauing gathered together great store of armes, victuals and baggage, they cast these great monuments of the English labours vnto the ground. They giue solemne thanks vnto God, the Author of so miraculous a deliuey; and to the end this singular benefite might be celebrated yearly; they erect a monument for this memorable successe, King Charles the leuenth armed, and leane the Virgin likewise armed, both kneeling vpon their knees before a Crucifix of brass; kept to this day vpon the Bridge amidst the furies of our late ciuill, or rather vncivil warres. Truly thank-giuing for so excellent a good, is due to God onely; and this memory ought to be religiously consecrated to posterity; as the first fruits of the restoring of this Estate, then halfe dead through the force and might of Strangers.

To confirme this goodly victory, the Virgin parts well accompanied from Orleans, and goes to the King to Chinon, to yeeld him an account of her commission. It cannot be spoken with what ioy this Prince beheld her, and what credit he purchased by this miraculous successe. But My Liege (saith she) this is but a beginning, we must finish the God of Hea- uen works, causing you to be crowned at Rheims; and chasing your enemies out of your State. This is the commendement I haue receiued. And so by her aduise Charles assembled all his forces. The Countesse of Richmond (who neuer durst shew himselfe after the quarrell with Fernand) is now reconciled by the Virgins intercession; and hereafter shal doe very good service to this Crowne. Charles of Bourbon, Earle of Clermont, is now wonderfully distressed, so haue retired himselfe from the battell of Herrings, hauing not honourably assisted affisted in these exploits, in the which he had held the first rancke. But John of Bourdeaux Duke of Alençon arrived happily out of prison from England, (he had been taken in the battell of Vernueil) to be commander of these goodly troopes, which goe resolutely to take possession of the Cities of Champagne, being all then in the possession of the English. Men possit from all parts to this banquet. Their hearts being revived, their countenances change, and their affaires take a new forme. They then make projects, saying: But we left the King prepares for his Coronation at Guyen, and to be neereff his chiefe faires, let vs suppress these English which remaine, after that great defeat of Orleans, and let vs take from them those townes which are neere about. The Earle of Suffolke at Largau: the towne is besieged and taken, all the English are either slaine, or taken prisoners: one of the Earles brethren was slaine in the fight, another of them drowned, and he himselfe was taken upon the Bridge as he was flying away. Meung was taken by Bay of Laual, and seven or eight hundred Englishmen slaine: Baugency yields by composition.

The Duke of Bedford gathers together what forces he can, to preferre the rest of the townes from shipwrecke, sending a troope of foure thousand men to fortifie them. Talon with Thomas Ramseane haue the charge. This troope was presently subiect to our victory, and when as they find that neither men nor townes can hold out for them, they take to retire themselves: but they are encountred at Patay, a small village in Beausse, whither all are slaine or taken, yet our mens fury being past, many are spared, both in the fight, and in prison, that the English might haue a testimony of our mildnesse. The great Talon is taken and brought to Charles, who vseth him with great respect. John Fastoll flies thence, and is therefore degraded by the Duke of Bedford.

This chanced the twelfth of May. We had all the tokens of an absolute victory. The Commanders slaine or taken, the field wonne, an hundred and ten Ensignes brought to our Temples, their Artillery, munition, and all other habiliments of Warre, are taken on: and moreover, the hearts of the King and the French were resolute to end the rebellion. Behold the first fruits: the harvest shall be gathered in time, as the Historiographer shew by degrees. But let vs goe to Rheims, to Crowne Charles according to the Virgin appointment.

The Coronation of CHARLES the Seuenth.

BY this happy successe, the way was made to Rheims, although the Kings Council framed many difficulties to hinder this voyage, as superfluous, and almost impossible: for why, say they, should Charles be Crowned? The Law of State made him to be borne a King, and he was Crowned at Poitiers. But if (to please the people) it must of force be so, where is the meanes to effect this decree? Rheims and all the townes of Champagne, be in other mens possessions. Thus did many discourse. The Virgin answered, We must goe to Rheims to Crowne the King. It is true, the King is the lawfull heire, but his right is called in question by the English, this make deceives many, and makes them disobedient: As for the meanes, leave that to the God of Heauen, hee will provide for it.

This aduice prevailed, as an Oracle: all things are prepared in readinesse for the Coronation. Charles retires to Bourges for this intent, as if the preserver of the Monarchie would mocke his enemies, who called him King of Bourges in jest: for shortly after hee parts from Bourges to be proclaimed King of France. But whilest he attends there, till that all things may be made fit for his journey to Rheims; behold an increase of good newes to crowne his late and happy victory against the English; That the Bourguignon and Sauoyard, who would haue seized upon Dauphine were defeated. The particulars of this discourse is: The Realme being set to sale to strangers, and that every one sought to haue his part: The Dukes of Bourgogne and Sauoy had laid a plot to appropriate unto themselves both Dauphine and Languedoc, with other Provinces that obeyed Charles, vntill this negotiation the help of Louis of Châlons Prince of Orange, a man of valor, and specially in those countries, by reason of his principality which lay neere unto them. The division of this Merchandise was thus made betwixt them: that the Bourguignon had the Viennois, neere vnto Lions, and that which depended on Lions, where Charles had cast his eyes, so make profit of that goodly Citie. Grisard and with Gravelle belike

As sent to Romans, Ambrunois, Capenfois, Brianfonois, and all the Countreies of the Monnois: were the Sauoyards particularly sent, and sent to the Countreies of the

The Orangeois (to charge his principality) had Valentin Dyol and the Batonies, where he held some land vnder the obedience of this Crowne. This portion was allotted him for his parties: They all arme vpon this point, when when the English pressed Orleans. The Batonies of Bourgogne, and Sauoy, contribute to this waite, as to a secret: he goes to the East, or the West Indies: but they had not altered their venture in the East, with an intent to haue all the profit. This lease is made with great shew, the D. of Burgogne lends five hundred Lances vnder the command of the Lord of Valembois. He takes voluntaries, and three thousand foot. The Bourguignon (with his Mothers assistance) a thousand Lances. Many Noble men repaire thither, as to an assured gaine. They were leauied in his territories nine or ten thousand foot. The Prince of Orange assembles a goodly troope, as well of his subjects, as of his friends in Provence, where he had a good portion, and for his beginning, he seizes vpon Baron, a towne vpon the Rhone; a fit passage for Sauoy and Bourgogne: and Colombiers; a Castle of great importance neere Gene. Having brought sixe hundred men thither, he attends the troopes of Bourgogne, and Sauoy, which repaire vnto him daily. He puts forty men at armes into Colombiers for the guard of the place, and keeps the rest of the troopes about him with great security, fearing no enemy, in this generall amazement of the Kings affaires: but the success was contrary to this designe, for Raoul of Gaucourt, Gouverneur of Dauphine, resolved in this extremitie, who (attending no succours from the King, being wisely ingaged, and in great danger,) doth husband such forces as he could gather together within his government, from Lions and Viarez, Countreies that were vnder the French obedience. Imbert of Grosle, Gouverneur of Lions, and Marshall of Dauphine, John de Louis, Baron of la Voue, the Lords of Ioyeuse, Turnon and Crusol (great men in the Countrey of Viarez) did their best deuoir, the Nobility of Dauphine (renowned awayes for their fidelitie and valour) assisted as much as could be desired in so great a necessity. The Baron of Mabec is noted above the rest for his well deservings. Don Rodrigo de Villandras a Castilian was there with a goodly and valiant troope.

The Lord of Gaucourt resolves to charge the Prince of Orange with this troope, giuing him no leisure to assemble the body of this army, the which increased daily. So (without any further delay) he besiegeth Colombiers, and takes it by force, before the Orangeois had any intelligence of his approach. Having this good successe, hee would giue the citie some time to take breath, but desirous to make his profit of this happy beginning, hee parts suddenly with these resolute troopes to draw the Prince of Orange to fight: who was then parted from Enton, having intelligence only of the siege, but not of the taking of Colombiers, beleueing confidently, that the very brute of his forces would make our men to hide themselves: but hee was deceived. Hee had foure thousand men with him, and Gaucourt had about two thousand, yet (notwithstanding his small number) being nothing amazed, hee charged and defeats them. The needesse of Enton saues many. There were five hundred slaine vpon the place, and two hundred of the brauest soldiers taken prisoners. The Prince of Orange hauing recouered Enton, passeth the Rhone in a Boate, and saues himselfe. The common report is that he passeth this violent streame on horse-backe all armed. The people of that countrey doe beleue it from Father to Sonne, that this horse was kept and dyed at Orange, hauing a long time bene nourished there by the Princes commandement, acknowledging the seruice he had recieued of this Beast in his extreame necessity. Monfret saith, That he parted in great disorder, and was chased euen vnto Authun. Alain Charretier, Secretary to our King Charles, writes in expresse words, That hee passed the Rhone at the Ferry of Enton. Hee fies downe that the booty was about a hundred thousand Crownes, besides many notable prisoners of Bourgogne and Sauoy, which came to be spoiled, thinking to doe the like to our Charles.

This defeat hapned the twentieth day of May, the same day that the English (which retired from Orleans) were defeated at Patay. To credit the work, against such as made their account alone without God, who seeking to raish another mans goods vniuilly, lost their owne deserviedly. Thus God workes speedily, as may appeare by the course of so many happy exploits, iunkt one to another in this moneth of May, as a prediction of the restoring of the estate in this Realme. The Bourguignons and the Savoyards designe being pointed by this defeat, Gaucourt resolves to have this private revenge of the French, being the father of this bloody traffick. To conclude, without giving him any time to parley, the King with his victorious forces, and takes many places from him, which he lacks and loses. But not engaging himselfe farther in the French Game (which of Charles have many goodly places) he came to Oranges his chiefe to which he carries the name, as several Cities. He took both towne and Castle, and all the held in Dauphine under the Kings obedience, yet the Citizens of Oranges would be affected to their Prince within few months after chace the French out of the Castle, become masters thereof, for the service of their prince, to whom they yielded in the end of this enterprise, shamefull for the Authors, and shamefully prejudiciall to the instrument.

Amadeus Duke of Savoy (fallen from to visible a hope, so fast in a troubled way, seeing on the other side the happy success of Charles) he grows so much discontented, his whole discourse is to abandon the world, but hereafter we shall see his actions. At some he returns in the mid-way, without chiding of anything. Our Bourguignons higher pitch, and had more then one deluge in his head. Bueller is now crowned King to Bourges. The preparations for this Coronation were tall and very dangerous, after so great affliction, but above all it was beautified with great performances. The present, John of Bourbon Duke of Alanson, Charles of Bourbon Earle of Clermont, and of the blood (who had faithfully and profitably accompanied the King in his afflictions), Arthur of Britan Earle of Richmond, Constable of France, Charles of Anjou to the King of Sicilia, and brother to the Queen.

The Earle of Dunois, barbard of Orleans, Charles of Albrat Earle of Perdicat, a younger brother of the noble house of Armagnac, the Lord of Cullant, Admirall of France, four Marshalls of France, the Lords of Bouffac, Loheac, Rieux and Faerret. The Earle of Tremouille, Laual, Chaugny, Chaumont, Lamesan, d' Aulin, Serrant, Crufol, Chapmont, and many others, with Pethon, la Hire and the virgin, excellent peeces of triumph. Many could not come in time to this Solemnity: great troopes came from all parts, notwithstanding the danger of the enemy, which was great in divers places. Such was the desire of the French to assist at this wished aft, loyalty remained their breasts, as the seed doth in the bosome of the earth during winter. But Charles before he parted from Bourges to Rheims provided for the publike safety, lest the English should attempt any thing during this solemnity. He sends his Constable into Normandy, and the Earle of Perdicat into Guienne with some troopes, and reserves ten thousand men for his Coronation, as well to make his passage through townes that should refuse to honour the Ceremony. A very doubtfull journey yet most happy.

At Auxerre, Charles is crowned King.

Thus he begins his voyage: The first cite that was summoned by his commandment was Auxerre: they excuse themselves by reason of the truce lately obtained by the English intercession. A presumption very prejudiciall in the example, even now in the trial of obedience, vpon this same of victory, whereof none could make any question without apparant danger. Every man did see this error, but no man durst open mouth, for that the King did countenance Tremouille, even with the prejudice of his fautes. So Charles entred not into Auxerre, he only tooke their words, that at his request they should do as the rest, and furnish the Kings army with victuals for their money. From Auxerre the King comes to S. Florentin, which yeelds without any question. Troies was summoned next: at the first they refused, like unto Auxerre, through the practices of such as were of the English faction: but as Charles prepared for the siege, behold a warlike troope of the choice Citizens assembled themselves, assure the Citie, and give the King to understand, that they are ready to receive his commandments, and without expecting any answer from the King, a goodly company goes forth to meet him, and do offer him obedience. Charles then enters into Troies, to the unspeakable ioy of all the people, being wonderfully glad to see their Princes face, after so long captivitie. Charles follows their example, and all the rest of the townes, with great alacrity and willingness.

But the chief combat must be at Rheims, the chiefe Rendezvous of this voyage. The Lords of Chailillon and Sauczeu, with their Partizans of the English faction, did what they could to hinder the Kings entry. But the good Citizens prevail, who being stronger then the English faction, could hardly keepe the people fast tearing them in peeces, being leathery to shed any blood. They agree and sweare by common consent, to obey the Kings laws, and to that end send him the Keyes of Rheims. The way being thus made, and the Gates of Rheims open, hee goes thither with the beauty of his Court, and is received with the unspeakable ioy of all the people, who come to meete him in great troopes, the fields gates and streets sound out; God save the King. Charles accompanied with his Princes and Officers, appears like a goodly Sunne after a sharpe Winter. But in the greatness of this triumph, Joan the Virgin is beheld with admiration, and ledeth with a golden chariot.

Two days being spent in the preparation of the Ceremony, Charles was anointed and crowned King the eighth day of July, in the year 1429, by Renold of Chastres, Archbishop of Raciens, Chancelor of France: a date to be observed; being the beginning of great good to this realme. This was the seventh year after the law of State had called Charles to the Crowne, whereof he was heire, but the violence of strangers restrained and withheld the French from their obedience. So this Coronation was added to confirm the generall approbation of this lawful authority, not only in their common belief, but in the tongues of the French, as the sequell will shew, that this solemne publication did greatly advance the Kings affaires against his capital enemy.

But as the Sunne, rising higher in his Horizon, increaseth both in brightnesse and beauty, so the beames of the French liberty were more apparant, and the subdill devices of their naturall Prince kindled daily, after the long and sharpe Winter of the English shadow. This was a reuniting both to their heares, State, and manners: the image of a long age after the horrible tempest of a long and mortall confusion. The French did begin to see their King, and the King to receive them with a fatherly love. The Kings commandments generally proclaimed to live modestly without oppression of the people, were freely executed, and the people made the best chere they could to please their King. The English, altho the Provinces taking a new resolution to submit themselves under the obedience of their naturall Prince, as the sequell of the History will shew. But before we engage our selves in so long a discourse, order doth command us to observe the state of the Church and Empire; having past it over in silence, since the year 1264, towards the end of the reign of Charles the fifth. Doubtless we were sufficiently troubled with our owne confusions, under the miserable reign of Charles the sixth, finishing our selves in foraine stormes. We are therefore briefly to note, according to what hath happened since fifty nine years in these two great bodys.

We have left the Empire in the hands of Charles the fourth, an excellent Prince, but exceeding more in law and valour, then in iustice and vertue; yet he vied the Council of Archie, an excellent Lawyer, having governed the publike affaires of Germany & Italy, twenty and six years, amidst many confusions, and in the end he purchased the Empire with the prejudice of the Empire. His sonne Wenceslaus, whom hee had caused to be crowned King of Hungary, and Bohemia, at the age of two years, having bought the Empire from him, he caused him to be installed, and lived two years after, dying in the year 1378, having left a wretched successor of so great and royall a dignity, deformed in minde and body, a dole, idle, voluptuous, and a coward; having no other care but to wallow in the most infamous vices and finnes of drunkenness and whoredome; nor to shunne, but to doe tuill and mischief; as malicious and cruell, as without valour and wits. So, concerning his affaires and businesse, he grew contemptible: in hating of his subjects, he grew so hatefull, as in the end, the Germans and Hungarians (being weary of such a soveraigne) took him prisoner: and at last, after a painfull and shamefull patience, they having suffered him two and twenty years, and a huge masse of diuers and sundry cruelties, which grew by his ill and wicked government, they deprive him of the Imperiall dignity, by a common consent. And yet to shew, they bare no malice to the house from whence he was descended, they choose in his place John, Marquis of Brandenburg, and started the sonne of John Henry, brother to Charles the fourth, and his cousin german to Wenceslaus, who lived in that state but sixe months; and had nothing of the Empire, but that he was buried with the Imperiall ornaments of that Country.

Then Robert, Count Palatine, duke of Bavaria, & first Elector, was chosen Emperor, and much much controuersie and dissention, a man of small stature, but of great iudgement, valiant, and louing the Common-weale. Hee laboured and spent great paines to redresse the confusions of Italy, then exceedingly disorder'd; through the queuelles of the Duke of Milan, the Venetians, Florentines, French, and Arragonais, vpon diuers and dry occasions: but finding that whatsoever he could doe, he lost his labour, (for the disloyalty of such as employed him) he suffered them to rume and spoile him, and then retired himselfe home, where after he had happily governed the Empire ten yeares, he dyed in the year of our Lord 1410.

The estate of the Church.

Sigismund King of Hungary and Bohemia, a Prince of happy memory, succeeded his father, by the generall consent of all the Germans, who loued and honoured him, and although he fought against the Turke with ill success, what as he borrowed from Charles the sixth (as I haue said) yet his losses did nothing blemish his reputation, his virtues, whereof he gaue great proofe in the gouernment of the Empire. But his death troubled him most, was the state of the Church, then plunged in tragical confusions, by the long and scandalous Schisme which dismembred it by peece-meales, through dissention and controuersies of sundry Popes, which were chosen in diuers places, and that diuertly at one instant.

A horrible Schisme.

Order commands vs now to represent it, as carefully as the subject is of importance, to tremble to tip vp these shamefull and detestable wounds. I will endeavour to expresse plainly and sincerely, following the steps of Platina, Nanceler, and Theodore of Niem, hauing remained in the Court of Rome, Secretary to diuers Popes, one after another, managed the affaires from the beginning of the Schisme, neere vnto the end, and was held for a vnreproachable witness in that which hee hath scene. This Schisme continued fifty yeares: it banded all the Christians of Europe, diuided Kings and Princes, moued their diuisions, bred and brought forth horrible scandals, toucht their heares, opened their mowthes and dispensed with their hands to a new faction, refused to our late Pope, the Popes seated in Rome one after another, had every one his opposit in Auignon, a famous name of title, and in the profession of the same authority. These Popes at one time in three seuerall places. Foure Councils were called to remedy these confusions, generally desir'd of all men, both great and small, seeing the Pope (who had so long reigned with the Emperours, vntill they had chased them out of Italy) continued among themselves: and this was the cause of the Schisme.

The estate of this Schisme.

We haue said, that the vnfortunate successe of the voluntary quarrell moued by the late eighth, against King Philip the faire, ministred occasion to transport the Pontifical sea from Rome to Auignon, where hauing been usually resident 74 yeares, and then chosen out of the French Nation, Gregory the tenth a Limosin, grew desirous to goe to Rome, and to transport his Colledge thither, consisting for the most part of French Cardinals. After his death, (being to choose a new Pope) the Clergy and people of Rome being vnited, protest vnto the Colledge, that they will haue a Roman or an Italian, not a French-man. If they doe it not willingly, they threaten force. The French are angry, gather in the Conclau, being thirteene against foure. But what could they doe against the multitude armed with fury? To conuince this storme, the French and Italian Cardinals agree to name an Italian Pope, with whom the Pontificall dignity should be left in guard, vntill they might choose one by a free election of the whole Colledge.

They all consent to choose Bartolomew of Naples, Archbishop of Bary in Aquila, esteemed a learned man, graue, and modest. The reputation of his vertues made him proceed to confirme him in the election: so as all by a generall consent, (especially Pau de la Lune, and the Cardinal of Saint Agreue in Viunex) crowne and adore him, for a final conclusion of his Popedom, assuring themselves that he would continue vertuous, as he had formerly began vertuously. But honours change manners. Two dayes with scarce past after this solemne reception, but this Bartolomew, (who shall now be John the sixth, in changing his degree and name) did also change his humours and manner of life. He which was accustomed to humble himselfe to all men, doth now braue all them which had newly raised him to this dignity. He threatens to keepe them vnder, and checks them with reproachfull words. Otho Duke of Brunswick (husband to Jane Queene of Sicily and Naples,) comes to congratulate his election, and for a proofe of his great heart, (as John called for Wine) Otho takes the Cup from his Taster, and leaping before the Pope presents it vnto him. Urban takes it, leaping him on his knee with a frowning countenance, without speaking any thing. This insupportable arrogancy displeased the whole Colledge, but especially Queene Jane, (holding this disgrace done to her selfe) and made Urban so odious; as they all resolved to depose him, and to choose another Pope: whereunto Jane doth promise her assistance. They all joyntly resolve to retire themselves quietly out of Rome, into some place of liberty. So vnto Colours to auoid the heat of Summer, they take their leaues to goe to Anagnin: where hauing sojourned some weeke, they goe to Fundy, a Citie in the Kingdome of Naples, a fit place to enjoy their liberties vnder the Queenes protection. Then began they to plant their battery against Urban. They set downe for the ground of their right, that the condition specified in the election of Urban, should be auailable to those that did choose him, to declare him incapable of the dignity whereof hee shewed himselfe unworthy: and (to obserue all formalities) they cite Urban before them, and write vnto the other Italian Cardinals, that their meaning is, to name an Italian: A meanes to draw them to increase their number.

Pope Urban deposted and Clement chosen.

Being assembled; they depose Urban by the pluralitie of voyces, and being to choose another, as the same instant they aduance Cardinal Rupert of the noble house of the Bishops of Cistercia, and call him Clement the seventh. This bred a great alteration both at Rome, and in Urban's minde: for Rome is presently abandoned, and Urban so amazed as he knows not what to do. Behold two Popes in one chaire, which is too little for them both, seeing the world will not suffice them: for in choosing Clement, they found no more clemency, then Urban's civill conseruation in Urban. Clement yeelding nothing to the desire of his competitor: an ambitious man, willful, audacious, sumptuous and poore, having nothing rich but the heart, puff'd vp with the greatnesse of his house. These two do much, especially Urban, whose name the people changed, and for Urban they called him Gerard: that is a troubler of the world, to note his barbarous and fierce nature, being a combat and confusion.

Clement's disposition.

And thus which made away to this mischief, Kings and Princes (who should haue employed their authorities to quench this fire) were nothing affected therunto: for the Emperor Charles the fourth, died soone after the breeding of this Schisme, leaving an insufficient successour. France and England were too farre engaged to determine their own quarrell by the sword. As for the particular of France, during the imprisonment of John, the infirmity of Charles the sixth, and the halfe shipwracke of Charles the seventh, what helpe could the French bring to these confusions, being almost drowned in their owne? In the beginning Clement had all aduantages ouer Urban. The authority of the ordinary and ancient Colledge, Canonically chosen, followed by the Court of Rome, and the Castle Saint Angelo, by the which he might enter the City. All the French, the greatest part of the Italians, many Germans, all the Spaniards and English which were at Rome, repaired vnto him, and consequently all these Nations followed him. France, Spaine, England, with a part of Germany and Italy. There remained the Hungarians, and some Germans, who for feare of the affaires at Naples (not daring to trust themselves in Anagnin) were forced to continue in Rome, a leuaine which shall soone cause great diuisions. Urban as much daunted in aduersitie, as hee was puff'd vp in prosperitie, humbles himselfe to all men: hee weepes and deplores his misery, and craues aide of euery man, promising all fauour if they did helpe to restore him. There is neither Hungarian, German, nor Italian, which belong vnto the Court, but hee flies vnto him. By their aduice and direction, hee flies to the Emperor Charles the fourth, and to Lewis King of Hungary, intreating them to be mediators to the Colledge of Cardinals, who were discontented with him. But Clement (growne over-proud with this first successe) gaue him meanes to repaire his estate. He hath a designe to surprize Rome by the Castle: but as Bernard Casal, with a troope of Neapolitans would haue seized vpon one of Rome Gates, hee was valiantly repulsed by the Inhabitants.

The Emperor Charles the fourth, and Lewis King of Hungary, sent their Ambassadors to Clement and to the Colledge of Cardinals, to treat an accord. Clement vseth them without clemency, he checks them; puts them in prison; and in the end sends them away with many indignities. This affront moued Charles and Lewis, so as by their meanes both Germany, Hungary, Poland, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, and Prussie, were all affected to Urban's faction. Charles was a spectator of this first Scène, and dyed 3 months after, leaving upon the Stage dangerous Actors against Clement. Urban being thus fortified, grew high-minded, and for a mark of his authority, he created a new College of six and twenty Cardinals, all created in one day, being Italians, Germans, Hungarians, Poles, and other Nations that favoured him, to have a support of this authority in all parts. Clement works likewise, & to have his revenge, (for that he could not seize upon a game Rome) he resolved to send an army to field, to vex the Romans, and to force them to obedience; but the success of this designe was not answerable to his desire, for having sent the Lord of Montreux his Nephew with goodly troops furnished by Queene Joane, the Romans, led by Alberic of Barbiane, defeated this army, and tooke Montreux prisoner, whom they beheaded, as a disturber of the publick quiet, and so they chase the French out of the Castle Saint Angelo.

Clement finding himselfe nothing safe at Fundy, meanes to retire to Naples, but the Neapolitans would not receive him, notwithstanding the Queenes persuasions; and he passeth to Avignon, whither he brings the Pontificall sea, for the second time; and the first had done at the first. It was in the year 1384, that the Pope second time planted in Avignon, five yeares after that Gregory had retired himselfe. Clement frustrates all hope of his return to Rome, faints not in these first difficulties, finding himselfe in want of safety, where he might command at pleasure, being proud by nature, by reason of great birth, and by his forces united in two great Kingdomes. So every one armed sharpe incounter, according to the forces they could raise. First, either of these practices of excommunication. Clement the seventh cites Urban before him as a College of Cardinals canonically chosen, with his Cardinals unawaresly elected by who had beene depofed from the charge which had been given him but to keep, saying all that he had done, or should doe, to be of no force. Urban, on the other side, counters Clement with the like excommunications. Hee declares him Antipope, a Schismaticke, and an Hereticke, and all them that should follow him; guilty of high Treason against God and man. Their goods, honour, lives, bodies, and soules consigned.

This first point performed, they come to the effects. Clement makes search through all the Territories of his obedience, for those of Urban's faction, whom he imprisons, detennes, and kills with sword, fire, and water: many are strangled, massacred, drowned, burnt with extreme cruelty. Urban shall doe no better, but he proceeds by degrees, makes his peace with the Florentines, Perusins, Milanois, and Genevois: the Venetians ly he could not win. The Emperor Charles the fourth being dead, he could not promise much with Wenceslaus, an unworthy Prince; but he made his profit of Lewis King of Hungary, a capital enemy to Joane Queene of Naples, the foweraine object of Urban's anger, whom he fought to ruine, as the sole motive of all his crosses. But amidst the disorders of these confused passions, the diuers effects of Gods providence are remarkable, who draws light from darkness, and order from disorder, in such sort, as it is most commonly unknowne to man, but always iust and admirable in his iust effects.

Urban (presuming that the force of Hungary would fortifie his proceedings) doth communicate Joane Queene of Naples, declares her incapable of the Crowne, & calls Charles of Durazzo, of whom we have made mention. But who sees not, that this belongs properly to the history of Naples, whereof we intreat accidentally, matters being tied together by a necessary union. In the end Joane lost both goods and life, through the power of Charles of Durazzo, who remained absolute master of the Realme of Naples, by the death of Lewis of Anjou, whom he had adopted, but Lewis thinking to revenge her death, lost his owne life, and drew France into great miseries, whereof this unreasonable adoption was the leuaine. Behold the end of the first Joane Queene of Naples, who shall be soon followed with a second Joane, to continue our voluntary languishing in Italy.

But the end of this Proserpina was the beginning of a second trouble, through the ambition of Urban, the which having no limits, transported his spleene against Charles of Durazzo, whom he had drawne out of Hungary. He is not satisfied that Charles should doe him homage, but he will have some places in his absolute power, and that Charles should inuest his Nephew Battilo (a man of no estimation, having nothing rare in him but his extraordinary vices) in the principallitie of Apulia, and the Duchy of Durazzo, seeking to get so firme footing in the State, as he might dispossesse Charles at his pleasure.

DURAZZO, being loath to labour for another man, excuseth himselfe to Urban, who takes no excuse for payment, but citeth him before his Consistory, the meaning, that if hee appears not at the day prefixed, he will proceede against him by excommunication. Charles who feared more the losse of his new purchase, then the lightnings of Urban, makes him unawares a prisoner, having placed many souldiers about him for his guard. Urban seeing himselfe braued by Charles, even within Naples, complains of this affront, and by his suffrance, he retires to Nocera, from whence he sends excommunications against Charles, who laying aside all respect, opposeth a goodly army, and comes to besiege Urban with Ensignes displayed in Nocera. He sends a trumpet to advertise him that he was come according to his assignment. In the meane time he takes information of Urban's abuses (being known and detested of all the world) and moreover he tryed the opinions of the Cardinals, to censure and depose Urban: who being advertised hereof, was so moved, as (not able to be revenged of Charles), he imprisons 7 Cardinals (the most sufficient of his College) without any other iust matter to charge them with, but that they were the learned, eldest and of greatest courage; and to make tryall of his forces, he sends his nephew Battilo against him with a troupe, which this great Captaine suffered to be overthrowne, and himselfe to be taken. This success daunted the courage of Urban, and enforced him to crave leave of Charles to retire himselfe: the which he easily obtained, by the intercession of the Seignourie of Genoa whither Urban pretended to goe. Departing from Nocera, he detenus him these Cardinals prisoners, and desirous to be rid of them, hee caused one to be slain upon the way, pretending that he was sicke, and abandoned his body: he caused the others to be bound up in sacks, and to be cast into the sea, as he passed to Genoa. Being thus, he commanded three others to be apprehended (being zealous that they had intelligence with the rest) and in the presence of all the people, hee caused them to be knocked on the head; and then he dries their bodies in an Oven, and preferred them in chests, the which he caused to be caried before him upon mules, when as he did ride; and for a mark what they were, he set their red hats upon the chests. The original notes this extraordinary cruelty in Robert Urban.

And then Charles dies in Hungary, but Urban's spleene continues against his children. He had first two; Ladislav & Joane, who by the vertuous protection of their mother Margaret kept both themselves and their estates out of his hands. Urban sleeps neither day nor night, thirsting continually after their ruine. And for theache found by Charles, that the Hungarians feared not his spirituall lightning; he grounds his designes vpon temporall anger, and knowing they are not to be raised without money, hee seeks the meanes to stamp great masses. To this end he ordaines a lubble, as a solemn feast for all Christendome, and to draw more people thereunto, he sends new indulgences and pardons into all parts vnder his obedience. A denice to get monny, the people being perfwaded by his denice that it was the onely meanes to purchase Paradise, and to avoide the paines of Purgatory. He also challengeth the right of first fruits, which gives the first yeeres reuenues of all benefices to the Pope, and so continues vnto this day.

But as he gathers together this money with a wonderfull greedinesse, behold hee falls from his moile and bruisheth himselfe. The worke of heauen, answerable to his insolent ambition, who soaring too high, makes him fall low: dying when his hatred was greatest to raise his enemies. He languished seven and twenty dayes in the bed of death, dying by degrees, suffering the paines which hee caused his peere Cardinals to endure: not able without his death, to wipe out the immortal hate of his detestable life, disgraced by all Writers. Thus Urban the sixth, the first guidon of Schisme, dyed in the eleventh yeare of his Popedom. In whose place Peter Thomace, named Boniface the ninth, is chosen Pope, succeding to Urban's courtousnesse, as his life and death doth witness. Niemo obserues a memorable act. Boniface lying at the point of death, some one (to comfort him) said that hee should doe well. A brutish custome, as if to speake of death to a sicke body, were to proclaim the sentence of a Iudge, to deliver him into the executioners hands. I should doe well (saith he) if I had money, and yet he had full houises, having then but ten houres to live. So hee dyed the tenth yeere of his Popedom, not lamented to any, but hee liued too long, and by his impudent courtousnesse opened the gate to all impunity of sinne.

Innocent the seventh, succeeded in the place of Boniface, more innocent then the former, veiling the beauty of their names by the bounty of their lives. A sworn enemy to the union of the Church, causing two Roman citizens to be put to death as seditions, for that they moved him therein, as Platina doth observe. He continued but two years and into his place Angelo Corrier a Venecian, called Gregory the 12 was advanced: a subtil and dissembling man, coldly ambitious, and faintly holy, having no piety but in show so far as his crooked manners he was called Errorius for Gregorius, that is to say, a Deceiver, drawing men into error with his goodly shew. All this was done at Rome by theilians: in the meane time what doe our Popes at Avignon? Clement the 7 making profession of the same authority which the Pope did at Rome, was no better then the other, though the History notes not so many priuate acts of his excess. In general, he was excellent in the beginning and courteous during all the time of his Popedom. He was cunning, ambitious and wilfull, vnder colour of modesty and humility. Hee furnished him but two years. After the death of Clement the 7, they create a new Pope, to oppose against him at Rome, which was Peter de la Luna, a Spaniard borne, but having lived long at Montpellier to study the Law. A man of sound judgement, learning, active, patient in shew, but in effect very ambitious, a dissembler, given to his owne will, and tyed to his profit: hee was from cruelty (whereof hee is not taxed) giving free scope to couetousnesse. Gregory was the impudency of merchandise in the Church, (sayes Niem, and Platina) for to shew of all Christendome, that the authority of the keyes and Apostolicke letters, were contrary to the whole world. Truly as all diseases grow by degrees through turke taken vnderly, and bad humors which creepe insensibly into the body: euen so these miseries grew in the Church. All was set to sale, all sorts of benefices, especially Cardinals houses, were for sale, that would giue most. The reuenues, impropriations, and all things else, were sold to that offered most. Sometimes one benefice was sold to many, and all their monies were to good hands, that had learned to receive and not to restore againe. The companies for all sorts of crimes, & whole townes were sold by the authority of the fourteenth flor. I write but a part of that which the Popes Secretaries haue set downe at length, to tremble to report the iudgement they make of these abominable confusions.

To conclude, all Christendome (tyred with these disorders committed by such, and the authority to order) complained much to their Kings and Princes, who without indresse, exhorted the Popes of both seas, Gregory the twelfth, and Benedict the thirteenth, to leave their priuate quarrels, for the general good of the Church. Benedict shewes to desire it: That if he must needs yield, he is ready to leave the dignitie where the Church had honoured him, yea, his owne life (these are his very words) for the peace of the Church. Gregory speaks more coldly, yet he promises the like: but when it came to performance, they were but shifts, delays, and other deuises to winne time, and to still their authority, which neither of them would leaue.

In the end, at the great instance of Kings and Princes, the Colledges of Rome and Avignon agree to meet at Pisa, to find some means to determine of this reproachfull confusion. Benedict yields: but Gregory opposeth. Notwithstanding his refusal, all meet at Pisa. Thus all assembled (whither the Emperor, the Kings of France, England, Spaine, Scotland, Portugall, Hungary, Denmarke, Sweden, Pologne and Norwage, send their Ambassadors, and the Churches of the East their Deputies) having debated the Communion depending betwixt Gregory and Benedict, they depose them both, as nourishing a schisme in the Church, and refusing to obey the Councell, whereas neither they nor their Deputies had appeared. In their place they choose Alexander the fifth a Candior, held more learned and vertuous, but he dyed within the first yeere of his Popedom. So as the Colledge of Cardinals (retiring to Bologna) created John the 23 in his place.

But neither Gregory nor Benedict omitted any thing of their traine, forming the Council of the Councell. So as for one Pope, they had three, the one at Rimini, the other at Bologna, and the third at Avignon: and the last being worse then the first, shall giue a reasonable good cause of further inquiry to Christian Princes in another season, the which we will attend by order of the History, and will returne into France, to our Charles the seventh, in the ioy of his Coronation, which was to him & to all his subjects a happy foretelling of the restoring of his realme, but this excellent worke was not so soon ended.

We must now see by what degrees Charles recovered the possession of the townes subdued by the English, and how he expelled them out of this realme. The second parcell is set downe by vs in the front of this discourse.

By what means and degrees, the townes subdued by the English, returned to the obedience of this Crowne, and how the English were chased out of this Realme.

From the yeare 1429 to 1454. after the ebbing and flowing of many aditions, and the accord of the Duke of Bourgonie with Charles, long debated, and in the end obtained by the means of the Duke of Bourbon. Paris yields to the King. The other Cities and Provinces of this Realme, one after another, in diuers seasons, and by diuers occasions, returne to the King, as to their head: and expell the stranger, who held the State.

To the reduction of Paris are 7 yeares, to the full restoring of the Realme 183 and in all 25 yeares after his Coronation.

This happy beginning of the Kings affaires, seemed to bring with it a generall restoring of his whole Realme, by the absolute obedience of all Townes and Provinces. But God which gouernes Nature by seasons, and giues not harvest when as they sow the seed, he doth likewise gouerne the society of mankind by degrees, that the force of mans industry, of it selfe, may appeare vaine and nothing, and not successefull but by his grace, without whom man can doe nothing. We haue hitherto seene into what distresse the presence of this Estate hath drawne both the King and Realme: but in the end his promise shall appeare no lesse admirable in preteruing it.

The Duke of Bedford wonderfully discontented with his happy successe, resolves to stop the course, both by force and policy. To this end hee sends to England for succours both of men and money: he equips all he can in France, and practiseth with the Duke of Bourgonie, who was held of both parties to haue power to strike the last stroke in this equality of affaires. So as finding himselfe fought vnto by them all, hee caueraines himselfe, giuing Charles secretly to vnderstand, that hee was for him, and yet hee presently takes armes for the English. A man wholly addicted to his affaires, having no other respect but his owne greauesse, yet still hee doth no wonder, being now so much fought vnto.

Charles passeth from Rheims, to obferue his enemies way, he passeth by Soissons, Châlons, Thiers, Bourgonie, Couffy in Bry, and comes to Crecy in Valois, all these townes being of the English yoke to obey him. Bedford was at Senlis, with an army of ten thousand men, from thence he writes Letters of defiance to Charles, as to the victor of the Realme. He represents vnto him as huge, the compassion he had of the poore French people, so long oppressed with warre, and doth challenge him to appoint a day and place, to end this long misery, either by a peace or battell. A part ill acted by a stranger, for who could beleue these protestations, in the mouth of a stranger, against the heire of the Crowne?

Charles answers him by effects, and offers himselfe to the combat: the English Army before Senlis, being lodged in that renowned Temple of Victory, the ancient habitation of the valour of Philip Augustus. The French army was opposite against them without hedge or bush, in a large plaine. The King the 29th of Iulie, whether he should give battell. The Virgin held opinion they should not, and shee happy beginning upon a doubtful combat, being sufficient to stay the army, in showing him the army, without fighting. So as these two armies stood two dayes together in battell, looking vpon another without moving, although many skirmishes seemed to offer occasion to giue them a generall fight. In the end there was a confused charge of some few horse, Picards and French, but the battels stood firme. After this contention, and fall vnto his way to Paris, to auoide the alterations which the Kings approach and vnder the night breed: Charles having received the obediency of Champagne, Senlis, Orléans, Bourgois, Pont Saint Maxence, Choyss, Gournay, Reims, Nouaille, Mognay, Chantilly, and other places thereabouts with the townes of the Signeuries of Montmorency and Monty, he marcheth towards Paris, upon the assistance by the Bourgeois, who were returned by the Citizens. Being at Saint Denis, hee sent word to Bedford to come within the City, but also the City well guarded by the Citizens, so as the Virgin seeking to surprize Saint Honories ditch, had like to have bene taken, being fore wounded, and losing a goodly troope of her best and most resolute souldiers. The inconsiderate desire which Charles had to winne the loue of the Duke of Bourgogne, did much preiudice his affaires, for all Picardy held him in great esteeme, especially the great townes of Amiens, Abbeville, and Saint Quintin: but the respect he bare the Bourgogne, made him to neglect these occasions to his great hurt. Having therefore found this passage to be very perillous, he retires into Berry, and the duke of Bedford (freed from the feare of his forces) goes into Normandy, where the Constable Richmond had surprized Eureux, Aumale, Chasteaugailiard, and Andely, places of importance in the Prouince.

The institution of the Golden Fleece.

But during these alterations, the duke of Bourgogne married with Isabel, daughter to the King of Portugall, adding this third wife to his two former deceased. The Duchesse of Bedford was at this marriage, not in regard of the feast, but for her husbands affaires. The Bourgignon conducts her to Paris with foure thousand armed men, where he renews the League more strongly, (somewhat shaken through the affaires of Iaqueline Countesse of Hainault) with his brother in law. There he made the order of the Golden Fleece, which he had already conquered the Gardens of Hesperides, like a second Iason: but he determined to make violent warre against Charles the yearre following: and returning into Picardy, he tooke Gournay and Choisy, places lately subdued to the Crowne. Meauvais, Sens, and Villeneuve le Roy, gave a happy beginning to this yearre, yielding to the obedience, but the losse of the Virgin Isabel, and the taking of Phon, two of the greatest and most valiant heads of the Army, quailed all the joy of these conquests. The Tragedy was thus acted.

Isabel the Virgin taken.

The Bourgignon having taken Choisy by force, hee bites Soissons of the Capote that commanded: and so he marcheth against Champagne with his Army, with the Earles of Suffolke and Arondel ioyne, with two thousand men. The Virgin Isabel forth with a notable troope of the best souldiers, to charge the besiegers, who being farre engaged in the fight alone, was taken by the Bastard of Vendosme, and presented to the duke of Bourgogne. He reioyced much at this notable prize, as he conquered all Charles: his good fortunes, and referres her as a triumph for the Duke of Bedford, whose proceedings we will now set downe.

In the yearre 1430, the siege of Compaigne.

Phon was then taken vnadvisedly. The Archbishop of Rheims being Charles with the Lords of Saint Seuer and Boullac, Marshalls of France, being at Meauvais, hold a young shepheard comes vnto them, assuring them, that God had revealed vnto him a meane to take Rouen. They (taking the vankie of this foole for profane painting) God had raised vpon new Oracle, in the declining of the other, by the surprize of the Virgin Isabel inconsiderately, singing a triumph before the victory. The English (advised of their departure and numbers) meet and surprize them, at Nully nere vnto Beaulieu, when as they looked least for them, finding the like men newly dislodged, without or feare, and ouercame them easily. Phon striuing to make head with a Squadron of twenty Lances, presteth so farr in among the enemies, as he is taken: and by himself, whom he had taken at the battell of Patay, and so well intreated, as Isabel him in good requitall, for having embraced him as a brother, he honorably gave him liberty, and sent him in safety to Meauvais. Thus honestly and humanly repaid his liberty, and a good turne is neuer lost among men of honour. An example for the manage of times honourably, in whom there is nothing more vnworthy then cruelty, daily against the weaknesse of a prisoner. Cruelty is fitter for theues and Cannibals, whom they call Anthropophages, or eaters of men: but courtesie becomes good knights, who are twice Conquerors, winning their hearts by courtesie, whose bodies had conquered by force.

The Virgin brought to Rouen.

That Virgin Isabel was not so well intreated by the duke of Bedford, who having bought her for ready money, of John of Luxembourg, as the best prisoner of the army, he came to be brought to Rouen, being resolved to put her to death. The honour of the last armes, and the consequence which made all them guilty, which should hereafter befall by the French, did contradict his will: but the vnuly passion of his deadly hatred conceived against this maiden (as hauid ruined his affaires in France) prevailed above reason. And having no colour to put her to death, as a prisoner of the warre, he resolved to make her a prisoner of Iustice: but the Magistrates would not heare of it. Upon their refusal, he hath recourse to the Diuines. And as the Oracle Apollis spake, according vnto the money that was giuen, sometimes for Philip of Macedon, sometimes for the Athenians, so the Diuines (being pensioners to the English in this Act) made their diuinity English.

Condemned for a witch
and burnt.

After they had gravely consulted and resolved on the matter: they declare Isabel to be against kinde, having abused her sex, bearing the habit of a man, against the expresse word of God, a witch working by deuills, without the which she could not haue performed so many extraordinary deeds, nor obtained such a memorable successe, and lastly consequence an Idolatresse, a schismatike and an heretike. This was decreed in the Vniversity of Paris, with many hands to the condemnation. This conclusion (being carefully procured by the Duke of Bedford) was presented by him to Peter Cauchin Bishop of Beauuais, whom he requested to proceed speedily in the cause. The Bishop assembles the Deane and Chapter at Rouen, hee calls the Abbot of Felcamp thither with a new supply of Diuines for the execution of this Decree. There is nothing more easie then to doe quill. And although they were all possessed with English passions, yet could they not so sone resolve themselves against her; so as they were long in suspence, before they could condemne her, for the answered pertinently to all their accusations. In the end violence prevailed, the which (being muffled with the cloake of religion and iustice) condemned Isabel (as guilty of the about named crimes) to perpetual prison: but in the end being delivered by the Bishop to the secular power, the Duke of Bedford caused her to be burnt at Rouen, in the yearre 1431, the sixth of Iuly.

The siege of Compaigne.

Thus the happily serued France one whole yearre, and was prisoner somewhat more, leaving a great griefe to those that liued then, to see her so intreated: and a memory of immortall praile to come, having bene so profitable and necessary an instrument, for the delivery of our Country being almost ruined. But the wise prouidence of God had limited both her labours and her life. Hee would only vse her in the beginning, to shew that Charles hath not bene the Author of the restoring of this Estate, but God himselfe, who would shame men by a maide, most worthy to be honoured by our posterity. I haue reported at once what was acted in two yeeres, being all of one subiect: not to breake off the order of my discourse in matters which follow after. And now I will returne to Compaigne besieged by the Bourgignon. As all the French were much amazed for the losse of Isabel, so the English and Bourgignons were greatly encouraged to presse the siege of Compaigne with greater heate. This important City (seated vpon the riuer of Oize, at the entry of Picardy) had greatly furthered the Bourgignon, who for this reason was resolute to haue it either by lone or force. He doth againe negotiate with Charles, assuring him of his loue. Charles (bewitched with the charmes of this Bourgignon) giues care to his new deuices, and (forgetting that hee had bene abused,) hee promiseth to deliuer Compaigne into his hands. The Bourgignon accepts it: and the better to play his part, he draws his Portuguese to Noyon, being one of the cunningest women in the world, and most affected to her husband, as a gage of the loue he had promised to Charles: the which she should manage. The Lord of Flauay Gouvernor of Compaigne, had received seuerall commandments from the King to deliuer it, but he excuseth himselfe, desiring to haue a more ample warrant from the King. He shewes him the importance of the place, and the wilfulness of the inhabitants, and so denying his Master honestly that which might be preiudiciall vnto him, hee dischargeth the duty of a good seruant. Truly it is a good seruice to deny the Master when as he commands that is hurtfull vnto himselfe. This policy succeeding not for the Duke of Bourgogne, to surprize Compaigne, he resolves to haue it by force: Bedford sends the Earle of Huntington with a thousand English Archers to fortifie this siege. John of Luxembourg (who was therafter the Bourgignon) builds great forts to keepe them from succors, and for a retreat he doth fortifie the Abbeyes of Venere and Royaulieu. The Inhabitants were in great extremity, yet were they resolute to endure all, vnder their wife and faithfull gouernour, rather then to fall into the hands of strangers, whose gripes they had formerly felt. If they were fiercely besieged by the English & Bourgignons, so were they as well succoured by the French, vnder the happy command of the Earle of Vendosme gouernour of Beauuais, & the Marshall of Boullac, who (hauing valiantly torred the first bastions) enter the towne, and hauing virtualled it, they issue forth, with great resolution, so as they take all the other fortifications their enemies great lesse. So Huntington and Luxembourg retire with disgrace, leaving not only that Country free, but their victuals, artillery, munition and habiliments warlike in their lodgings of Venete and Royalieu, saving themselves with some difficulty at Pont l'Euesque, through the favour of Noyon. The Bourguignon was so amazed at this retreat into Artois, having as bad successe by force as by policy.

Our French forces being masters of the field, they recover all the Bourguignons conquests; Choyly, Gournay, Bertueil, Garmigny, Reffons, Pont Remoy, Pont Saint Marie, Longueil, Saint Mary la Boyssiere, Ireligny, Vernueil, and other places, where he had gathered together all the corne and cattell of the Country, the which was restored to poore people, to their great content. The Bourguignons pride thus taken downe to many victorious hopes was a principall part of this victory. But he resolves to his revenge of this affront. Being come to Arras, hee gathers together all the forces he can, and from thence he goes to Peronne, to attend the body of his army. His way was to recover what hee had lost in this last warre of Compeigne, meaning to be at Garmigny, which did greatly annoy all that Country. Hee sends a troope of 600 before under the conduct of Thomas Tirrel an Englishman. Girard of Brimeu goes of Reyeaumonts this troope with a hundred of his men. In this order they go to the siege of Garmigny as to a marriage: but Pathon (who had his spies in all places, and put himselfe into Garmigny, at the brute of this siege) slept not. Having therefore to discover the enemies countenance, hee learns that these Picards (being neere to choire) did hunc after hares, (whereof there are great store in those parts,) and the troope was wholly in disorder, running vp and downe with great cries. Pathon imbrued this occasion suddenly, and having drawne his men to field, hee surpriseth these being dispersed and out of breath, he defeats them, kills them, and in the end cries they should take the run aways. The Commander is taken, with most of their best. Anthony of Vienne and the Lord of Hailly (being greatly lamented by the Bourguignons) were first led to Garmigny, and then to Compeigne in great triumph.

The newes hereof did greatly trouble the Bourguignon, especially when as the Duke of Vendome went with the French army to braue him at the gates of Roye, offering battell. He made shew to accept thereof, but having called a Councill, he framed a reasonable excuse, that his souldiers were not willing he should fight in the end of the year. With these affronts the years ends: and with the death of a sonne which hee had new spouse, whom hee loved dearly, his spirits were so oppressed with sorrow for losse, as this Prince (being too passionate) had speeches unworthy the gravity of his age, and the greatnesse of his blood, weeping and wishing for death. Doublelesse hee tells out that hee even which is too much puffed vp in prosperity, is easily daunted in adversity. A goodly lesson for great men (who cannot learne but by great examples) that greatnesse doth not free them from the common condition of mankind: that men and must die like men. O man! whatsoever thou beest, behold good remedies to these extremities of fortune: neither to be drunke with prosperity, nor drowned in adversity. These five succeeding yeares having nothing memorable, but an entry to the defence of the City of Paris, which shall giue example to all the rest of the Realme, the weaknesse of parties was necessary for the making of an accord. The Duke of Bourgonne might do much, but his infinite designs had transported him beyond the due, without some checke. These small disgraces did greatly blemish his credit with the Duke of Bedford, who expected more from him than hee found by the effects: but that he made a breach in their loves was the sudden death of Anne Duchesse of Bedford, the Philip Duke of Bourgonne, the gage of their cold friendship, which till then was necessary, but after her decease it was but superficiall, although in this occurrence league was not apparently broken. The one weepes for his wife, and the other for his sister. The beginning of this year was noted by the taking of Montargis from the French, through the notable treason of a woman, who gave entrance to the English, and presently reaped the fruits of her treachery. But let vs attend the year following, when we shall see a miraculous change in this miserable towne. At the same time, in reuenge of Montargis, Chartres returns to the Kings obedience. The meanes is by subreption, being put in practice in our times in many places. A carter living at Ch was had a brother resident in Court with a Treasurer. The familiarity this carter had to goe and come into the towne, made him both desirous, and to lay the plot of so memorable an enterprise. Neere vnto the gate there was an old trained house, in the which there was a great vault halfe filled vp with rubbish: here they lodge a hundred men: on the other side they convey a thousand men, secretly in the night, into a house neere vnto the towne. The carter comes at the breake of day with his car vnto the post, where the quarters were set of purpose, saying that a wheele was slippe. While the guard labours to helpe him, the vault issues forth out of the ruines, and surpriseth the post, and the rest beyond them with such speed, as the City is won. This had beene done without any effusion of blood, if the bishop had not animated the inhabitants to fight against their King, where he himselfe was slaine with some of the Citizens. About this time, Rene Duke of Barre, brother to Louis Duke of Aniou, and King of Sicilia, (who shall make himselfe famous in the following reigne) received a great checke. Hee had a notable quarrell against the Earle of Vaudemont, pretending the Earldome: from words they goe to blowes, Rene fortifies himselfe with the forces of France: Vaudemont with those of Bourgonne. Rene being longer in shew, besiegeth the towne of Vaudemont, and when as the Earle, with the helpe of his friends, would haue raised the siege, Rene draws him to fight, defying him, and promising to himselfe an assured victory. But God (the soveraigne Iudge of these factions) gaue it to the Earle, and Rene remained prisoner in the hands of the Duke of Bourgonne, to whom hee payed a great ranfome. In the end, by the dukes meanes yielding him his liberty, this quarrell was ended, marrying the eldest son of Rene with the daughter of the Earle of Vaudemont. But let vs reserve the rest to the following reigne.

About the end of this year, a solemnity was done in Paris, which carried more shew than substance. We haue said before, how that Henry the sixth King of England, had beene crowned King of France, when as our Charles was crowned at Poitiers after the decease of his father. Henry was but two yeares old, and came not out of England, vntill that Charles had beene solemnly crowned at Rheims, to the great ioy of all the French; but when as the Duke of Bedford found, how much this authentick publication advanced the affaires of Charles, he caused Henry to be brought into France, and to be crowned at Paris, with an extraordinary Maiesty, to our countenance Charles his Coronation, by a greater shew of pompe. But the blood of France cannot dissemble: no man was moued at that, no more then to see a Tragedy acted vpon a Stage. This year is very barren of all memorable exploits, but that this silence noted an entrance to an accord (both parties being weary of pleading) yet with great slacknesse, as we see in diseases which come suddenly, and passe away slowly: we must therefore crosse this rough way before we come to Paris. Montargis taken by the English as we haue said, was now recovered by the French, but after a diuers manner; for the English lost the towne by the Castle, and the French the Castle by the towne, yet were they three moneths in winning of the Castle. Having taken all, they lost all by the same meanes that made them so much to gape after the castle, which was the want of money. This shameful losse grieved many of the greatest in Court, and bred a new trouble by this occasion.

Tremouille was yet in great credit with the King, having by this meanes a great hand in the State: they accused him to haue heaped vp great treasure, to the preiudice of such as daily employed their liues for the Kings seruice. The greater men resolve to take Tremouille prisoner, and to punish him like vnto Giac, and others before mentioned. The King was at his Castell at Chinon: Tremouille follows him as his shadow; but it chanced, as he was in his chamber, the Lords of Brueil, Coytiuy and Fesard, followed with forty armed men, enter and take him, not one of a hundred of that sort could escape; but six thousand Crownes saved his life, hoping to returne againe into credit. The Constable of Richmont grows into greater fauour then before. Thus misfortune is good for something. Bedford puffed vp with the successe of Montargis, takes Milly in Galkenois; but having besieged Lagny in Brye, he was repulsed: at the same time, John of Luxembourg (of the Bourguignon faction) is dispossessed of Ligny in Barrois, by the Lady of Comeray. A disgrace which shall draw the Bourguignons to a composition so much desired, together with the happy successe of the French, in the Country of Artois, the taking of St. Valerie in Ponthieu, and the generall waiering of the chiefe towne in Picardy, tired with these confusions, being so great, as no man was assured of his person, of what party hee

If hee were the weaker. The Cardes were so thrust, as an English man would become French, to take a Bourguignon, and a French man become English, or a Bourguignon to take a Frenchman. These vaine trecheries were usually, especially at Amiens, Arras, uille, and throughout all Picardy, where the warres had bene most licentious. Vaine outrage hath bene reuiued in our miserable age, through the cruelty of these wretched warres, which causeth men to make shipwracke both of faith and honour.

This year had a plausible beginning, but without any great effect. The Council of the King being assembled (as we haue said) to redresse the confusion of Antipopes, and to reforme the Church (diuided by this schisme) wrote vnto, sends the Cardinal of Auxerre to the Kings of France and England, to exhort them vnto peace. Charles protested that he desired nothing more, the English said the like. They assembled to this end at Auxerre great troops, but at their first meeting, all this treaty was broken off, for both the one and the other, stood vpon the quality of King of France, being the fundamentall point of their quarrell. The Duke of Bedford spake more proudly then Charles himselfe, as the law of State (which maintained this Monarchy) had been made in England, an Illegitimate firme land, and France changed to this Ile of Albion or of Britany, of such force, our euen in matters of State, when a passion ouer-rules the light of reason. So they all depart without any effect. They only conclude a truce, for the great want of the people, who could suffer no more. But this truce was a pit-fall for many, trusting countenance of this courteous warre, which making profession to meane nothing more to be feared when it smiles, then when it frownes.

John Duke of Bourbon dies
in England.

We haue said, that John Duke of Bourbon was taken prisoner in the battell of Agincourt, whom they could neuer redeem at any rate. This year he died in England, his sonne Charles succede him. He had to wife the sister of the Duke of Bourgogne, they fall to words for their rights, and so to warre. Charles takes from Philip of Burgundie, Perpetuis, Mucy, Eueque, Chaumont, and other places. The Bourgignons his reuenge, and besiege Belleuile in Beaufort, belonging vnto Charles. The chiefe of Berry labours to reconcile these Princes, and drawe them to a peace, they shall soone be a meane of a generall accord betwixt the Bourgignon and France, mediation of the Duke of Bourbon, a profitable instrument of so good a worke. The cession not prevented, was seconded by another, for the Duke of Bedford, after the death of his wife (being sister to the Duke of Bourgogne) maries with Isabella the daughter of Peter of Luxembourg Earle of Saint Pol, who was no friend to the Bourgignons, moreover the youth and beauty of this new spouse, had so bewitched Bedford, as he was easily drawne from Philip, whose loue he entertained with great difficulty, yet in the end of the generall cause they made a good shew, and had mer at St. Omer to that effect, that this interview encreased their discontents.

Bedford maries againe.

In the meane time, the truce (being ill obserued on either side), is conuerted into a gushing war. Bedford makes war in the Countrey of Mayen by Scales and Willoughby, renowned Captaines, which besiege S. Celerin. Charles succours it by the Lord of Vaux, who hauing lodged some troopes at Viuin, (a village of small account) made it his by a notable peece of seruice. Scales surprised of these troopes lodged in this house, hasts thither, surprizeth them, and cuts them in peeces: but the Lord of Buell had his reuenge: for falling vpon the Conquerours, who returned in disorder, he put about route. Chartier notes it for a notable seruice, that forty lances ouerthrew a thousand hundred men, which were slaine, or taken prisoners: of such force is disorder and tumult in warre. The siege of Saint Celerin being thus raised, to the great disgraunce of the English, Bedford much grieved for this affront, sends the Earle of Arondele with new forces. It was at the same time when as Charles went into Dauphine: the raising of this notable victory, holding mens minds in suspense, so as Arondele takes Saint Celerin by force, and from thence he marcheth to Silley le Guil-laume. The Governour sent to want succours, treats with Arondele: That if by a prefixed day, the French were not the stronger, at a certaine Elme next vnto the place, hee would then yeeld vnto the Towne, and for assurance thereof giues him hostages. The Court was troubled at this summons: all post thither, fearing to continue their shame with losse, Princes and Officers of the Crowne, the Duke of Alençon and Anjou, the Constable of Richemont, the Marshalls of Bouffier, Rieux, and Retz: the Lords of Loheac, Granille, and Buell, with his good fortune. Being all come to the Elme at the day appointed, they summon the Earle of Arondele to deliuer vp his hostages and to fight with them, but he yeelds vp his hostages and leaues the siege. The halt of the omitted voyage makes our men to post presently to Courts. Arondele returns to the siege of Silley, and not able to take it, he surprizes Beaumont le Vicont, but pressed with sicknesse hee retires to Mans, a Towne then vnder their obedience.

The voyage of Dauphine was performed. Charles comes to Vienne passing through Auernon. The reason of this progresse was to fertile matters in Dauphine, Lionois, and Languedoc, which Countreies had serued him faithfully and profitably in his greatest afflictions. All the chiefe of those Countreies attend him, and hold their Estates by his commandement. The ioy both of Charles and his subjects was exceeding great after so long and dangerous a storme. Charles did gladly embrace his ancient seruants, the Earle of Foix, Gaucourt, and Gréslee, with the Nobility of Vauarez and Dauphine, who had giuen him so great testimonies of their faith and valour. All men were confirmed in their governments, no man was denied of what he demanded, which giues them courage to doe their best endeavors in his seruice. The States grant the King a notable sum of money for the maintenance of his warres.

King Charles
makes a progress into Dauphin and Languedoc.

We haue obserued the humor of Arondele duke of Sauoy, who during the doubtfulness of the French affaires, had caried a watchfull eye, to make his profit by their confusion. Being well informed, that Charles loued him not, he fortifies himselfe by alliances. Hee had giuen his eldest daughter to Lewis of Anjou King of Sicily, and now hee maries his sonne Lewis Earle of Geneva with Anne the daughter of John of Lusignan King of Cyprus, from whence the title of the Realme of Cyprus comes to the House of Sauoy. This marriage was honored with the presence of the duke of Bourgogne, the Earle of Nevers, and the Prince of Orange. These were good cautions for Arondele against Charles: but we shall soone see that he will find another expedient against all euents. As a tree in the sappe groweth as the spring is neer, so diuers popular accidents chancing this year, foretold what should happen. There were 6000 men in arme against the English in Vexin-Normand, and in Caux 20000. Charles doth carefully embrace those occasions, and encouraging them both by letters and messages, he sends them notable Commanders, the Duke of Alençon with the Lords of Loire and Buell, braue and valiant captaines. But as a tree that sprouts forth through the fauour of a warme season, is stayed by a sharpe wind, so all these popular braueries were soon danted, and this stream was soone turned. The rowes that were, mutined yeeld to the English force, but they keepe their hearts for their King, vnill they may shake off the English yoke.

The French
takes arme against the English.

But the wise prouidence of God, who governs the work for the restoring of this estate, raised vp meanes which all the humane policy of Charles or of his Council could not foresee, who had laboured by all meanes to win the Bourgignons loue. Hee harboured in his heart a resolute discontent against the English: to whom he imputed the cause of all his crosses and disgraces. The Liegeois crosse him many waies in the possession of Namur newly fallen vnto him. Antwerp and Arras are discontented, and ready to rise against him. The English (in his opinion) is the author and fauourer of these discontents, and it may be did all he could to molest him, what shew sooner he made. But howsoever it were, the Bourgignon (meaning to make an open breach with him) compounds all quarrels with this discontented people, intending to make a firme peace with Charles. So the year 1434 passeth without any great alteration.

This year 1435 shall be more happy for the French then the former. Charles besiege Gerberoy by Pothon and la Hire. The English come to succour it, led by the Earle of Arondele, being a thousand against lesse then five hundred. Our men therefore resolute to reue to Beauuais, but they must account with the stronger. There is but one meane of safety, to hope for no helpe. So these braue warriors resolute to fight, and are victorious: for the English troopes are defeated: leuen or eight hundred slaine vpon the place, and all the rest prisoners. The Earle of Arondele (being grievously wounded) dies at Beauuais, a braue and resolute Captaine, dying in the bed of honour. This was the beginning of the year: the winter was very sharpe, but it daunted not the courage of our warriors. The Earle of Dunois (a bastard of Orleans) was the ring-leader in many exploits: hee causeth Saint Denis to be surprized by Captaine Deymille, and hee follows well accompanied to keepe it. In going along he takes Houdan, and then hee fortifies St. Denis with men and victuals, and leaves the Marshall of Richemont to governe it. And that he would lose no time, he employes his troopes to take seuerall places thereabout, as Pont Saint Maxence, Orouille and Meulan. The English had fortified Saint Ouy, to keepe the Countrey in alarme: Occasions are offered of daily battles, and daily the English are beaten. But the long stay of this little army, and the horror of St. Denis stirred vpon the people of Paris, who loth to be so restrained, prepare a great power to force St. Denis at what price soeuer. The Marshall of Richemont, loth to engage himself (being in all the weaker) retires honourably to Meulan, without any losse. The English beat downe the defences of St. Denis, being a common retreat to all men, without any more labour, either to keepe it or to recover it.

IN the end behold an agreement made with Charles, so much expected, so vnprofitably sought after, and now freely offered by the duke of Bourgonne. The deputies of the Councell prefe both French, English and Bourguignon, to end all quarrels, by a good composition. The City of Arras is allowed of by them all to treat in. The Assembly was great: from the Pope and the Councell of Pisa there came the Cardinals of Saint Croix and Cipres, with twelve bishops: for the French King there was the Duke of Bourbon, the Earle of Richmont Constable of France, the Earle of Vendosme, the Archbishop of Rheims Chancellor of France, the Lords of Harcourt, Valpergue, la Fayette, Saint Pierre, du Chastell, du Bois, Chastillon, du Fay, de Raillie, Rommer, Cuffelles, and Cambray first President of the Parliament at Paris, with many wife and learned men, as John Indart, Bleset, John Charrier, Peter Cleel, Adam le Queux, John Tasse, and so forth. For the King of England, the Cardinals of Yorke, and Winchester, the Earle of Salisburie, the Bishop of Saint Dauids, John Rastliffe keeper of the great Seale, the Lord of the Manor of Rastliffe, the Official of Canterbury, and some Doctors of Divinity. The Duke of Bourgonne, there came the duke of Geldres, the Earle of Nassau, the Bishop of Cambray, the Earle of Vernambourg, the Bishop of Legee, the Earles of Clemon, Neuers, Salines, Saint Pol, and Ligny, besides the Deputies of many of his Cities and Townes. The pompe was great, both on the deputies behalfe, and of the duke of Bourgonne, who intertained them with all the honour and good cheare that might be wished. But leauing these circumstances, I make haste to the principall subiect. The Kings of France and England began the treaty. The fundamentall question was, to whom the Crowne of France belonged? The English did challenge it, both because that hee was issued from a daughter of France, as also by the Grant of Charles the first who did institute Henry the first and his Successors, Heires of the Crowne, and hee inherited Charles the seventh, whom hee termed an Vlturper. The Deputies for France answered, that they ought not to call in question the ground of the Estate, which could stand firme without that lawfull Heire to whom the Law appoints: and therefore without proofing of that which was apparent of it selfe, they came to offers for the ending of all controversies, That if the King of England would both disclaime the title of King of France, and yeeld vp the Countreies held by him in diuers parts of the realme, he should enjoy the duchies of Guienne and Normandy, doing homage for them vnto the King of France as his Soueraigne, and with those conditions which his Ancestors, Kings of England, had formerly enioyed them. They stood vpon their different termes: their matter was limited, and possession putt vp the English. But sometimes hee refused that after hee had strait to haue all, most commonly loseth all. One moiety in effect had vnmailed the English, then all in imagination, who in the end shall find, that the Soueraine Judge, the preseruet of the law, and of States, giues and takes away, appoints and disappoints, according to his good and wife will: and that there is no force, nor wisdom in his. The matter was soone ended betwixt the Kings of France and England: feeling that could do no good, the sword must preuaile.

Thus the Ambassadors of England, returned without any effect: those of France to treat with the duke of Bourgonne and his deputies, amongst the which hee himselfe

A was the chiefe, as well for his owne interest, as for his iudgement in affaires. A man exceeding cunning, who could embrace all occasions to make his profit by another, as the discourse of his life hath made manifest. But to what end serues all this mortar, and so great workmanship, to frame a building which shall bee ruined vnder his sonne, and shall bury him in the ruines thereof? It is a foolish reason which thou callest reason, hauing no ground of reason, and doest not hearken to the voice of heauen. O foole! all thy riches shall be taken from thee this night. A man walks in a shadow, he toyles in vaine, to make his name immortal in the grave, he hunts with infinite labour and takes nothing. As for Charles, he sought to retire the Bourguignon from all league and alliance with the King of England, and taking from him all occasions of discontent, so to engage him by great gifts and honours, as he should resolute to follow his faction, as the most profitable, knowing that his owne private interest, was the chiefe end of his designs. Matters were carried thus according to the humour of that age, the disposition of the Court, and for the honour of Charles, who must aske the Duke of Bourgonne pardon, hauing caused his father to be slaine against his faith. But was it not true? must not the crime bee confessed by him that was culpable? Charles therefore resolues to send him a blanke, and the accord doth testifie, that the Bourguignon filled it with so many vnreasonable conditions, as it is strange to great a Monarch should stoope so much to his subiect and vassall, but necessity hath no law.

A president for great men, not to attempt any thing against reason, lest they bee constrained to repaire it with reason, and yet to know that it is an amendment of a fault to yeeld to necessity for the good of the State, being a great thrift to lose for gaine. The originall sett downe at large all the conditions of this Treaty: who so please may reade them in Montbretel, and in the history of S. Denis. The summe is, that the massacre committed on the person of John duke of Bourgonne at Montreuil-faut-yonne, is sufficient, by repaid by confession and ceremonies. Great summes of present money with goodly Siegneuries are giuen to the Duke of Bourgonne: so many assurances for him and his, as a great volume is full of these scrupulous conditions.

The Duke of Bourgonnes promise is more simple, that hee should declare himselfe a friend to Charles the seventh King of France, and enemy to his enemies: that he should renounce all alliance and friendship with the King of England, and promise both his person, and all his meanes to expell him out of France. The performance was according to promise: Charles Duke of Bourbon, and Arthur of Britany, Earle of Richmont, Constable of France, in the name of Charles the seventh, aske pardon of the Duke of Bourgonne, for the death of his father, and the Duke pardoned him for the love of God. The Cardinals (in the Popes name and the Councells) absolve the Duke from the oath which he had made vnto the English: and either part sweares to maintaine the accord in that which did concerne him. So the peace was published with great solemnity, to the incredible content of all men. The King, the Duke of Bourgonne, and the whole Realme reioyced exceedingly, onely John of Luxembourg Earle of Saint Pol, would not bee therein comprehended, hee shall suffer for it, and his Houle after him. This was the 24. of September, in the year 1435. A famous day for those things which happened in this reigne, whereof this accord gaue the first occasion. The marriage of Charles sonne to the Duke of Bourgonne, with Katherine of France, daughter to our Charles, was concluded to seale this accord. From this peace sprang a more violent warre against the English. The Duke of Bourgonne sends backe all his contracts to the Duke of Bedford, and hauing shewed him the iust reasons which had moued him to embrace the Kings amity, being his kinsman and Lord, hee renounceth the alliance of England, with a watchword, that euery one should looke to himselfe. Euery man sharpens his sword, and countes his Armes, to recover that by force, which they could not obtaine by reason. The first fruits of this accord began to grow ripe even in the heart of winter, for Corbeil yeelds presently to the King, with Brie-Comte-Robert and the Caille of Bois de Vincennes. The Bourguignon employes all his friends and intelligences at Paris, hee vitieth all his instruments, meaning to set them to worke the year following: All Normandy begins to reuolt, Deepe, Fescan, Montier-Villiers, Hailen, Lancarville, Bec-Crespin, Gombeville, Loges, Villemont, Graulieu, Longueville, Neufville, Lambreville, Charles-Mesnil, St. Germaine, Fontaines, Dreux, and Blainville, about the King willingly, chafing away the English, and receiving the French for their safety, all which was acted in two daies. What more? to finish this worke, God takes away one of the chiefe causes, and one of the principal instruments of the misery, which had so long afflicted this Estate. We haue seene what part Isabel of Bawaria played in this Tragedy, we haue sought her after the death of her poore husband, and could not find her, for in truth she was ciuilly dead. Bedford fearing the spirit of this Medea, seeks not onely to stay her hands, but to keepe her eyes from the managing of affaires. And for that (he had deuoured the treasure of the Realme, he constrains her to keepe a diet. Hee doth therefore sequester her to the house of Saint Pol, where she liued vntill the end of this yeare in great poeury, no more assisted by the Bourguignon then by the English. Being dead, they caused her body to be put into a small boate, and so transported by the riuer of Seine to Saint Denis, where she was buried without any pompe, like to a common person. A light put out, whose fauour doth yet offend posterity.

In this yeare also died John of England, that great Duke of Bedford, called Regent of France, who hath noted many blacke pages in this volume, and so much terrified our Ancestors. Having seene the former accord, and felt so sudden effects in Normandy, fearing the rest would follow, he drowned himselfe in sorrow, & knowing no means to avoid this storme, he dies at Rouen the 13 of December, leaving to King Henry the sixth, a bottom very hard to vntwist, and to his young wife (being sister to the Earle of St. Pol) a cause of mourning, the which continued not long, for she married soon after against the will of her parents, with an English Aduenturer of small account giuing cause to laugh at her, being but little pitied. Charles being thus discharged of a heauy burthen by this accord, had more liberty to follow his honest delight. He goes to Lions, visits Dauphine, and stays in Languedoc, a Prouince which he loues about all the rest, having found it most deuoted to his seruice. Montpellier was his abode, a place very pleasantly feared; but taking this time of recreation, he had left good Lieutenants in France, who shall soone send him newes of their exploits.

*The City of Paris yields to the King, and expels

vanquished at Saint Denis.

THE Bourguignon prepares to annoy the English, whilest that the Constables make way for the reduction of Paris. His intent was (parting from Pontoise) to put himself into S. Denis, a towne halfe dis-mantled: but Thomas of Beaumont Captain of the Bastile (having intelligence of this designe) prevented the Constable, and entred into S. Denis: with a notable troupe of souldiers. Richmont notwithstanding approacheth neere to S. Denis: the Captainell having giuen warning of his approach, Beaumont issues forth to the bridge, vpon the little riuer which is towards Pierre-fite, where he met with the fore-runners, who hauing drawne him forth, ingage him in the battell, the which was led by the Constable, marching from the valley of Montmorency. This English troupe was easily vanquished, most of them were cut in peeces, and the rest taken, hardly any one of them escapes, to cary newes to Paris. Thomas of Beaumont is slaine among the rest vpon the place. The Constable makes vse of this good successe: hee prechtly marcheth with his victorious army to Paris, which stood amazed at these approaching forces, wanting a Regent, who was lately deceased; and such as were left to command, were more fit to handle an oare, then to gouerne the helme. Now was the time for good French-men to shew themselves, whereof there were many in the City. The Bourguignon faction being now become the Kings seruants, imbrace this occasion, and hauing consulted together, they resolute to shake off the English yoke, the which they had too long endured.

The Duke of Bourgonne was then at Bruges, but he had left the Lord of Lisle-Adam to deal with his partisans at Paris. It is the same whom he had formerly imploied against Charles and his father John, in the murder of the Kings seruants. He had great credit with the Parisians, of whom Michael Lailler was the chiefe Tribune. He discouers by him the peoples affections, being resolute to submit themselves to the King: of whom they craue only a generall abolition of what was past. This gentle demand being brought to Pontoise to the Constable, and easily granted, all prepare for the effects. That quarter neere the Halles gaue the first signe of the French liberty at Paris, by the meanes of the Curate of Saint-Eustace: and all Saint Honories street ioynes in this hardy resolution. In the same time the Vniuersity beyond the bridge doth the like. Lewis of Luxembourg, Bishop of Theouenne Chanceller for the English, the Bishops of Liseux and Meaux, the Lord Willoughby, with others deuoted to the English, aduertised of these mutinies in diuers parts of the City, fearing some sedition, retire toward Saint Anthonies gate, hauing carried all their best furniture into the Bastile, and fortified the houses adioyning. All being thus prepared at Paris, the Constable of Richmond, guided by Lisle-Adam, parts from Pontoise, and comes to Saint Denis in the night, where hauing rested some houres, hee marcheth early in the morning, accompanied with the Earle of Dunois, (a bastard of the house of Orleans) the Lords of Suze and Buell, with a great company of resolute souldiers, approaching neere the City, Lisle-Adam with a choise troupe goes before St. Jacques gate, the appointed place for the Rendezuous, where he finds all in a readinesse, so as Lailler hauing planted ladders for him at the lowest part of the wall, he mounts with his troop. Being entred the city, the people of that quarter (who were assembled for his coming) begin to cry, A peace, a peace, and save the King, and the D. of Bourgonne. Lisle-Adam being, ioynd to the chiefe of the City, goes directly to the gate, the which was set open by the captaine of that quarter, and the Constable, who was before it with his troopes, entred in good order. Then the people redoubled their cries. They all stand at a gaze, being aduertised of this entry, and exceeding glad to see themselves ready to recover their ancient liberty; they prepare to march where they should be commanded to expell the English, all run to the Bastile. The Tournelles are presently seized on, and all approaches into the Bastile are soone won. Such as were within, at the first made some shew of defence, but as all things were prepared to force them, they demand a parlee, and agree to depart with their liues and baggage. They are conducted about the towne beneath the Loure, to imbrake vpon the riuer of Seine, and so to passe to Rouen. Then could not well haue passed through the city. The people aduertised hereof run to the walls, and cry out with great shoutes, bayting the English like dogs, whom a little before they had feared and honoured as their masters. This hapned the 27 of February, in the yeare 1436. Thus Paris returns to the obedience of this Crowne, hauing passed seuentene yeares vnder the gouernment of the English: which made the fatherly command of their King more pleasing vnto them, and them more willing to obey him, hauing tasted the imperious command of a stranger.

Charles aduertised of this happy successe, parts from Montpellier, and returns slowly by Auvergne, to giue the Parisians time to prepare for his entry, the which was performed with great pompe, sixe moneths after the reduction of the City, but with so extraordinary an affection of the people, as drinking after a great thirst. All the townes within the Realme had followed this example, if Charles had imbraced this goodly occasion, all being drawne vnto their duty by a naturall instinct. He was of a mild spirit, playable to all winds, flying toyle, but patient when he had vnderaken it. We haue hitherto seene him constant enough in his afflictions, although the weight of blowes so often doubled, had made him senselesse, so as hee bare his crosses with lesse feeling, as a mortified member doth the razor or a corasue: but prosperity had so reuiued his spirit, as he recovered himselfe and returned to his owne disposition. He wanted authority to command well, and iudgement to make choice of his seruants, for he often imbraced and rewarded vnecessary men, and put backe such as were profitable.

This proceeding discontented such as (seruing him faithfully) did see themselves condemned. These discontents gaue them liberty to speake, and doe things, which offended the King, experience teaching, that these tractable humors are as soone moued as pleased, and aboute all, are suspitious and cholericke: for impressions creeping into these weak spirits, makes them to fall into another extremity of vnmeasured passion. We haue seene the like in the life of Lewis the Gentle, but we shall not find the like exesse in our Charles: yet shall we see that by the like indifereate facility he disordered his owne affaires, discontented his blood, grieved many of his seruants, filled his life with languishing in the prospect of his affaires, to cast him headlong (in the midst of his greatest triumphs) into the gulfe of a fearefull graue: what we are to represent in this discourse, shall bee the Commentary of this truth.

siege Calais, it consisted for the most part of the communalities of his estates. He engaged them in this warre, both by his authority and the shew of profit, to haue a town convenient for trafficke. This army had scarce continued in field ten daies, but they went homeward to their houses, shops, and fields: besides, the English wrought them by hand, and sent a great supply to defend Calais. This humored so possesse this multitude, as the Bourguignon had no power to hold them. All passe away like a lent stream, and this his designe came to nothing, although he chafed in vaine, like the Persian that threatened the tempest, and whipt the Sea. So all enterprizes failed not. The Duke of Bourgogne being thus retired, the English took his revenge by assault, and spoiles the marches of Boulogne, and Gravelins, to the great losse of the Country. The Lord of Croy sought to make head against the English, being followed by a goodly troope: but he was defeated, and saues himself with difficulty in Artois. The Flemings sate at this losse, and march vnder the Duke of Bourgogne's command, but they returned with shame: for Calais was referred for another season. When he said that Charles had a sonne named Lewis, borne in the middle of his greatest affliction, the first year of his reign, in the year 1423. Being thirteen years old, hee sent him to Marguerite Suard the only daughter of James King of Scotland, a Princess of excellent vertues, and a gage of the faithful service which Scotland did to this Crowne in her greatest dangers, who suruiued not much this felicity of France. Charles was fious to returne to Montpellier: where hauing called an Assembly of that Province, he heard many complaints of the outrages his souldiers had committed, running vnder downe the Country in great disorder. The best souldiers were guilty of these insolencies for want of pay. Rodrigo de Villandras an Arragonois, (who had faithfully seru'd the King) in disgrace, and banished with his troope, but being toyed with Philip of Gaucigny, and hauing taken some places from the English, hee made his peace with Charles. This confusion was not alone in one Country, but generally dispersed through out the Realme. A troope of 2000 horse led by Anthony of Chabannes, Blanchet, Gualter of Bron, Floquet and other renowned Captaines, parting from Normandy, went through the Countreies of Vimeu, and Ponthieu, by Dorens, Orville, Bray, Cappy, and lions in Sauters, and enter into Cambresy, from thence they lodge at Solames toward Hainault with infinit spoile, eating and ransoming all after a hostile manner. Jehan Croy the Bailiffe of Hainault sent troopes against them, but they were defeated: they were called the shauers or fears.

In the end through Charles his many commands, they come into Champagne, where hauing remained sometime, they were employed to take Chasteau Landon, Champs, Nemours, and from thence they were led to Montreuil-faut-Yonne, where there was a matuculous siege, being well assailed and well defended: but in the end the Towne was taken by force, and the Castle by composition. Charles was at Bray, and the Dauphin commanded at this siege. Hee made faire warres with the English, who thanking before the King his father, yielded him these first fruits of his authority in the view of the whole army, who honoured him afterwards as the Sunne rising, whence grew the loues we shall hereafter speake of. The Mignons of Court which were then in quantity gave a great occasion: Christopher of Harcourt Lord of Chaumont, and Marlin Gue Bishop of Clermont, men that had no good in them but to doe ill. The Duke of Bourgogne had much trouble this year: the English had sowed great diuisions in his best Cities. Bruges stirred vp frange mutinies against him, whereas he was in danger of his life: Lisle-Adam chiefe Captaine of his Guard is slaine. A popular man whom we haue seene to command the Parisians twice, once against the King, and another time the King, he presumed in like sort to gouerne them of Bruges, but they teare him in peeces, as the Gantois had in former times massacred Artenille their Tribune.

A multitude is a dangerous thorne, which cannot bee handled without pricking. Gant followed the example of Bruges, but in the end all was pacified, with the lessest the most seditious, to the content of the same people, who deuoure him they did adore. After these seditions, Philip returns to warre, he besiegeth Crotoy (a place very important for the free trafficke of his Countreies) but after great paines and charge, it proved all in vaine.

A man vnfortunate in warre, but in Councell hee commanded with an imperious

grauitie. But (amidst the general) shall I omit this particular obseruation, profitable for the example. That great Captaine La Hire passing neere vnto Clermont, (a towne then subiect to the English) was there honourably received by the Lord of Anferment Gouverneur of the towne, and (for that he trusted La Hire much) he suffered him to enter with his men into the towne to eat a banquet. La Hire embracing this occasion, makes him his prisoner, and takes the place. Anferment had his revenge in time, by means of the Lord of Mouy: he enters Beauvais, where La Hire was Gouverneur, goes vnto him to the Tennis Court, takes him and leads him away prisoner in view of all the Inhabitants, and makes him to yeeld both his ransome and Clermont againe, notwithstanding Charles his letters to the Bourguignon: but in the end they are good friends. Thus difficultie is all way requited with the like, leaving a long repentance for him that is the author of the injury, how braue and cunning soeuer he be, God punishing iniquity in due season, when a man thinkes least of it, and by means least apparent. The warres had wonderfully vnpopled France, but this leuorage was not sufficient. The whole country lying waste, (not able to be tilled by reason of the daily incursions and ordinary spoils of both parties) there fell a great famine. That which was vicially worth but few pence, was sold for five shillings and six pence, or more. The people being famished, sought bread where they might find it, being forced from their houses by raging hunger, they disperse themselves in the fields and townes: in the one to find some fruit among the trees, and in the bushes to haue some herbs or rootes: in the other to get some morrell of bread, or some garbage, to fill the pance with any thing they could meet withall. So their bodies filled with bad meats, were likewise infected with bad humours, falling into diuers languishing diseases. In the end all turned to a plague, so horrible, as all these poore creatures famished and weakened with diseases, were like vnto dry wood in a great flame. Thus one plague bred another, and this miserable plant of Warre, brought forth two branches of misery to our wretched country, famine and pestilence. These afflictions dispersed throughout the Realme, reigned chiefly at Paris, the solemne Rendezvous of this languishing people. There was nothing to be seene but lamentable troopes of people pale and leane, of all sexes and ages, either running in the fields, or vp and downe the streets, or laid vpon dung-hills, or dead in the market places, a most horrible spectacle to behold.

There dyed threecore thousand persons in Paris. All the principall men abandoned the Citie, except Adam of Cambray the first President, Ambrós of Lore the Prouost of Paris, and the President of the Accounts, whom God preferred in this contagion to eternize their commendable memories for euer, hauing succoured the publike in necessitie; without whose courageous resolution the Citie had easly fallen into the hands of the English, who watched for all occasions, and made daily incursions from Manteuen vnto the gates. The Champian country being abandoned, Wolves left the Forests without feare, & hauing made their prey vpon the remainder of this miserable people, they came to the gates of townes, and euen into the streets. This horrible spectacle hath bene seene at Paris, in the Theater of the world, in the most populous Citie of all others. So one misery drew on another, and these afflictions continued two whole yeares, vnto the year 1435, whilst the contention of Anti-popes increased the fire of Schismes in Christendome, as we shall then in due place.

Amede or Amé Duke of Sauoy caried himselfe as we haue said, during the calamities of France: in the end of this year he shall shew a strange alteration of humor, to the great amazement of all the world, for being in his Castle of Thonon, (a towne seated vpon the Lake Lemman) he retires with a small traine to Ripaille, where he had an Abbey of Monks of Saint Maurice, and hauing imparted his designe but to two of his most confident seruants, hauing bound them to keepe him faithful company he takes vpon him the habit of these Monkes, that is, A gray frocke, a long cloake, a gray hood, a short cornet, and a red bonnet vnder his hood, but vpon his gray frocke he wore a great girdle of gold, and vpon his cloake a crosse of gold. Hauing thus changed his habit, his meaning was not to change his degree, nor to leave the world, but vnder the colour of this habit, his intent was to aspire higher, as the course of his life will shew. Being now retired to Ripaille, he calls a parliament, and shewes them his intention in this new course of life: That being weary of the world, where there was nothing but toyle and trouble, hee would sequester himselfe, to dedicate his life wholly to the service of God: But to this end hee might provid for the government of his estate, he declares his eldest son Prince of Piedmont, and Claude his youngest Earle of Geneva, & he himself remains Duke of Savoy, although he had vowed himself to the Order of Saint Maurice, and without altering of anything he reserves to himself the sole and souveraine authority of all his estates. Having published his intent, he retires with his Monkes to Rispaille, into one quarter of the kinging which he had built apart, accompanied with twenty of his favourites in Montaigny: but not living like unto that profession, for leaving them their water and room, he qualified this solitary life with the best cheer he could get from Chambery or Turin. This year is likewise memorable by the death of three great Princesses: of Katherine Queene of England sister to Charles the seventh, the mournfull leave of our long series: of the old Queene, daughter to the King of Navarre, Mother to the Prince of Britanie, the Duke and Constable: and of the old Countesse of Armagnac, daughter to the Duke of Berry, and Mother to the Duke of Savoy, the Earle of Armagnac, and the Earle of March. All dyed almost in one day, having seene the strange tragedies of France acted during their lives and upon their children; and in their ends, seeing no end of miseries. As the fury of fighting grew cold, so the warre was turned into traffick: there was no towne but the Governour kept it for him that would give most: and Charles in more expedit to have a towne or place for money, then to besiege it without charge, to the oppression of his subjects, and with a doubtfull euent. Montargis had either party much money to take it and to recover it againe: Charles buyes it of John of Sautenne an Arragonois vnder the English pay, for ten thousand Crownes. He buyes Dreux (the which he could neuer yet obtaine) for eightene thousand Crownes of William Breillart of Beaufe, a filthy trafficker, worthy of that confused time, but unworthy all good order and all royall authority. The which being laid open unto Charles, he resolves to vie an honourable force, and to spend more money to get more honour: he besiegeth Meaux and takes it victoriously, these were the first fruits of this new year in the month of May, Charles the onely sonne of Philip Duke of Bourgogne came to Tours, where King Charles was resident, and takes Katherine of France his daughter in wife, according to the Treaty of Arras.

Charles son to Philip of Bourgogne marries Katherine of France.

Having conducted her through his Fathers Countreies to Saint Omer (where he attended him) he solemnized the marriage with exceeding great pompe, the which nothing increaseth the love of these Princes allyed, nor the happinesse of the marriage, in which was of small continuance, and lesse love betwixt the parties, as the course of this story will shew. In the meane time the Bourguignon hath still two things to his bowle, though he had renounced the alliance of England, yet had he not left all his intelligence, the necessity of their neighbour-hood giving them still occasions to conferre together. And as he was always watchfull of his profit, so had he a good gage in England to his affaires, in retiring Lewis Duke of Orleans out of prison, being taken at the battle of Azincourt. He caused Charles to entertaine a treaty for a truce with the English: the grounds were laide by the Duchesse his wife, a cunning Princess and careful of her bands good. The Cardinall of Winchester comes to Grauelin to that effect, yet this but to lay the first foundation of the work which shall be finished in due season. When made mention of John of Luxembourg, who would not be comprehended in the treaty of Arras. Philip made great shew to be displeased with him, and Luxembourg likewise be his enemy, causing his men to be slaine with great violence. Philip treats with him on complaint of them that were wronged, and all is pacified. The cleere sighted did also find that this was the Bourguignons policie, who seemed to be in choller against him, gratified Charles, being much displeased with Luxembourg, who played the petty king with his Master, but he shall not cary it long, for he dyed soone after, and the Bourguignon with the whip he held ready for all euent, and the children of Luxembourg stood in need of the Kings favour. But now the Bourguignon flies to another practice. He desired in to be master of Calais, and seeing that force could not prevail, hee meanes to trie policy. Some of his subjects perswaded him that in breaking a Dike, they should let in the sea, and so drowne the towne and country about, whereby they should force them to obedience. He beleues this imagination, and employes much paine and cost to effect it. But this device of a flood, vanished away like unto the Flemish army at the first siege, whereof we have seene the fruitlesse issue. So this fantastical flood proved ridiculous. But the Duke

A ridiculous practice to take Calais.

A shew that he had done some thing, caused the bridge of Milay to be beaten downe, and some small Dikes, which onely watered the Country.

The beginning of this year laid the foundation of great matters for the restoring of our estate, the which doth draw on daily by meanes not fore-seene, and without the wife-dome or care of Charles, who was chiefly interested. After the reduction of Paris, all the townes in general were resolved to free themselves by force, if the King had beene so affected, but finding his minde inclining rather to peace, they beseech him to finde some meanes to compound with the English, & not to languish longer in the ordinary losses of a lingering and preiudicial warre. The Duchesse of Bourgogne for her husbands private interest, layes the first stone, treating for the delivry of Lewis Duke of Orleans, as wee have said. This first act was seconded by the request which the Prouinces of the realme made unto the King, the which ministred occasion vnto Charles to call a generall Parliament at Orleans, whether not onely all the Citizens vnto Charles to call a generall Parliament, but all the Noblemen which came not in person sent their Agents: for the subject was to treatte of a generall peace, and if it might not be effected, to set some order for the men of warre, for the ease of the poore people, who could endure no more. The King was there in person accompanied with these Noblemen, the Earles of March, Bourbon, Vendosme, and Richmond Constable, and the Archbishop of Rheims being Chancellor of France. The Agents of the Duke of Orleans, of the Duke of Bourgogne, and of the Earle of Armagnac assisted, with the deputies of Paris, Languedoc, Dauphine, Guienne and other Prouinces subiect to the French. The Chancellor (a wise and eloquent man) did set downe at large the miseries of warre, and the inestimable good of peace: but what better Commentary then the feeling of ouer-passed miseries, and the visible demonstration of our present calamities? It was decreed that in regard of a generall peace, they should make all necessary pursuit with speed. As for the ordering of men of warre, they should presently take some course to avoid confusion hereafter. The Lord Chancellor and the first President were chosen to negotiate this treaty with the English, through the meanes and fauour of the Duke of Bourgogne, as having laid the foundation: and presently a decree was made for the government of soldiers both of horse and foot, and to discharge the army of hangers on, the which did but incommode, to the great oppression of the poore people. This was the institution of the Franke-archers. The first day of May was appointed by the common consent of both Kings to meet at Saint Omer, but the King of England was aduised by the Duke of York the Viceroy (who had succeeded the Duke of Bedford in all his authority, although the name of Regent was not given him since the Kings Coronation) that he should stand vpon teatimes, as having no need of peace, but onely moued with compassion of the poore people, and therefore he failed in this negotiation. But there fell out an unexpected occasion to Charles, which not onely broke off the course of this business and all others, but had well-neere plunged France into greater misery then before. The King was gone to Angiers, where hee had intelligence of the taking of Saint Iustanne, for his service, one of the most important places of the Country of Maine, and of his losse at the siege of Auranches, which was ill attempted and succeeded worse: when as stranger newes made him lose the pleasure of this game, and forget the bitterness of his losse. He was growne wonderfull wayward and suspicious, inclining visibly into two extremities: being too familiar with some of his domestical servants, and too seuer to his Princes and chiefe Officers: either hee should not have married his eldest sonne Lewis, Dauphin of Viennois so soone, or else hee should not have vied him like a child. But Charles over-lookt him with a fower countenance as if he had been vnder the rod. All this was done of purpose, practised by his secret Counsellors to keepe great men from attempting against him vnder the name of this young Prince, to the preiudice of his royall authority: but what hee feared chanced. The Earle of March a Prince of the blood, had the charge of the young Dauphin, a Prince whom Charles trusted, being both wife and temperate: Lewis of Bourbon Duke of Alencon Godfather to Lewis was not so familiar with Charles as he was accustomed. The Duke of Bourbon was not altogether in his bad teatimes, yet was he not so great in the Kings favour as he desired, grieving that such base men should have countenance. These two Princes must lead the dance: if their desires had beene granted, many would have joyed: but now they would be lookers-on onely. At this time the Princes had men

Kings house against the King himselfe, was by our Ancestors called the Praguery. In the months of this year being spent in these garboiles, Charles returns to Tours, and is made for the raising of the siege of Harfleur, where the Earle of Somerset had lain; but it was in vaine, for the town was taken in the end, after a long and painful toyle of the Inhabitants, who could not be relieved in time by reason of these house troubles: and yet there was a second mischiefe, the Lord of Gaucourt, governor of the phin (a worthy servant to the King) returning from the siege, and carrying some of his baggage (which was scattered from the troupe) to retire, he was surprized by a company of English, and led prisoner to Rouen, to the great grief of Charles who loved him, having given good testimonies of his loyalty in his greatest extremities.

But in exchange Charles takes Conches and Louviers, (townes of importance) mandy from thence he came into Champagne, to suppress a part of these aduents, theues who had surprized some places in this Province, Musle l'Euesque, Montjay, &c. The Kings army (led by the Constable) takes them, and razed them by the sword, and pardoning most of these French Captains, among which were the baster Verge and the Lord of Commercy: but hee caused Alexander baster to take the Oath to be drowned, a notable theefe, who (having following the discontented army) had spoken unworthily of his Master. This execution of Justice is memorable, one of so high a birth, being followed the same year with the exemplary death of the Earle Marshall of France, killed from a great and famous house, who being found guilty of Negromancy and Sorcery, was condemned by the Court of Parliament of Paris, and burnt at Nantes with some of his servants, culpable of the same crimes. Hee is figured for his valour, but neither his armes nor his blood could stay the hand of Justice, meritoriously executed by this iust decree of the Magistrate. Private Justice thy to be registred in the history, to shew that the greatest cannot escape the hand of God, they have long abused his patience. But the treaty of peace betwixt France and England being discontinued about a year, was againe renewed by the industry of the Duke of Bourgogne a Portugeuse, but much affected to the quiet of the Realme, and a very prudent woman, who had great credit with her husband. She follows it to wisely, and the two Kings sent their Ambassadors to Calais. On Charles his behalfe were Archbishops of Rheims and Northon, and the Earle of Dunois bastard of Orleans, Henry King of England, the Cardinal of Yorke, and the duke of Exeter, who lived with them Charles duke of Orleans, being so long kept prisoner in England.

This poore prince (after the languishing of so long a prison) was exceeding glad in some meane to returne to his house, having felt the ayre on this side the sea, and asked the Earle of Dunois, one of the branches of his house, who had so faithfully helped him in his afflictions: but hee grieved to see himselfe presently caryed backe into England, for that they could not agree vpon the fundamentall points, the English being resolved not to lease one foot of that which they held in France. And although the King consent they should freely enioy what they possessed, so as they held it as they had in times past of the Crowne of France by homage: yet would they not yield in any thing being loth to relinquish their pretended soveraignty. But hee refused which was a double loss. At this time they were enforced to cetyre with this resolution, that without changing any thing of the treaty begun, every one should goe home, and consider of their affaires, to assemble againe when need should require: the which either party desired. And this is all could be done for the generall. They proceeded farther for the duke of Orleans: but as in these trafficks such as hold the possession doe commonly use policy, the stronger giving law to the weaker, so in so precious a matter as life, the first must be sued vnto making no halt to deliver him, for that they drew great profit by the pension of this great Prince. Moreover, Charles had no great care of his being: for that some malicious spirits had seasoned him with some bad impression, that this poore Prince, perceiving him, that his long imprisonment was not without some mystery, and that hee had some mischiefe against the King and his estate. The which being miserable in so great a person, gave all men a iust cause of compassion. But notwithstanding all these difficulties, yet must this prince, (one of the goodliest plants of the Crowne) be now delivered, to leave a successor for the realme of France: and God would honour his race with the Crowne, had prepared an admirable meane for his delivery, by his help, from whom in reason he might least hope, even when his owne friends had abandoned him: who yet was said to be the King of France.

A notable example for all men in many respects: a prison of But and twenty years was spent in a prison, a prince borne to command, and yet captive to another. The full tale of his goods gave him a sufficient occasion to retire to perpetual misery, and to leave a successor to his posterity. In the end, standing alone, he was able to suppress him, and to deliver him, which hath his out for his assured treasure, had been able to suppress him. But God, who gouernes the rood wisely, gives him liberty, goods, and honour in due season, and the sight of this qualitie, which seeking to make the wicked, and to make the good, as well as prosperity, is then corrected when it seeks to corrupt another.

Philip having lived so long in the good name for the Duke of Orleans, and to with draw him from the prison, and to make him his word for it, and pay it, and to make him the Duke of Orleans being honorably conducted, to come first to Calais, where they were being paid, to come to the Duke of Bourgogne the Duke of Orleans his deliverer, who received him, and in the Duke of Orleans he could see. He was taken at Amboise, in the year 1440, and was delivered in 1446, on the 25 of November, by the means of his son, that had slain the Duke of Orleans, and he could continue his house. Being come to Philip, (having delivered him from his imprisonment, and promised to hold him for his father) he wears a perpetual chain, which is confirmed by the marriage of Mary of Cleves the daughter of Philip with the Duke, and then he swears to the treaty of Arras, except the Article of the marriage contracted on the person of the Duke of Bourgogne, whereof hee was to come, and for confirmation of this solemn league, he takes the order of the golden fleece, to be in the hands of Philip, and is admitted into the number of his Knights. He had two great enemies and became great friends by so memorable an occasion.

The Duke of Bourgogne had his private considerations for the safety and quiet of his house, hee himselfe raised to greatness: But as it is no less vertue to keep them to get, and that his blood, profit, dutie, and necessity commanded him to hold firme for the French party, as the greatest and most assured for the good of his affairs: so likewise hee considered that he should need some worthy friend neere the King, on whom he might confidently relye. And what greater personage then the Duke of Orleans, the first Prince of the blood, and what greater bond to free him from captivity, necessary also forcing him therunto, for it was very apparant that this Prince being freed from prison, had the like action against Philip, that Philip had against the King, for although Philip had not slain his father, yet was hee thought to be the murderer, and the quarrell and hatreds be hereditary in these great houses, where discontents and wrongs goe from father to sonne: being also likely that the King discontented to haue beene forced by his subject to aske him forgiveness in the view of all Europe, would maintaine the sight of his blood, in a Prince that had once wronged him, against his reconciled enemy, whose friendship hee had so dearly bought: wherein hee noted well the Kings humour, being suspicious, jealous, and impatient of any new authority, which (being able to oppose to life) he would neuer faile to cross in all occasions. Philip wisely foreseeing all these difficulties presented them, in assuring himselfe of the Duke of Orleans, and vpon so good consideration, suppressing thereby all doubt of danger, which he might thereafter feare. Herein we see a notable example, that we must not be despaire in the greatest crosses of this life, that quarrels must be mended, and others as they also friendship must be immortal. That the best meane to vanquish an enemy is to doe him all the good we can.

The honour of this good worke was not attributed to the duke of Bourgogne alone, but to the Duke of Orleans his wife, who was a great credit in drawing her husband to this reconciliation, as her predecessor did dishonour by the incensing of her husband against the Duke of Orleans, which grew that many which polluted these two houses with two tragical murders. The which honor is to pacific quarrels betwixt the houses of Anjou and the house of Orleans, which is matched, and contrariwise it is an impudent to show diffidence among kindred. God also blest the mediation of this worthy Princess in the marriage of Mary of Cleves, Nece to her husband, with the Duke of Orleans, by whom hee had Lewis the twelfth, which shall be King of France; and two daughters, the Kings house against the King himselfe, was by our Ancestors called the Praguerie. Nine months of this year being spent in these garboiles, Charles returns to Tourne, to provide for the raising of the siege of Harfleur, where the Earle of Somerset had lain long; but it was in vaine, for the towne was taken in the end, after a long and painfull continuance of the Inhabitants, who could not be relieved in time by reason of these house and troubles: and yet there was a second mischiefe, the Lord of Gaucourt gouernour of Dauphin (a worthy servant to the King) retreating from the siege, and causing some of his baggage (which was scattered from the troope) to retire, he was surprized by a company of English, and led prisoner to Rouen, to the great griefe of Charles who loved him, having given good testimonies of his loyalty in his greatest extremities.

But in exchange Charles takes Conches and Louviers, (townes of importance in Normandy) from thence he came into Champagne, to suppress a part of these adventuring knights who had surprized some places in this Province, Muffe l'Escuque, Montagu, and others. The Kings army (led by the Constable) takes them, and razed them by the Kings command, pardoning most of these thorough Captaines, among which were the baltard of Yerry and the Lord of Commercy: but hee caused Alexander baltard to take Duke of Orleans to be drowned, a notable theefe, who (having following the discontented Princes) had spoken unworthily of his Master. This execution of justice is memorable upon one of so high a birth, being followed the same year with the exemplary death of Syde de Raze, Marshall of France, killed from a great and famous house, who being found guilty of Negromancy and Sorcery, was condemned by the Court of Parliament of Brisney, and burnt at Nantes with some of his servants, culpable of the same crimes. Hee was hallored for his valour, but neither his armes nor his blood could stay the hand of Divine Justice, meritoriously executed by this iust decree of the Magistrate. Private actions worthy to be registered in the history, to shew that the greatest cannot escape the hand of God, after they have long abused his patience. But the treaty of peace betwixt France and England being discontinued above a year, was againe resumed by the industry of the Duke of Bourgoigne a Portugee, but much affected to the quiet of the Realme, and a very significant woman, who had great credit with her husband. She follows it so wisely, as in the end the two Kings sent their Ambassadors to Calais: On Charles his behalfe were the Archbishops of Rheims and Norwiche, and the Earle of Dunois baltard of Orleans. This year shall be full of Warre, and successfull for Charley in the which shall minister occasion to enter into the first treaty of peace, which having begun the year before, and little acquainted, shall be ended in the following year; after another manner than the English expected, Charles (seeing that the King of England by his cold delays, fought not openly to make his condition better (being taught thus) but also to draw him into long inconsequence, he refused to arm.)

The memorable siege of Pontoise.

The Duke of York goes with an army to relieve Pontoise.

The English had taken Creil upon Oize, and could not be dispossessed of Pontoise, a towne of importance for the necessities of Paris. The King resolves to take it himself. The Admirall of Coitivy besiegeth Creil, and sent thither in the Kings presence Thomas the way is made to Pontoise where the siege was memorable, being well fortified and well defended, but in the end it was taken by Charles for the good of France. He lodged at the Abbey of Maubouillon, accompanied with his Count the Dauphin of Viennois, Charles of Anjou, the Earle of Clermont, the Constable of France, the Cardinals of Loheac and Soignies, Louis of Luxemburg, Earle of Saint Paul, and of Piquet, who brought with him a goodly troop of men from the Duke of Bourgogne, with some of the City of Tournay, who were a gallant squadron of their citizens. Thence went both French & Bourgogne under the same Ensignes, against the common enemy of Britain. There went to the Earles of Eu, Albret & Vendôme, the Vidame of Chateaux, the Lords of Clugny, Tancarville, Joigny, Mornell in Bay, Buell, Mouy, la Tour, Angoul, Longueil, Mayne, court, Suze, Chabannes, Flavy, Saint Symon, Mailly, Penelad, Blancheville, and other brave Captaines, La Hire, Patton and Flaque, with an infinit company of the Nobility, who added their valour to the number of the souldiers which they had brought with the King. The City of Paris sent a goodly troupe, so as Charles had twelve thousand fighting men. At the first approach the Bastion upon the Bridge next to Maubouillon was taken by La Hire, on the other side against the Abbey of Saint Martin, they make a bridge with a great Bastion, where they lodge three thousand Archers, yet the towne was not so easily besieged, but rather lent in both men and victuals.

The Duke of York goes with an army to relieve Pontoise.

Whilst that Charles stood discontented with this when he beheld a greater braudo, for the Duke of York (Lieutenant generall for Henry K. of England) comes to Cency, & Hoonville, places very neere to Pontoise, with a goodly army of six thousand, & sends his Herald unto Charles to offer him battell. Charles (who by the advice of his council would not commit this successfull beginning of his affaires to the hazard of a battell) returns them with no other answer, but that he should have his belly full sooner then he liked. The river of Oize was betwixt both armies. Charles resolves to keepe the passages from Pontoise to Beaumont; and the Duke of York to pass the river in despite of the French, and to this end he caused many small boats of leather, wood & cords to be brought, with other stuff fit to make bridges. The bridge of Beaumont was guarded by the French, but the English passed an Abbey beneath the bridge, and with such danger in their artificial boats, as some valiant men might have slayed a great army, but the silence of the night so favoured their passage, as a great part of the English army was past before our Sentinels had discovered them. Then was there no remedy but to adventure the King of the enemies passage.

Charles retires from Pontoise.

The Duke of York (having thus happily passed the river, and rid his souldiers that night marching in goodly order towards Charles, meaning to charge him: Charles takes equall of his fears covered with this resolution, not to hazard a general battell, but he was likely to have fallen into another inconvenience, for without awaiting of the day, he puts all the weightiest of his carriages into the fort of Saint Martin, under the guard of Charles of Anjou, and the Admirall of Chitivy with two thousand men, and with them La Hire, Roubaix, Estouteville, with other resolute Captaines: and so leaving his lodging of Maubouillon he retires to Poissy. The Duke of York takes up his lodging at Maubouillon, being abandoned, and makes a show to attempt the fort of Saint Martin, but having tried his way, he takes his way to Poissy, & lodges before the towne in view of the King and his army. There were some skirmishes without any great success; Charles continuing his resolution to hazard nothing, and York his project to victall and starve Pontoise. So the English retires to Mantz, to send refreshings from thence to the besieged, but this great braudo came to nothing. The beginning was dishonourable for the King, but the end

A end was both happy and honourable. Being retired to Saint Denis, and having sent the Constable unto Paris, he resolves to send to Pontoise, and to winne it or to die. The reason was, that this his retreat or rather flight was so infamously spoken of by the greatest in Court, and so odious to the Parisians, (who had defraidd a great part of the charge at this siege) as it was to be feared they would make some mutiny against him, if the successe were not good. His spies did likewise assure him that the Princes of his blood (especially since the returne of the Duke of Orleans) were resolved to make some extraordinary assembly, and to admonish him touching the government. It chanced then that the Earles of S. Pol and Vaudemont (notable partisans of the Duke of Bourgogne) left the King, when he had most need of succours, and they of Tournay were of the same party. He had the Dauphin with him, whom he caused to watch diligently both day and night. But how could he doubt that these tricks came not out of the Bourgognons' budget? Choller banished feare, so as being resolved to reparaire this error, and to prevent his enemies practices, he runs to Pontoise (for he was but ten dayes away) and giving the Duke of York no leisure to releue the besieged, he resolves to take it by force. This indignation succeeded happily. He caused three assaults to be given on three parts, and at the first he wonne our Ladies Church which is without the towne, whereby he might greatly annoy the besieged. He took this quarter for himselfe, accompanied with the Earles of Marche, Albret and Tancarville. The Dauphin was at the Port Eiche looking to the river of Oize. C with the Earle of Maine, the Admirall and the great master of the Crossbowes. On the other side of the Battery was the Constable, the Marshall of Loheac, the Lords of Mouy, Tournay, Suze, Serran, Sanzay and the Vidame of Chartres.

The Cannon being planted of all sides, and a reasonable breach made, the French enter furiously, and the King with the first (of such force is resolution in a great Prince,) to animate a whole army, as the head gives life to the whole body. The English were consumed like to straw in the fire, and five hundred were slaine at this entry, and four hundred taken prisoners. The Inhabitants were spared (by the careful command of Charles) who acknowledging the happinesse of this victory to come from God, goes to give him thanks, offering him the first fuits of this victory: for without doubt if he had failed, his enemies D were ready to conspire against him.

Pontoise taken by assault.

He calls together all the Princes, Noblemen and Captaines of the army. Hee thanks them for the good and faithfull service they had done him in this notable occasion. Hee makes the Lord of Alons Marshall of France, and many Knights. He called for him that first entred the breach, commends his valour, and rewards him with an honourable pension. But why hath the History concealed this honest mans name, his reward had beene immortal? Such was the issue of the siege of Pontoise, remarkable for many circumstances, but then very considerable for the Kings affaires, who had an honourable reuenge of the English braudo. But as one good hap follows another when it pleaseth God, so Charles received many good aduertisements at the same instant.

E The English drew together many garisons in the country of Maine, from Mans, Fretoy and Mahinne la lueze, and had sackt Saint Denis in Anjou. The French which were in Sable, Laul and Saint Sufanne, led by the Lord of Buell, meet them laden with spoyle, and very ioyfull; they charge them, defeat and kill them, leaving four hundred upon the place. Peter of Brezeiffles out of Conches and surpriseth the English at Beaumont le Roger: sleeping without feare, he awakes them with the sword, kills them & takes the towne. John Floquet doth likewise about the same time take Eureux (a towne of very great importance in Normandy) the meanes is memorable, a fisherman makes a hole in the wal, whereby he enters in the night, and becomes master of the towne. But in exchange they receive a checke. The Captaines and souldiers which had taken many prisoners in at Pontoise, had compounded with an English Captain for their ransom, who had taken the debt upon him. The prisoners were kept at Cornille, a Castle neere unto Chartres. While they expected money, this Mediator having free liberty to go and come, observes all the passages so well, as he founde faine meanes to pay all these ransomes, for one morning he surpriseth the place, frees the prisoners, and takes all them that had them in guard.

The Parisians honour Charles at his returne, whom they were ready to devour, if the successe of Pontoise had not bin good. The Duke of Bourgogne sends his wife unto him for many respects, who returned with no great satisfaction: and Charles Duke of Orleans (who

(who had not yet seene him since his returne from prison) comes vnto him with a goodly traine: the King receiues him very graciously, and allowed well the excuses of his long delay, and to crosse the Duke of Bourgogne, he giues his cousin of Orleans towards the payment of his ranfome, a hundred and fifty thousand franks: a very great some in those dayes, which was not giuen for nothing in so great a necessitie of the Kings affaires. Lewis of Luxembourgh and the widow of John of Luxembourgh, partisans to the Bourgignon, doe homage to Charles, and yeeld the towne of Marle vnto him: theif be fruits no doubt of thir victory at Bonfotte. In the meane time the Princes assemble at Neuers, the Dukes of Bourgogne, Bourbon and Alençon, with the Earle of Vendosme. The Duke of Britany sent his Ambassador, not able to come himselfe, for that he was not yet in the Kings good graces.

There were for the most part priuie discontents, tending to euery mans private interest. As persons being maintained in their degrees, to be called to Councells, respected in their aduices, honoured in their charges, payed their pensions, and eased in their lands. But the zeale of the publicke good, shadowed all with a shew of iustice, peace, order, and respect to the people. It was the Kings will, that he should proceed more speedily in the treaty of peace with the English, which had become coldly followed. That he should supply his Parliaments with good and sufficient men, and thereby provide for the offices and not for the persons, that by their fault, full of rage, might be shorned, and speedy iustice administered without delay, or respect of favour to the parties. That he should provide for the ease of the subiects overcharged, rule the conduct of his officers in their assignments, and extorsions, the which were daily committed vnder too apparent an excuse, that the lawieler was not payed. That he should giue honours without respect of former passed misdeeds, and declare all his subiects capable of offices and dignities indifferently, not remembering what was past. That he should haue a competent number of graue men in his great Councell, worthy of that charge, and not to commit the government of the affaires of the Realme to two or three, as had beene done in former times. These are the chiefe points of their demands, as some word by word out of the Originall.

Charles was nothing pleased with these assemblies, made both in his absence and without his prauity, whereby many inconueniences must ensue, all being done without his authority. But being taught by his owne experience, he digested this kind of affront quietly, being loath to alter any thing as such a sealon, when as he had no need of new enemies: and hauing excused what had beene done, or contented euery private person, he proceeded to the principall, which was the establishment of the affaires of the Realme. The disorders of men of warre were insupportable, the which must be reformed, but that which troubled the King was the siege of Tartas, remarkable by this circumstance.

Tartas is a towne in Gasconie belonging to the house of Albret. This towne was besieged by Capitaine de Buch, a great Noblemen of that country, and of the English faction. It was concluded for the extreme necessitie of the country, that there should be a successe of armes, and libertie of free traffike in that Prouince, vntill Midsummer following, vpon condition that if the King did not succour the towne by that day, it should yeeld to the English; but else the French should remaine in free possession without any controuersie. And for assurance of this treaty, the eldest sonne of the Lord of Albret should remaine in hostage. The matter was of great weight, being not only a question of the losse of a place of great importance, but of the Kings reputation, who leauing his subiects, was in danger to be abandoned by them, and so to lose all Gasconie, where the English had gotten many partisans. Charles providing carefully for his affaires, giues two blowes with one stone, whereby he strooke both the theucnes and the English. He armed with exceeding speed, hauing drawne together foure thousand horse, eight thousand archers, & eight thousand other foot. An infinite number of great personages, and voluntary Noblemen posted to this iourney, as to a solemne assignation whereon depended the quiet and honour of France. The Dauphin did accompany him in this voyage. Charles of Anion Earle of Maine, the Constable of Richmond, the Earles of March, Eu, Calfres, Foix and Lomaigne the election of the Lord of Armagnac: the Lords of Albret, Gaure, Cominge, Efrac, Tartas, Tancerville, & Montgaston the eldest son to the Earle of Boulougne & Auvergne, and Philip of Culant Admiral of France, with an infinite number of gallant Nobility. Thus Charles parting from Paris, comes first to Saumur, whither John Duke of Britany sent his Ambassadors, to offer him homage and men. Shame, to haue so often left him in

The Princes admonitions to the King and their demands.

All his extremities, would not suffer him to see the King, although the Constable was a good mediator for him. He returned to the King the fort of Bais and Patus which remained all the country of Poitou, and Charles gave them in giue to the Constable. He thene he passed into Poitou, and provides that Montpelier and Saint-John should be more trouble the people: he then comes into Kaintonge, which had beene made vnder the Lord of Pons, who humbled himselfe vpon thinking, that his sight would bring peace. Taillebourg was taken by force, and the theucnes punished. Breuete was taken, and so. Thus Charles spent this yeare against the theucnes, which had surprised some borderes.

The next yeare was happily employed against the English, who had made a great breach in Gasconie, and thereabouts, where the English had gotten deep rooting by the ancient and lawfull possession of this Province. In the end of this yeare the whole Prouince remained his, but the prouidence of God impaire his blessings by the greces. Hauing thus pacified Poitou and Kaintonge, he comes to Limoges, and to the Tholouse, which was the Rendezvous of all his troopes. Being armed, he goes not far from them of Tartas, that they should continue firme, and that they should be seduced by the prefixed day: but as he labours on the one side to settle his affaires, so the English on the other side seek to overthrow them.

Richard Talbot comes out of England into Normandy with two thousand men, and the Duke of York leuied men in the country at selfe, & places of their obedience, goes to hold with foure thousand men. With these forces he thins to take all the Chastels held in that Prouince, where he had left the Earle of Dunois and the Viscount of Chastreuil for the guard of those place: but this enterprise had small successe. Talbot besieges Conches, and as the same instant the Earle of Dunois Galardon (a place holding for the English to cause aduersion. Talbot hauing taken Conches, the Earle leaves Galardon, having no reason to hazard his small troope against so great forces, and puts them into Garlons making a defense warre, attending the successe of Tartas. Talbot fearing that Galardon should be surprized by the French doth rage it, and this was all.

Lewyns returne to Tholouse, to conduct Charles from thence to Tartas, for effect the weight of his affaires. Assignment is given, it must be held. To conclude, the King comes at the appointed time, with a goodly & mighty army: the condition is performed, he demands his hostages, and the effect of the accord. So young Aluer is delivered, Tartas continues vnder his obedience, the day honourably kept, and all the Prouince in quiet. Tartas thus victoriously assured, Charles resolves both to husband the occasion with his forces, and to proceed farther. Saint-Seur was held by Thomas Rameston with a hundred men as times, and foureteen hundred Crosbowes, and fortified what might be in those dayes. Charles takes it by force, slew the greatest part of the English, and takes the Commander prisoner. Acqs having endured a siege of sixe weekes is yielded by composition. The Earle of Poix was with the King, and employed both his person, men, and meanes to doe him seruice: but the impatience of the French thrust them vpon his country, where they committed many insolencies. The Bearnois discontented with the French, assembles his forces and chargeth them as enemies, but they had their reuenge for they fell vpon this ill-armed multitude, and slue seven hundred, to the great griefe of Charles, fearing that this escape might alter his affaires: but the Earles discretion covered this exerce, and Charles continued his course. Agen held for him, from thence he summons Tonnais, Marmande and Port Saint Mary which yeeld him obedience. Reole being obdurate, was besieged, and assailed with difficulty, but in the end it was taken.

The sharpe Winter hindring the course of the river of Garonne, for the withdrawing of the Army made the siege long and difficult, and gaue the English meanes to recover St. Seur and Acqs, not very well guarded: but the Earle of Poix winnes Saint-Seur againe. And the Earle of Lomaigne Acqs, a great number of the Nobility of the country (forced to make a good shew during the English command) submit themselves to the King, as the Lords of Puols, Raulan, Roquetaillade, & Pelegrie. Thus Charles hauing made the Lord of Cotigny, Senechal of Guicourt, gouernor of a new conquered country, he makes his returne into France, being at Montauban he losse the two great captains so famous in his reign, Talbot and Aluer, more gish in vertue and honour than in substance: yee Poisson, was master of the Kings horse, and the son was faithful. (who had not yet scene him since his returne from prison) comes vnto him with a goodly traine: the King receiues him very graciously, and allowed well the excuses of his long delay, and to crosse the Duke of Bourgongne, he giues his cousin of Orleans towards the payment of his ranfome, a hundred and fifty thousand franks: a very great some in those dayes, the which was not giuen for nothing in so great a necessitie of the Kings affaires. Lewis of Luxembourg and the widow of John of Luxembourg, partisans to the Bourgignon, doe homage to Charles, and yeld the towne of Marle vnto him: these be fruits no doubt of the victory at Bontoife. In the meane time the Princes assemble at Neucers, the Dukes of Bourgongne, Bourbon and Alençon, with the Earle of Vendosme. The Duke of Brittain sent his Ambassador, not able to come himselfe, for that he was not yet in the Kings good fauour.

There were for the most part priuate discontentes, tending to euery mans priuate interest. As notes be maintained in their degrees, to be called to Councels, respected in their aduice, and enuoyed in their charges, payed their pensions, and eased in their lands. But the zeale of the publique good shadowed all with a shew of Iustice, peace, order, and reliefe of the people. That is to witte the King should proceed more speedily in the treaty of peace with the English, for which had beene so coldly followed. That he should supply his Parliaments with good and sufficient men, to be ready to provide for the offices and not for the persons, that by their fault, full diligence might be shortned, and speedy Iustice administered without delay, or respect of either of the parties. That he should provide for the ease of the subject overcharged, rule the soldiers against robberies, ransomings, and extorsions, the which were daily committed vnto too apparent an excuse, that the lawier was not payed. That he should giue honours without respect of former dishonours, and declare all his subjects capable of Offices and dignities indifferently without remembrance what was past. That he should haue a competent number of graue men in his great Councell worthy of that charge, and not to commit the government of the affaires of the Realme to two or three, as had beene done in former times. These are the chiefe points of their demands, as was word by word out of the Originall.

Charles was nothing pleased with these assemblies, made both in his absence and without his prauity, whereby many inconueniences must ensue, all being done without his authority. But being taught by his owne experience, he digested this kind of affront quietly, and being loath to alter any thing at such a season, when as he had no need of new enemies: and hauing rather excused what had beene done, or contented euery priuate person, he proceeded to the principall, which was the establishment of the affaires of the Realme. The disorders of men of warre were insupportable, the which must be reformed, but that which troubled the King was the siege of Tartas, remarkable by this circumstance.

Tartas is a towne in Gasconie belonging to the house of Albret. This towne was besieged by Capitail de Buch, a great Nohleman of that country, and of the English faction. It was concluded for the extreme necessitie of the country, that there should be a success of armes, and libertie of free trafficke in that Prouince, vntill Midfomer following, vpon condition that if the King did not succour the towne by that day, it should yeld to the English: or else the French should remaine in free possession without any controuersie. And for assurance of this treaty, the eldest sonne of the Lord of Albret should remaine in hostage. The matter was of great weight, being not onely a question of the losse of a place of great importance, but of the Kings reputation, who leauing his subjects, was in danger to be abandoned by them, and so to lose all Gasconie, where the English had gotten many partisans. Charles providing carefully for his affaires, giues two blowes with one stone, where with he strooke both the thecues and the English. He armed with exceeding speed, having drawne together foure thousand horse, eight thousand archers, & eight thousand other foot. An infinite number of great personages, and voluntary Noblemen posted to this iourney, as to a solemne assignation whereon depended the quiet and honour of France. The Dauphin did accompany him in this voyage, Charles of Anion Earle of Maine, the Constable of Richmond, the Earles of March, Eu, Caftres, Foix and Lomaigne the eldest sonne of the Lord of Armagnac: the Lords of Albret, Gaure, Cominge, Estrac, Tartas, Tancarville, & Montgafcon the eldest son to the Earle of Boulongne & Auvergne, and Philip of Culant Admirall of France, with an infinite number of gallant Nobility. Thus Charles parting from Paris, comes first to Saumur, whither John Duke of Brittain sent his Ambassadors, to offer him homage and men. Shame, to haue so often left him in

All his enemies, would not suffer him to seeke King, although the Countesse was a good mediator for him. He resorted to the King the fift of Effait, and with him annointed all the country of Poitou, and Charles gaue them in guard to the Countesse. From thence he passed into Poitou, and provides that Marcell, and Saint Martin should not more trouble the people: he then comes into Xaintonge, which had beene much troubled by the Lord of Pons, who humbled himselfe vnto the King, promising to restore peace. Taillebourg was taken by force, and the thecues punished. Breuer was taken and ransomed. Thus Charles spent this year against thecues who had surprised some towncs. The next year was happily employed against the English in open enemies, making a great breach in Gascony and thereabouts, where the English had gotten the possession by the ancient and lawfull possession of his Ancestors. In the end of this yeere the whole Prouince remained his, but the prebendite of God imparted the blessing to the French. Having thus pacified Poitou and Xaintonge, he comes to Languedoc, and to the Tholouza, which was the Repedeuous of all his troops. Being armed he giues notice to them of Tartas, that they should continue firme, and that they should be reled by the prefixed day: but as he labours on the one side to settle his affaires, so the English on the other side seeke to ouerthrow them.

Richard Talbot comes out of England into Normandy with two thousand men, and the Duke of York hauing leuied men in the country at selfe, & places of their obedience, goes to hold with foure thousand men. With these forces he comes to take all that Charles held in that Prouince, where he had left the Earle of Dunois and the Vidame of Chartres for the guard of those place: but this enterprize had small successe. Talbot besieges Conches, and at the same instant the Earle of Dunois Galardon (a place holding for the English) to cause aduersion. Talbot hauing taken Conches, the Earle leaves Galardon, hauing no reason to hazard his small troupe against so great forces, and puts them into Garfion, making a defensive warre, attending the successe of Tartas. Talbot fearing that Galardon should be surprized by the French, doth rage it, and this was all.

Leuys now returne to Tholouza to conduct Charles from thence to Tartas, for there lieth the weight of his affaires. Assignation is giuen, it must be held. To conclude, the King comes at the appointed time, with a goodly & mighty army: the condition is performed, he demands his hostages, and the effect of the accord. So young Albret is deliuered, Tartas continues vnder his obedience, the day honourably kept, and all the Prouince in quiet. Tartas thus victoriously assured, Charles resolves both to husband the occasion with his forces, and to proceed farther. Saint Seuer was held by Thomas Ramseu with a hundred men at armes, and foureteen hundred Crosbowes, and fortified what might be in those dayes. Charles takes it by force, slew the greatest part of the English, and takes the Commander prisoner. Acqs hauing endured a siege of fixe weekes is yielded by composition. The Earle of Poix was with the King, and employed both his person, men, and meanes to doe him seruice: but the impatience of the French thrust them vpon his country, where they committed many insolencies. The Bearnois discontented with the French, assembles his forces and chargeth them as enemies, but they had their reuenge for they fell vpon this ill-armed multitude, and slue seven hundred, to the great griefe of Charles, fearing that this escape might alter his affaires: but the Earles discretion covered this excess, and Charles continued his course. Agen held for him, from whence he summons Toncins, Marmande and Port Saint Mary which yeld him obedience. Reole being obstinate was besieged, and assailed with difficulty, but in the end it was taken.

The sharpe Winter (hindring the route of the ruer of Garonne, for the victualing of the Army) made the siege long and difficult, and gaue the English meane to recover Saint Seuer and Acqs, not very well guarded: but the Earle of Foix winnes Saint Seuer againe, and the Earle of Lomaigne Acqs. A great number of the Nobility of the country (forced to make a good shew during the English command) submit themselves to the King, as the Lords of Puils, Raufan, Roquetaillade & Pelegue. Thus Charles hauing made the Lord of Cotigny, Seneschal of Guichen, gouernor of that conquered country, he makes his returne into France. Being at Montauban he lofthold two great captains for famous in his reign, Pailhon and La Hire, more pish in venture and honour then in assistance: yet Pailhon was master of the Kings horse, and his son was Marshall. La Hire left for his chiefe wealth the immortal memory of his loyalty and valour, the which he happily employed in the greatest greatest necessity of this Crowne. Names in truth most worthy to be consecrated to the perpetuall memory of posterity, for a president to such as manage armes, and make great profession of honour. And with what title were these most honoured, for their virtues or for their Castles? A happy exchange, to change perishing gold, which oftentimes makes him hatefull that loves it, with the pleasing smell of immortal praise. And a reprobable ambition amidst the reproches of this golden age, which loatheth gold more than honour.

So Montauban was a tombe for their bodies, and the whole world the Epitaph of their praises. At that instant and in the same place, Charles ended the controuersie of the Earldome of Cominges. Isane daughter to the Earle of Cominge and Boulogne (married at the first to John duke of Berry, soone to King John,) was after his decease married to Mathew Earle of Castel-bon, of the house of Foix. She had one daughter by this Mathew, but in that there was no good agreement betwixt them, she makes a Will to bridle her husband, that by virtue of the authority of a father, he should not enjoy her living, insinuating King Charles the seventh her heire, in case her daughter died without lawfull heires. In disdaine of this Testament, Mathew much younger then she, and who had not taken her but for her crowne, kept her prisoner, an aged woman of foure score yeares.

The daughter of Isane of Cominges being dead, the Earldome belonged vnto the King as lawfull heire, by the donation of Isane the lawfull heire. So Charles was bound by a double bond to defend the gray heires of this old woman, against the insolency of her cruell husband, who finding himselfe supported by the fauour of the Earle of Foix and Armagnac his cousin (having already seized vpon some townes of Cominges, and playing the petty King, during the confusion of times and the neighbor-hood of the English, thought all things to be lawfull. The King adiournes them both to appeare at Tholous (whereas then he established a Parliament for all the Countreies of Languedoc, Foix, Cominge, Gaure, Quercy, Armagnac, Estrac, Lomaigne, Magnac, Bigorre and Rouergue) Mathew deliuered Isane his wife into the Kings hands, and it was decreed by the Court of Parliament (the which they note to be the first of this solemne assembly) that Isane should liue in free liberty out of Mathewes power, and should enioy the moiety of the revenues of Cominge, & the rest should go into the Kings cofers. The Earle of Foix & Armagnac yielded vp the townes of Cominges which he had flurped, and was adiourned vnto Paris, to yeeld an account of many rebellions whereof he was accused, especially for that he set in his titles, Bernard by the grace of God, Earle, &c. A marke fit for soveraignty, the which appertaines not to Seigneuries subiect to this Crowne.

Thus Charles remembers lawes in the heate of warre, but it requires another Commission to execute this decree by force of armes, after the death of Isane, who being conducted to Poitiers, liued not long in this liberty. Charles being returned to Poitiers about the moneth of March, resolves to imploy his sonne Lewis, both to fashion him to affaires, and to draw him from such as would seduce him. He giues him the gouernment of those countries which lie betwixt the riuers of Suze and Seine. For the well imploying of this new authoritie, there were two goodly occasions presented one vpon another. Deepe was reduced to the Kings obedience, this was a great anyance to Rouen: for the freeing whereof the duke of Yoike doth besiege it, raising forts to keepe them from all reliefe. This siege had continued nine moneths, very tedious to the besieged, when as behold the Dauphin accompanied with the Earles of Dunois, and Saint Pol, and the Lord of Gaucourt, assailes these forts and forceth them, kills three hundred English, and many Normans, either by the sword or water, and so frees Deepe.

This occasion was followed by another, which chanced in a manner at the same instant. Isane Countesse of Cominges dies at Poitiers, soone after she had tasted the aire of liberty, and the good cheere which Charles made her. Vpon the report of her death Bernard Earle of Armagnac seizeth vpon the townes of Cominges, Doree, Lile in Dodon, Samathan and Lombres, and preparing to warre, he leaues troopes in Arragon, by Salazard a Captaine of that country, causing John of Lescun a bastard of Armagnac to invade the Kings territories. This exesse might haue proued very preiudiciall, when as Charles sends Lewis his sonne into Languedoc, with a thousand horse, to quench this mischief in the breeding. Being armed at Rouergue, all yeelds vnto him. Euery thing is opposite to the Earle of Armagnac, The Earles of Perdiac and la Marche, the chiefe supporters of his insolency, insolency, leaue him in the plaine field. Salazard doth likewise abandon him: of such force is a royall matter against a bad cause.

The Earle of Armagnac (seeing himselfe thus abandoned) thrusts himselfe into Lisle Jordan, to dispute his pretensions with more aduantage, but he thrusts himselfe into the yole, for he was taken by Lewis, and led prisoner to Carcassone. These happy exploits did greatly recommend the Dauphins iudgment and valour, whom all men held worthy of a great command. Charles having commended him for so well doing, would haue sent him backe against the Earle of Somerset, who had raised a great army on the frontiers of Normandy & Britany, the which was like vnto a fire of straw, for having taken la Guiche by force, hee left it as loone for money, and so retired with his army without any other exploit. The heat of the English grew more temperate touching the chiefe points of their affaires. They stood vpon tearmes in the two first fruitlesse assemblies made for peace: but now they seeke the King. The Earle of Suffolke writes vnto him that he hath commandement from the King his Master, not onely to renew the treaty of peace discontinued, but also to finde meanes to marry him in France, hee receiues a fauourable answer from Charles, and vnder his safe-conduct comes to him to Tours. Charles continued still in an humour to loue peace, and to seeke it, but the Earle of Suffolke, and the Lord Roffe had no charge but to treat of a generall truce, the which they concluded for a yeare and a halfe: but this shall bee a goodly occasion to send home the English. After a shewer comes a sun-shine, and euen experience teacheth, that after a great rainge comes a long drought. Now we shall see nothing but truces, one after another, marriages and alliances, during foure yeares, which is a preparatiue to a ciuill peace for about a hundred yeares.

This truce being made, they must now seeke warres elsewhere, so fruitfull is our vanity of change, so as we cannot liue without suffering or doing harme to others: when as they treated of this truce, it was demanded by the Ambassadors of both Kings what their men of warre should doe? This truce (say they) will be more chargeable vnto vs then warre, for they must liue: They haue not beene accustomed to worke, and yet they will make good cheere, neither can the poore people endure any more. Moreover, if they haue no worke, they will fight with themselves: wee must therefore calme this storme, and send them to such as loue vs not.

This was the cause of the war in Suisseland, whereof Lewis was generall, leading both French and English vnder the same ensignes. Mathew Guesche was Colonell of the English forces, for the King of England, vnder the Dauphins command. Hee entred with his army into the territory of Basle, and the Country of Elsas, betwixt Basle and Strasbourg, one of the goodliest and most fertile Provinces of Germany, they terrified Metz, took Montbeliard, and filled all those Countreies with feare and combustion. The moniues of this extraordinary enterprize, may well bee oblerued by that which I haue said: but these causes were farre fetcht, and not to be embraced by two Kings, who but euen now tormented one another, especially by Charles, who having suffered so many crosses, should haue horror to cause others to feele the like without constraint, yet he found a pin for all these holes. Charles would haue his sonne take Montbeliard, to be reuenged of the Gouernor, for the wrong he had done him, spoiling his Country as farre as Langres in his greatest necessity. He assailed the Suisses (and namely the of Basle) being fauourers of Eugenius against Felix his competitor, that is to say, against that Amedee D. of Savoy, who had so crossed him in his affaires, whom he could neuer loue what frowner hee made in policy. And for that Germany, and that quarter neere vnto Suisseland supported Felix against Eugenius, he therefore hated them. And to gratifie Rent King of Sicilia, who had a priuate quarrell against the City of Metz, he turned his forces against it. But what meaning fower Charles had herein, hee embraced this voluntary war with an incredible affection, as if it had beene to defend the heart of his Realme. He himselfe came to Espinall, and having sent his army before to Metz, hee continued the siege five moneths, vntill the Citizens had paid 200000 Crownes for the charges of the warre, and acquitted King Rent of 100000 Florins of gold, which they had lent him in his necessity. Lewis the Dauphin parting from Montbeliard ruines Portentry, in disdaine of the Bishop, a great solicitor against Eugenius, and from thence he enters into the territories of Basle with this goodly and flourishing army, tyed together with so many severall strings,

The French and English sent to war in Suifferland.

1444. hee encouraged 4000 Swisses, being resolute to defend their Country. The English part of them were cut in peeces, but they sold their lives deere, for the Germane Histories report that we lost above 3000 men, although we had the victory.

The Emperor Frederick the third, (a Prince which otherwise loved peace,) upon the complaints of the Cities lying along the Rhine, caused that to be done: To wit, Lewis turned into Loraine fearing to be too far engaged in an enemies Country, whom he had invaded against reason: yet Frederick sent his Ambassadors to Charles, to renew the ancient alliances. So the word of people-eaters passed, falling upon divers quarters both for ever of battle in a field of ripe corn, leaving nothing memorable but a notable example of rashness, making a warre which was neither necessary nor just, afflicting quiet peaceable people without any occasion: Whilest that France and England made sufficient land to weede. Henry the sixt King of England, married with Marguerite of Anion, daughter to the Duke of Anion, and of Lorraine, and King of Sicile and Naples: The Earle of Suffolke fetcht her from Nancy, where Charles was resident, whilest that his army afflicted these poore people. Hee feared and conducted this Princess as his owne daughter, with tokens of joy: but this joy was suddenly converted into heavinesse, by the death of the Dauphins wife his daughter in law, whom he loved deely for her vertues, which made her amiable to all France. She was one of the chiefest in this great solemnity, from the which she went to the bed of death: her death was the sepulcher of her Mother, the widow of James King of Scots, who came to see her: and whilest her funeralls were making, her sisters came from Scotland to attend on her, nay rather to defend with her into the grave, if the humanity of Charles had not requied them, giving them house meanes to maintaine their estates in France. Thus passeth the Ocean of this miserable life, in the which there is more cause of mourning then of joy, both in great and small: The marriage likewise of England, wherein were so great shewes of joy, shall end with a lamentable Tragedy, as we shall see hereafter. The truce was so pleasing to both Realmes, that before it was expired, the Kings of France and England renewt for five yeares more, in hope of a perfect peace, promising by their severall writings published generally, to meet together within like moneths in some convenient place, to confirme this peace so generally desired of all their subjects. And so confirme the assurance of their promises, the English deliver Mans to Charles, with all that he held in the County of Mayen, but he put into the hands of King Rene his father in law, Francis Duke of Britany doth homages to the King for the Duchy of Britanie and the Earldome of Montfort. This was at Calnon: but some moneths after there chanced a tragicall disaster in that house. Francis suspecting that Gyles his brother would deale treacherously with him, by the too familiar correspondency he had with the English, caused him to be put in prison, by the Council and care of Charles who had sent him 400 lances, under the command of the Admiral Coigny. But they dealt worse with him, causing him to die in prison for hunger. The history of Britanie describes this accident very plausibly, but it is true that Gyles dyed being prisoner with his brother Peter, who survived him not long after, having a great remorse for this tragick accident. In the rest of this yeare, and the three following, there is nothing memorable, but the pursuits which Charles made for the re-union of the Church. But not to breake off the course of our history, which is properly to treat of that which concernes our estate, we referre it for a more convenient place: A worke in truth notoriety of a great Monarch, but of a peaceable time, that in the peace of the state, we may see the peace of the Church. The souldiers insolvency was nothing abated by this voyage of Germany: They returne more fiesht, then before against the poore labourer. Charles made new orders to restrain them, causing them to be daely observed: but the increasing violence of the English increased daely, not only by the negligence, but by the command of such as had the charge. The Duke of Yorke being called home into England, the Duke of Somersets succeeded him, a proud man, who thinking to do better then the rest, did absolutely ruine the English affaires in France. Hee dispensed with his souldiers in all their villanies, and kept them ready to breake the truce, vpon any profitable occasion. In the meane time the souldiers ordinary practice was to stand in Sentinell, to surprize some good house in the Countrey, being ill guarded: to rob it, spoile it, and carry away the prisoners by unknowne waies. To this end they had their spies, their guides, and their traitors. The fields were full of robberies, by men disguised in strange and fearful habits,

A habits, being masked when they espied their prey: and therefore they called them counterfeit faces. But to draw men into danger, they marched like passengers, expecting the commodity to surprize them. There is heard nothing but complaints of violence. All the pursuits which were made to repair the breaches of truce, did but increase the paine and charges of the interested.

But of these small disorders committed by the souldiers, there grew so great an inconvenience, as in the end it filled up the measure against the English, being hated & detested of all the French, for their pride and insolency. Fongeres a Towne of Britany vpon the confines of Normandy, then very rich and populous, being without guard vnder the assistance of the truce, was easily surprized by Francis of Surienne, called the Arragonois, a Knight of the order of the Garter, and a great Captaine vpon the marches of France, obeying the English. The town being surprized by him, (being accompanied with fixe or seven hundred souldiers) suffered all the miseries that might be. They kill, spoile and sacke, ravish women, take prisoners, and from thence they run into Britany, and fill all full of feare and combustion. The Briton appeals to the King, and doth complain to Henry King of England; and to the Duke of Somersets his Lieutenant in France: they presse them to repaire so notable a breach, else they would seeke a meanes of revenge. But they receive nothing but words, disavowed by mouth, and aduowed in effect: for Somersets causeth Saint James of Beueron to be fortified, contrary to the treaty. Charles receiving these bare answers from England, sees which way the chance would fall, and that the game would not passe without blowes, yet he restrained his men with great modesty, holding it for a maxime, that he must vse no force: But when as moderate remedies can take no place with men not capable of reason; then to oppose force against the iniurious passion of his enemy. I read with joy in the Originall, that Charles contained himselfe, and was forced to this last warre, To haue God on his side, and the wrong on his enemies. To conclude, this moderate proceeding did to iustifie the good cause of Charles, as it was continued with a happy euent: not only to abate the pride of the English, but to expell them out of the whole Realme: as the iust iudgement of God pursued their arrogancy in this attempt, by the breach of public faith: the vndoubted ruine of humane society, which hath no certaine foundation, but in perfect faith. Here endeth the yeare, but the controuersie shall begin more hotly by iust armes, accompanied with a victorious sentence, the which the Iudge of the world shall pronounce against the pretender of this Estate.

Normandy reduced to the Kings obedience.

THE Duke of Britany first interested by the English, begins first to resist him: but Charles is drawne to force by constraint. The Ambassadors of France and England, were assembled at Louiers, to redresse the breach at Fongeres, when as behold Pont de l'Arche (a town vpon the river of Seine, foure leagues from Rouen) is surprized by the Lord of Brez, for the Duke of Britany. This troubled Somersets, who presently sends to make complaint vnto the assembly. Charles makes him answer, that it is a requittall: but if he will render vp Fongeres, and the goods that were stolne, valued at sixteen hundred thousand Crownes, hee should haue Pont del' Arche againe. The which being disdainfully refused by Somersets, Charles protests by his Ambassadors in open assembly, That if warre followed (which God forbid) the fault should not be his, causing an authentick act to be taken by certaine Apostolicke and Imperiall Notaries, for his discharge and iustification: Seeing therefore that this mild course was scorned by his stout enemy, hee resolves to haue his reuenge by force of armes. To this end hee combines with Francis Duke of Britany, to make warre against the English their common enemy, vpon condition the Briton should not treat with him without his leaue. A very needfull restraint, hauing often failed, as wee haue seene. All prepare to warre, in euery place where the English had any footing in Gascony, in Normandy, and in all other parts where there was any remainder of their ancient Conquests.

Guienne shall begin the game: but it shall end in Normandy, to make perfect the French obedience, whereof it offers these first fruits to Charles in the beginning of this yeare, as to their lawfull King. Cognac was surprized for him by Verdun a Gascon, but the manner was notable. Mondot an English Captaine was gouernour of the place: he was absent when the towne was taken. Verdun keeps the gates carefully, that no intelligence might be giuen vnto him, so as he comes to the gates without knowledge of any thing, but hee found foue which added him vnto their prize, being taken prisoners, whereas before he was a gouernour. The same day Saint Maigrin was taken by Alliac his wife a Gascon. The newes of Cognac and Saint Maigrin were scarce brought to Charles, when as the Lord of Mouy giues him intelligence, that he had taken Gerberand, and the Bailliffe of Eureux Couches, with great slaughter of the English. Complaints are presently made by the English, Talbot is the messenger: Charles lets them know that they are in the fault, seeing they began first: yet hee offers to yeeld all that had beene taken by his commandement, according to the law of reprisals, so as they would deliuer what they had taken, and suffer his friends and allies to liue in peace. Talbot answering, that he had no such charge, Charles lets him vnderstand, that hee would redresse it by lawful force: that he did vnwillingly enter into war, yet would hee soone shew the English, that his milknesse had a sting: and so he goes to field with a goodly army. There were three chieftens for thees, the Rendezuous of all the English robberies in those parts, Vernon, Manre, and Loigny. Vernon (an infamous place for our deca) was first taken: a Mill gaue them entry by a hole in the towne wall, by the which the water did run to his mill ioyning to the wall. The towne began, and the castle followed: a strong tower divided from the east held out some daies, but it yeelded when as Charles arrived. Manre yeelded in view of the army. Loigny was surprized by Scalado, but the English intrinched in the bafe Court, fought it our resolutely, and lost both liues and goods. Vernon a towne vpon Seine yeelded of it selfe, by the voluntary obedience of the inhabitants. Ponteaudumer was forced by the Earles of Eu and Saint Pol, where as many English men were lost. But Lizeux by the graue aduise of their Bishop yeelds voluntary obedience, and auoides the miseries of the vanquished. Louiers did the like, and Gourmay was sold by an English captaine that held it. Effay was taken by a gentle stratagem of the Duke of Alanson. The Captaine accompanied with the souldiers of his garrison, was gone forth to fish a poole, while hee seeks for fish he is taken himselfe, and his Lieutenant deliueys vp the castle to the Kings seruice. Fescampe is taken by the Abbot, hauing intelligence with the Monkes: and at the same instant a ship arriues out of England, being ignorant of this losse: the French suffer them to land and take them all prisoners. Harcourt makes shew to resist, but yeelds by composition after the siege of eight daies. The army marcheth against Neuf chafell of Nicourt, and takes the town by force, the castle yeelds by composition. The Earle of Clermont was desirous to recouer his chiefe house where of he carried the name: his subjects gaue him entry into the towne, and so by the towne he wins the castle. Saint Lo at the sight of the army demands and obtains a good composition, with all the neighbour Castles. Carenten yeelds after three daies, and Pont d'Oue is taken by assault: Constances and Gouray by composition. Alencon freed it selfe from the English, and yeelds to the mild command of their good Prince the Duke of Alanson, who shewed his mercy euen to the English being vanquished, to whom he gaue both life and goods.

Rochequion was yeelded vp by the Captaine of the Castle, who of an English man becomes French, by the persuasions of his wife, who was a French woman. Chasteau-gallard a fort of importance vpon the riuier of Seine, endured a siege of sixe weekes, but the presence and good fortune of Charles, made him master of the place. Gisors, so famous for the English quarrels, was yeelded to the King by the Captaine, who likewise came to the Kings seruice, and in the end Valonges, a place of importance, the which hereafter shall come in question by a famous accident.

As the Kings Army made this progresse in Normandy, so it increased daily by their new conquests. Renek King of Sicily, and the Duke of Britany, arriue with goodly voluntary troops, and some townes newly reduced to the Kings obedience, with an infinite number of good souldiers: but about all the Court was goodly, by the multitude of Noble men, who went not onely to honour the Kings good fortune, but caried by an inward instinct of his right well gouerned, (as it were by a celestiall guide) did runne to an assured victory, and to the possession of an heires lawfull right. The Dukes of Bourbon, Alanson & Britany were there, with the Earles of Richmont Constable of France, of Mayen, Eu, Saint

Saint

A Saint Pol, Dunois, Caftres, Tancarville, and Dampmartin. The Duke of Lorraine, and John his brother, augmented the traine of King Renek. John Iuuenal of Vrsins, Barott of Treignell, and Chancellor of France, was there, hauing succeeded Renek of Chastres Archbishop of Rheims, being lately deceased. The Lords of Culant, Bueil, Montgailcon, Blainuille, Preffigny, Brion, Prally, la Bousliere, Monter, Aigreuille, Malicorne, and Han, with an infinite number of the Nobility.

Charles resolved to embrace these goodly occasions, finding (by the obedience of so many Country townes) the way laid open to Rouen, the capital City of that Province, hee determines to besiege it, and all with one consent aime at this goodly mark: as the chiefe of the Kings affaires. But it seemed through the providence of God, that whereas there seemed greatest difficulty, there it proved most easie, by the loyalty of the French, who cannot deny their Prince. The combat was chull, managed more by counsell then by force. The City was much at the Kings deuotion, yet were they kept in awe by the English forces, being masters of the strongest Forts within the City. The Duke of Boumeret yet there prelent without authority. Talbot must employ all his valour: but neither force, forts, authority, nor valour were of any force, for that God hauing decreed to restore this estate by the means of Charles the length inclined both hands and hearts to his decree, the which no mortal man can preuent.

The King being at Pont l'Arche, had certaine intelligence from the best Citizens of Rouen, that the whole City was resolved to obey him: desiring onely to bee supported by his presence and forces: vpon this aduice hee caualsh the Earle of Dunois to march, and to shew himselfe vnto the Citizens: who sends a Herald to summon them to yeild their obedience vnto the King, whom the English were like to haue borne impatient: No Citizen dares shew himselfe vpon the wals: all is filled with enemies. The English haue seized vpon the wals, so as no man within the towne durst approach. Hauing thus marched about the towne in good order, fearing no lesse the lightnesse of the peoples humour, then the Winter which approached (being then October) hee resolves to retire. Charles and his Council distrust these popular humors, as not able to draw the City to yeild hee therefore thinks it best to lodge his army about it, and to seize vpon the passages of the Citizens chiefe houses, being the best meanes to draw them to reason. The which was speedily put in practice. The troopes were scarce lodged in their quarters, when as Charles lying at Pont l'Arche, had intelligence that his seruants had seized vpon two townes, by means whereof they had a quarter of the City. Whereupon the Earle of Dunois shewes himselfe presently with the army before the City, and diuides his troopes according to their quarters. The brute of those forces is great vpon their approach: they haue aduice to march, the which they doe resolutely, being set in order, full of generous resolution, as in the Kings presence. The Ladders are set to the wall, and they beginne to mount, all prepare to follow, forty of our men get vp the wall, when as the Lord Talbot sties with three hundred desperate English, who hauing cut the Citizens in peeces, charge our men that were ingaged, some they kill, the rest leape from the wals, and few recouer the place from whence they were mounted. The King holding the City wonne, comes to Darnetall, when as the Earle of Dunois returns to aduertise him of the hard successe of this popular brag, so as all held it for winde and smoke.

In the meane time the Citizens slept not, the little blood of foine that were slaine for all the rest of the Citizens on fire, who resolved to vmaske themselves, and to speake plainly to the English. The whole City is incensed by means of the magistrates, every man prepares his armes against these strangers. The Archbishop of Rouen (a name which the historie owes to the truth and honor of the French loyalty) was a good seruant to the King, and had great credit with the Citizens: so as the whole City assembles with him, and by a common consent all resolve to returne to the Crown of France, as to their beginning: Suweret and Talbot run thither with fifty men, but what is that against a multitude? The Archbishop acquaints them with the Citizens resolution, who in their presence deput the Official to goe vnto the King.

The summe of his Ambassage was, that his Majesty should grant vnto the Citizens of Rouen a generall abolition of all that was past, and leaue for the English, and all others of their humors to retire without danger, offering him their obedience as to their lawfull King: that he should come when he pleased, where he should finde the gates open to their their hearts. This resolution deliuered boldly in the presense of Somerfet and Talbot, amazed them much, their courages were daunted. And what could their weake authority do against the whole body of a City, fortified with the Kings approach, his army, and his right? Thus the City of Rouen sends deputies vnto the King, and obtaine all they demand, who being returned with this good answer, all are satisfied but the English, who keepe the walles, towers, bridge, castle and palace: all this must be fought for. They prepare for force, the people doe the like, all the streets are filled with armed men to force the wals.

The Citizens send againe vnto the King, beseeching him to approach with his Army with all speed, to take absolute possession of his City of Rouen. Attending the Kings answer, the Citizens doe happily win the walls, the towers, and the gates: all that belong to the City obeyes the King, the English with great difficulty recover the bridge, Castle and palace. But they enjoy not these for long: for the Citizens besiege the bridge, and win it, and now the army comes downe the hill. The Citizens as the night threatens, God save the King, all break out into joy and triumph. The army enters the City, to the peoples exceeding ioy, attending the King. In the meane tyme, Katherine fort is besieged, and yielded to the Earle of Dunelm: Charles lodged there whilst the City freed from frangers: the castle yeelds, the palace only remains: Somerfet and Talbot in these, they are men of action who had wherewithall to fight for their liues: but how they hold out, all being shiphoed to an end.

Charles being wholly inclined to clemency, doth willingly see Somerfet and Talbot at Katherine fort, who receiue a law from his victorious hands; yet would hee not admit them with conditions like vnto the Citizens: but he giues them leave to retire with all liues and goods vpon these conditions: That they should leaue their prisoners and armour, deliver vp Arques, Caudeford, Tancarville, Lillebonne, Honnefleu, and Moustrouille, they should pay fifty thousand Crownes presently, and discharge their priuie debts in the City before they departed: for assurance whereof they should leaue Talbot (the flower of all their men) with five other hostages, such as the King should demand. Talbot remains for a pledge. After ten daies (all articles agreed vpon being performed, except Honnefleu) all the hostages haue leave to depart, except Talbot, who staid in Honnefleu is deliuered. But Talbot must haue more tyme to taste the bounty and clemency of our King, and the French courtisie. Thus Charles enters Rouen with great pompe, but the peoples ioy exceeded the stateliness of his traine. Their shouts downe the Trumpeters and Clarions, all cry, God save the King. This poore people (greedy to their Prince, after so long and cruell a seruitude) weepe for ioy, men and women, young and old, all run, many bon-fires are made, but the fire of publike deuotion burnes cleare. This was the tenth of Nouember in the yeare 1449, a notable date for so many a deliuerance. There yet remained some townes in Normandy to conquer: Charles loth to lose any opportunity, or to giue the enemy any leisure to bethink himselfe, made scarce allow of any tyme for the publike ioy and content of his good subjects, presently to field with his army.

Honnefleu would not obey the Duke of Somerfet, the which hee most desires according to the treaty: there were fifteen hundred English, resolute to defend himselfe, but after fifteen daies siege they yeelded vpon honourable termes, their goods being saved. Charles for an increase of the good cheare he had made vnto Talbot in his imprisonment, giues him his liberty without ranfome, with meanes to retire himselfe into England and great gifts; but hee shall make him no due requitall of this good and honourable entertainment. Foughten the subject of this last watre, and the cheefe of his good successe, returns to the obedience of the Crowne, through the example of the Duke of Britany: and Belaine with the castle of Fresnay, by this of the Duke of Alencon. As these things succeeded happily for our Charles, so all went cruell in England. The Earle of Suffolke governed Henry the sixth quietly, being a young man, and of a stout spirit. As all the affaires of England depended vpon this Earle, so did the reputation of the Duke of Somerfet (a Prince of the English blood) very zealous of his credit and reputation; and ashamed to bee blemished with these losses in France, laies the chiefe fault vpon Suffolke, and others that had the government, and so incensed the people of London against them, as the Londoners transported with cholour for so great a losse, meaning to punish the offenders, fall vpon the Bishop of Chichester, Lord Keeper of the priuie Scale, and kill him in a mutiny: they intend the like to Suffolke, if (by the fauour of some of his friends) he had not bene put into the tower of London, to yeeld an account of his actions. Henry (who loued him dearly) takes him forth, and sent him into France, for his better safety. But it chanced that Suffolke seeking to auoide one danger, fell into another, where hee made his last shipwracke: for being met by Somersets people, being his capital enemy, he was taken and beheaded, his head and body were sent to London, and those cruell spoiles set vp to publike view, in places most frequented. In the meane tyme, all England troubled for the losse of Rouen, and the greatest part of the Prouince, resolves to hazard all, to saue the rest of their conquests in France. They had yet in Normandy the Townes of Cacn, Vire, Auranches, Saint Sauveur, Vicon, Salpêtr, Damfron, Cherebourg, with the strong places of Tombelaine and Briquebeac, and a great part of Guienne. With this remainder the English imagine to recouer the possession of what they had lost. So Henry sends speedily foure thousand men, vnder the command of Thomas Trel, one of his most renowned Captaines. Being landed at Cherebourg, without any losse of time, he besiegeth Valonges, a strong place and of importance. At the brute of these forces, all the English garisons assemble, to augment his army, and to fortifie the siege, so as being together, they make about eight thousand men. Our army was lodged in diuers places to refresh themselves since the siege of Honnefleu, the season being wonderfull moist in the thaw of the spring; when as newes came to Charles of the landing of the English, and the imminent danger of the besieged, the losse whereof were a foule blemish to his victory. To prevent this, he presently sends the Earle of Clermont with fixteene hundred lances, whereof the Earle of Caftres, the Admirall of Raiz, the Seneschall of Poitou, and the Lords of Montgafcon, Courran, and Rothault were the commanders. The English army was lodged at Fourmigny, a village betwixt Carenran and Bayeux, in a place of aduantage, to keepe themselves free from such forces as they might doubt should be sent from the King, being then in the Country. Mathew Gooch an old English Captaine, came vnto him with a thousand archers. The English being thus fortified, set their backs to a riuer, being flanked with diuers Orchards and Gardens, before them they make trenches to hinder their approach, and in this fort they attend the enemy.

The necessity of Charles made them to imagine our French to be more in number then they were, for this troope did not exceed fixe hundred fighting men, whereof an hundred onely, commanded by Jeffrey of Courran, and Joachim of Rouault, charged the English vanguard, and hauing slaine three or foure hundred, put the rest of their army in disorder: yet the Earle of Clermont seeing the danger he was in with his troope, if the enemy had discovered his aduantage, hauing so great an army against his small forces, sends presently to Charles for speedy succours. By good hap as the messenger came vnto the King, the Constable of Richmont arises from Britany, who marcheth presently, not giuing his souldiers any leasure to breath, exhorting them to go courageously to an assured victory. His coming brake the stroke, and swayed the victory. He had 240 lances, and 800 Archers, and with him James of Luxembourg, the Earle of Laual, and the Lord of Loheac Marshall of France, with the good fortune of Charles. He arises euen when as the Earle of Clermont was far engaged in the fight, the English had taken two Culuerins from him, and in despite had passed Saint Clements Ford, preparing to discharge these Culuerins: when as beheld the Constable comes with his troope with a victorious countenance, who at his first approach wins the bridge vpon the riuer. The English are amazed, especially when they see Mathew Gooch (who was somewhat retired from the body of their army to succour at all euents) take the way to Bayeux. The Constable makes his profit of this sight, who without pursuing them, chargeth their dismayed troopes.

Thomas Trel puts himselfe in defence with the fauour of the riuer, the orchards and gardens: but the Constable commands some of his horsemen to leaue their horses. The Earle of Clermont enuiours the enemy on the other side: the English being charged of all sides, feeling the weight of their blowes, giue way, leaue their armes, and suffer themselves to be slaine, and taken to mercy. The courtisie of the French spared many in this slaughter, there were more taken prisoners then were slaine. They buried in three pits 1774. loffe did likewise burie all the conquests which the English had made in Normandy. The Commanders of the army were prisoners, Tirel, Norbery, Drient, Kirqueby, Warbenton, Appel, Alengon, Vagaier, Caluville, and a great number of English Nobility, armed with coats of armes: all are led to Charles with their ensignes. An honorable spoile to his triumph, but a perpetual ignominy both to the runners away that saved themselves, and to the cowards that were taken prisoners. This absolute victory cost France but eight men to the end they might do homage to the great God of armes and victories, who by this memorable overthrow made way for our refection. I read with ioy the warrant of the Originall. And therefore wise men doe say, that the cause of the French mens victory, and by his divine power the English were overcome. This victory was given vs from heauen, the 10 of April in the year 1450, and thanks were given vnto God throughout the realm. A solemn procession was made at Paris of 14000 yong children, from the age of seuen to ten years, carefully chosen out, to the great content of the people, going from S. Innocents to our Ladies Church. This notable victory of Fourmigny, did loone after cause the rest of Normandy to yeeld: Vire yeelds by composition, the which was granted to 4000 laces, who might well haue contended for their liues.

All Normandy
yeelds to Charles.

Auranches stood the longer vpon tearmes, through the resolution of 500 volunteers, but in the end they departed with their liues onely, and a white wand in their hands. The strong castle of Tombelaine guarded by a hundred English, yeelded two daies after. Bayeux resolves to fight it out, all prepare to armes. After the ordinance had made a great breach, and the myne ready to play, Charles fearing the sacke of his subjects, as well as of his enemies, would not suffer his men to attempt so dangerous a matter, and the souldiers on the other side cry out to be led vnto the breach. But in the end they march without command, and are twice repulsed, yet Mathew Gooch (being amazed at the fury of these desperate men) demands a parlee, the which is granted by Charles, but hee obtained life onely, and a white wand for every souldier: to some gentlemen of marke a horse, and to poore families some carts to carry them. A piteous spectacle, to see 4000 women carrying their children either in their armes, or in their cradles, leaving all their goods and moveables behind them, and hardly carrying a poore clout for their greatest need. Seniery comes to him that spoiles for he shall be spoiled: that makes another weep, for he shall have time to weep. Yet Charles caused this troope of nine hundred men being disarmed to be safely conducted with the rest to Cherebourg, a place which they had demanded for their retreat. Bayeux being thus yeelded, the kings army marcheth to St. Sauueur le Viconte, the which yeelds without battery. They had a good composition for the number of men of warre that were in it, being five or sixe hundred: they grant them their liues and goods, retiring to Cherebourg. Charles was loth to lose his men vnconstrained, for that there remained yet some places of strength.

The composition
at Caen.

Caen (a goodly and populous City) was besieged with great preparation, but to what end should I consume time in the priuate report of assaults, seeing wee haste to the victory? A great peece of the wall being beaten downe, and our men burning with desire to runne to this honourable breach, Robert de Vere being Gouverneur, demands a parlee, hee held the Castle, (being one of the goodliest peeces in France) with foure thousand souldiers. So by the commandement of Charles, the Earle of Dunois yeelded them an honourable composition, to depart with bagge and baggage and their armes, except the Artillery: the prisoners were set at liberty, and all that the Citizens might owe vnto the English was discharged, to the benefit of the debtor. All despite the fist of Iulay are conducted in safety according to the accord, and the King makes his entry two daies after.

Falaize is besieged in the meane time, and yeelds the one & twentieth of the same month. Fiftene hundred English of their best souldiers, obtained a good composition to depart with bagge and Baggage. Downfront guarded by fiftene hundred franke Archers yeelds vpon the like composition, the second of August following. Cherebourg (one of the strongest places of Europe in those daies) was the conclusion of that account, and the crowning of this happy worke. It was guarded by 2000 desperate aduenturers, who (wonderfully grieved with so many misfortunes) would be buried in the ashes of this last loffe: but Thomas Gamel Governor of the place prevailed more then their obstinate resolution, shewing that they had discharged their duties to their Country in being the last

A to fight. But nature swayd most with Gamel, for hauing his son prisoner with the King, he would not lose himselfe with his sonne. The accord was made absolute for his son: souldiers & his son, and vpon this accord he leaues the towne, and retires last into England, to admonish Henry to prouide for Guen, where the whole burthen of the warre would fall. So the 12 of August in the year 1450, Normandy (one of the goodliest and richest Provinces belonging to this Crown) was reduced to the kings obedience, in a yeare and fift daies, hauing remained in the possession of the English thirty years, and so kept by them, as it is a miraculous worke of God they were so easily dispossest. But leaving Normandy, let vs come to Guienne, to finish the restoring of this Estate.

Guienne retournes to the Crowne of France.

Guienne had begun her last feare of Armes by the taking of Cognac and S. Maigrin, as we haue said, whereas the warre continued coldly during that of Normandy. But Charles after the happy conquest of this Province, bends all his forces to driue the English out of Guienne, the which hee had enioyed by a lawful title about a hundred yeares. Charles assembles his great Councell with the chiefe of his Provinces at Tours, for the performance of this voyage of Guienne, and to finde meanes how to maintaine his Army. This done, hee giues the government of Normandy to his Constable, and settled Peter of Brezay at Rouen, for the well preteruing of that which hee had happily gotten. And to bee the nearer to his affaires, hee resolves to remaine at Taillebourg for all occurrences. He had then a small army in Guienne, vnder the command of the Earle of Foix, who had not only kept the enemy in breath during the warres of Normandy, but also had won part of the Country, by the taking Mauleon in Sole, and Guisans.

The King of England had a lawful title to Guienne.

Charles giues the command of the army to the Earle of Dunois and Longueville a bastard of Orleans, but the Earles of Ponthieure and Perigort, haue another part, to molest the English in diuers quarters, yet these three armies shall make but one body vnder this Lieutenant generall to his Master, when the necessity of his seruice shall ioyn them all in one. The Earle of Ponthieure did happily begin the conquest of Guienne, in taking of Bergerac, the which was well defended: and then Genac, Saint Foy, and Montferand, and their dependances, by the terror of his victorious armes. Our braue Gascons did no less on their side. About the same time Amianus d'Albret Lord of Oruill was in garison at Tarras a towne of good preface, being the beginning of many blessings which God gaue vnto France. He had scarce fixe hundred men at armes, and some good footmen of the Country: but he was well accompanied with Tokresse, Robin, and Epinasse, wife and valiant Captaines, and with his generous resolution, the hereditary ornament of his noble House. He shewed by the effects, that we must not number the men, but weigh their valour, for with this small troope hee pretumes to brane Bourdeaux when at their gates, and giues a law vnto the Country of Medoc, making not onely the whole Country to contribute, but also to bring their commodities to Tarras. The Bourdelois (to free themselves, not onely from these brauadoes, but from their ordinary toyle and charge) thrust on by the authority and command of the English, who were then their superiours, leauy eight thousand men vnder their Maiors command. The Citizens promise them a leuay an assured victory, but this troope in encounters them, defeats them, kill and take their prisoners. The next retreat preferred many, but there remained two thousand vpon the place, and the victors led two thousand two hundred prisoners to Tarras, the which were taken like stales in a wee, from whom hee drew great ransomes: with the honour to haue vanquished a great multitude with few men. This only was memorable during that yeare.

Three French armies in Guienne.

The next shall bring vs in an absolute victory of all that held in Guienne for the English. Charles hauing giuen some respite to his Nobility and men of warre, spent the first day of May to the field. The army was very faire: the Earle of Dunois had the chiefe command, (as we haue said) the which did not hinder John Duke of Angouleme (brother to the Duke of Orleans) from ioyning with the Army, with a goodly body of the Nobility: as the Lords of Taillebourg, Pons, Rochefort, and Rochefort, and the Duke of Berry, his brother, was then in Italy for his pilgrimage, which when hee shall retorne with another traine when hee shall bee King.

Philip

Philip Duke of Bourgogne was much troubled, in pacifying a mutiny of the Guetois, who molested him; when he had most need to succour France, in the conquest of the two Provinces, whereof we now speak. To avoid treachery in the private relaxing of all these sieges, the Kings army did first attempt Montguyon and takes it: then the Baron of Pontieu arises with his troops, and joynes with the Earle of Dunois the General, and so the army (being increased both in men and courage) besiege Blais, one of the goodliest fortresses of Guienne, a towne seated at the mouth of Dordonne, and enriched with a goodly haven of the sea, the which was well fortified and well defended, but in the end the towne is taken by force, and the castle by composition, although the Citizens of Bordeaux laboured to relecue it with a fleet of five armed shippes.

Bourg was added to this victory of Charles, and in this amazement Liborne (being summoned to yeeld vnto the King) obeys without any contradiction. But their chiefe force was prepared against Fronfac: and in the meane time the Earle of Pontieu besiege Castillon, a towne in Perigot, seated vpon Dordonne, (the which shall be famous for the warres of our time) and takes it by composition. Saint Millien by their example yeelds obedience. In the meane time all march to Fronfac, (a place renowned since Charles Magne, and one of the strongest fort of Europe) being beleagured of all sides: as all were prepared for some great force, they within demand a parley. Their request was to haue a truce till Midsummer, if they were not succoured by that day, they would yeeld the place, and submit themselves to the kings seruice, and employ all their means to draw Bordeaux to obedience. These offers pleased the Princes and the Earle of Dunois being General. The day being come, no succours appeare, and so Fronfac is yeelded vnto the King, to the incredible content of the whole Army, which expected great resistance from this vincible fort.

If the Earle of Dunois preuailed well on this side the riuer of Garonne, on the other side the Earles of Foix and of Armagnac failed in no point of their duties: hauing the Rion, they ioyntly besiege Acqs a towne of importance in that Country. These exploits performed in lesse then two moneths, did as much encourage the French as did daunt the English, who could not keep the townes (which yet held for them) from falling of the French, and much more in the champion Country hauing more liberty, as the Nobility together with the townes, resolute to expell the rest of the English, as the King might be wholly obeyed. Onely Bordeaux and Bayonne remayned: the most important townes of that Prouince, whither the whole force of this royall Army did march, but the Citizens of Bordeaux (loth to be forced) resolute to obey. Being vanquished, they treat and make a profitable accord, as it is set downe at large in the Originall. Their freedoms and priuiledges were confirmed vnto them by John Laueval of Vien Chancellor of France, they brought their keyes to the Earle of Dunois, (as Licutenant general to the King in his army) and receiued the French into their City with exceeding ioy, the first day of August to the great griefe of the English, who see themselves expelled out of the whole Realme, but they shall yet make a new attempt.

The oath of fealty was authentically made to Charles the 7. both by the citizens of Bordeaux, and by all the Estates of Burgundia as to their King and lawfull Prince, renouncing the English. The Nobility held vp their hands first in this oath, and namely, the Lords Elparré, Montferrand, Duras, Rolan, Pucols, Lansac, Lisle, and Anglade, amongst which how many proued perjured? The Archbishop also did take the same oath of homage and fealty to the King, with Gastien de Foix: onely Capit de Buche would not take the oath for his person, but he submitted all his lands to the obedience of the Crowne, an error which shall be prejudiciall to the whole Prouince. Thus all Guienne was made subject to the Kings obedience, except Bayonne: for the reduction of which towne (being needfull to keepe together so great an army,) every Nobleman was commanded to returne to his house, and that the Earle of Dunois should continue there to employ the forces of the Country at this siege. So the Princes of the blood depart, accompanied with twenty thousand men, whom they dismisst euerie one into his Country. The Earle of Foix joyned with the Earle of Dunois, and they besiege Bayonne, the siege was long, painfull, and dangerous: the which might haue bene more easie and speedy by means of the army which was ready. But in such the niggard spends more than the bountifull man in euery degree: yet in the end Bayonne submits to the obedience

A the Crowne vpon these conditions, That the towne-men of Bayonne should deliuer John of Beaumont their captaine into the Kings hands, with their owne persons and their goods to be at the Kings will and discretions; and to reparaire their disobedience, and to purchase the Kings fauour, they should pay forty thousand crowns, whereto they are bound by the Earle of Foix, General of the army. This accord was confirmed by the entry of the said Earle into the towne, who took a solemne oath in the kings name. Charles forgives the inhabitants halfe their fine, and confirms halfe their priuiledges. The three estates of the Country of Burdellois send their Deputies vnto the King, who was then at Taillevbourg, to confirme their oaths, and homages already taken by his Chancellor: and the King likewise doth ratifie their priuiledges, and receiues them into fauour, so as Guienne seemed to bee reduced to the Kings obedience, to the incredible content of the whole Realme; and so this year ended with an vniuersall ioy.

But fewen or eight moneths were scarce spent in this publike ioy (such as the French might haue in euery corner of their Country, inioying peace; the which they had not tasted these hundred yeares, and which in outward appearance there was no hope to recouer, the English and Bourguignons hauing taken such firme footing in all parts) when as behold, a great lurch seemed to expose France to the mercy of a more horrible and dangerous storme. For Talbot comes to the gates of Bordeaux, with goodly troops of English, where he was receiued, and tooke the Seneschall of Guienne prisoner, being Gouernour of the towne, with John de Foix Deputy Maier of Bordeaux and in a manner the same day, the Nobility which had giuen their faith vnto the King, (noted before by their speciall names) deliuered all the chiefe places of the Country to the English. Fronfac, Colceures, Castillon, Chasteau-neuf in Medoc, Cadillac, Lancon, Saint Macaire, Liborne, and Saint Millien. And after Talbot (who came but to discouer there arised the next day in safety, four thousand fighting men from England with fourscore ships laden with meale and salt meates, to victual the Towne. The amazement of this losse was as great, as the ioy had bene of gaine. Charles was then at Tours: the Earle of Clermont (surnamed Charles Duke of Bourbon) was Gouernour of Guienne. He commands him to haue a care to the preservation of the rest of Guienne, and presently hee sends six hundred men at armes, vnder the command of three Marshals of France, and the Lords of Oual and Rouhaute, who were then neere the King, and sends for the rest of his forces with all speed. But whilst that all prepare to reparaire this losse, may wee not examine the motive of this great and sudden change? Some new Writers accuse the ill vsage of the French to this people newly conquered, which made them to wish for the English, being more mild and temperate Lords: others blamed the negligence of our French, vsnt to keepe that which they had so valiantly gotten. But who is he that can find this first cause truly noted, hearing the whole History speake and representing the discontent of the French nation against the government of the English? And why did the King dismisst his army, but to ease his people, euen with the prejudice of his owne affaires?

As for our negligence in keeping of that which we haue gotten with much paine, it is too well known by memorable examples: but seeing the affection of the people of Bordeaux had bene confirmed by many proofes, in this voluntary obedience, to what end had it serued to put them in fetters, as a people vanquished by armes, and force them to obedience? But to find out the causes, we must examine the effects: L'Esparre, Montferrand, Duras, Anglade, Rolans, and other specified in the Register of the oath, will bee found straight waies reuolted in these places. Capit de Buche protested openly, that he was not the Kings seruant, so as hee might without reproach cary armes against him for the King of England his master: He might remaine peaceably within the Country, inioying his houses, being vnder the Kings protection, and so make his trafficke for the English at his pleasure. John King of Nauarre an Aragonais both by birth and humor, was an enemy to Charles for two respects, as hauing married the heire of Nauarre, and with that marriage troubled the reignes of John and Charles the 5, and as an Aragonais, by reason of the quarrels of Naples; against the house of Aniou. These were two instruments to moue many mens miades. It could not otherwise bee, but the authority and command of two hundred yeares, had purchased England many seruants, and such as had alwaies held the English party party against France, and were not reclaimed to the Kings obedience but by force, could not beleue that they had any such part in the Kings fauour, hauing brought nothing to his seruice but necessity and constraint: These men being wonne, doe animate, or rather force the people, making themselves the strongest, in places where there were no guards, whereof they were not only wearied, but plunged in the trust and assurance of a profound peace. Who seeth not then, but this made the way more easie for these disloyal men, to surprize those towncs which they had deliuered to the English: but from whence soeuer the mischiefe came, this was the remedy.

Talbot was the Kings prisoner, & wee haue said, at the taking of Rouen, Charles shewed him all the fauour a man might hope for of so great a Monarch: he gave him all libertie without ranfome, and had honoured him with goodly presents: yet he is become head of the English army, which were esteemed eight thousand fighting men, and made it directly against the Kings army: which made him to recouer what had been lost, and to preferue what remained. Castillon was become English. The Earle of Ponthieus with the Admirall and Marshals of France, besiege it, attending the King, who came posting to quench this fire. Talbot makes haste from Bourdeaux with the choicest of his men, bearing an assured victory in his conceit, being ignorant that hee went to seek death. At the first charge our men begin to waver vpon the braueriall of Talbot, but they gather themselves together againe, with great resolution, to stay the course of the fire: Talbot on the better side, incourageth his men as going to a banquet, and goes to a battell, he beates out the heads of pipes of Wine, to make his men drinke, himselfe being drunke with presumption, and making his Soldiers drunke with the vaine hope of victory; being mounted vpon a little Nagge, but followed by fixe or seuen thousand men, they come to fight. The combat was fierce, but the English are repulsed, scattered, and ouerthrowne. There were two thousand slaine vpon the place, and amongst them, Talbot was ouerthrowne from his horse and slaine, with his Sonne. The Earle of Calais (lonne to Capital de Buche), Montferrand and Anglade are taken prisoners: Esparre escapes for another time. In the end Castillon yeelds at discretion. Saint Million and Libourne returne to the Kings obedience, to the great content of the inhabitants being surprized to their griefe. Charles did also warrant them from all losse in this repulse. Cadillac, Lango, Villandras, and Saint Maquaire, make off the English yoke at one instant, and open their gates with their hearts. The Kings army goes from thence to Bourdeaux, being full of Englishmen, but fuller of feare, seeing the English loth to buy it so deare as Talbot had done: so as they suffer the French to wander at their pleasure vp & downe the Country of Medoc. This victory was due to the presence of Charles, who being armed at full fac, (the which was held a place invincible by force) it yeelds as vanquished. The English haue their liues granted them, with a white wand, through the bounty of Charles. He doth not so intreat the reuolted French, for the captaine of Cadillac being taken, is beheaded for an exemplary punishment.

From thence he comes to Bourdeaux, (the which was the chiefe place of his affaires) but the multitude that came vnto his seruice was admirable, they came from all parts (knowing that the King was present,) so willingly doe the French obey their Prince. There were 4000 English remaining in the towne, and as many of their faction, being drawne together from diuers parts of the Country: the siege continued two moneths, Charles had built vp Bulwarke to stop the entry, and to encounter the English defence, but there were no memorable assaults. The sickness which increased in the kings army, hastened the composition for the City, the which he might haue forced, but that he desired to spare the blood of his subjects. The composition was thus made: That all the English should passe into England with their goods: that the Citizens of Bourdeaux should be all in the Kings protection, taking a new oath, neuer to rebell against him their Soueraine Lord.

And for that some of the Country, and of the City of Bourdeaux, had drawne in the King of England, contrary to their oath, the King (pardoning the great multitude) should chuse twenty at his pleasure, to banish them out of the Realme, their goods remaining forfeited to the Crowne: of this number were Capital de Buche, and Candal his sonne, Pirras, Anglade, Rosan and Esparre, who in the end lost his head, being found guilty of a new treason, a yeare after this pardon. The Citizens of Bourdeaux renew their oath of fealty,

A long while, and receive a great garison to prevent all surpris: they build two strong Castles to the one towards the Sea, called Castell Trompette, another towards the maine, named Castell du Ha. The Earle of Clemon, gouernour of Guienne, remained in the Guienne to settle the Kings authoritie. Charles ended this true commendation in the recovery of his losse, to haue doubled his army by the good order which he caused to be carefully obserued, and by his victory, in vanquishing his enemies, not only by force, but by clemency and his subjects by love and mildnesse. So as both the treachery of these English, and the rashnesse of his enemies with their new attempts, were paines due to his victory, the more admirable, for that he doth vanquish, when as hee loosed, and quitted: shewing, when as in show he was lost, and forced as it were to waver, for the degree he had of peace, he stepped the fruits both of warre and peace, in fighting valiantly, attaining also victory modestly to the eternall memory of posterity.

Charles returns from Bourdeaux to Tours, having happily finished his double and taken. But in the inconstancy of this world England which had so much troubled vs, takes occasion to trouble it selfe; for the losses which they supplied to haue made of that which they had taken from vs: and as affection is wayward and often blinde, so it sowes dissention vpon strange subjects. The Dukes of Yorke, Somerset, and Gloucester, accuse one another, and make factions within the Realme. Richard Duke of Yorke (being a branch of the blood royal) pretended the Crowne to belong more iustly vnto him, than to Henry the sixt then reigning; but contemned, by reason of his great losses, and of his manifold defects: Somerset being fauoured by the King (as the ring-leader of his faction) was perswaded by Yorke, and so cunningly, as the Londoners (hating him as the cause of all the losses in France) put him in prison; but in the end hee was freed by the Kings authority.

This dissention burst out into open warre, vnder the names of two factions, Lancasters; from whence King Henry was descended, and they wore the Red Rose for a mark, and Clarences from whence the Duke of Yorke tooke the beginning, bearing the white Rose for a distinction. This rancor of parties hath bathed all England with the blood of her subjects: two yeares shall not passe after the losse, but Somerset shall die in a battell, and King Henry the sixt (who had cast himselfe as King of France) shall be prisoner: and whereas he sought to ioyne the Crowne of France to that of England, he shall lose that of England, both for him and his: teaching vs that wee must neuer thinke to doe harme to another, but we shall receive our share againe, and not to despaire in our greatest afflictions. The beginning of this raigne did represent vnto vs a ruined Realme, and this end restores it to her first beauty. Thus was this Realme restored; from the which the English were quite expelled, except from Calais, and the heyre recovered the possession of his right, the which his successors enjoy vnto this day.

The manner of this singular deliuerance, is worthy to be obserued, vnder the conduct of the first mouer, the which the wife acknowledgement to be in the providence of God, the Soueraigne of Soueraignes, and the preseruer of States, whereby he maintaines the society of Mankind. Truly in the course of these ordinary meanes which wee seeke after, Charles holds the first place, being both capable of counsell, and full of resolution to put in execution. Hee was assisted by great personages in the government of his affaires: And for the warres, hee was furnished with two Constables, which trusted him faithfully, the Earle of Boucquian in his aduersity, and the Earle of Richmond in his prosperitie; of two Chancellors, worthy men, & fit for the time: Ranald of Charres Archbishop of Rheims, and Robert of Vrsins, Baron of Treignel, the one for the beginning, the other for the end of his affaires: And for Warriours, hee had as resolute and happy Commanders, as might be found in any Raigne, of whom hee had great need. But from all this wee must ascend vnto the soueraine cause, who hath shewed vs the rood, and cast it into the fire, when it is pleased him: that by the example of our Ancestors, we may more perfectly obserue the causes and remedies of our difficulties.

Now we draw neere vnto the end of this raigne: but before we conclude, wee must observe the estate of the Church, and finish the discourse of the Schisme, whereof we haue shewed the beginning and proceeding. We haue made relation of this inexcusable confusion, vntill the Councell of Pisa, which (supposing to reforme the scandalous disorders of the Pope being enemies, Gregory and Benedict) advanced a third, which was 1555

Constance.

23. So as at one time there were three Popes; John at Bologna; Gregory at Remis; and Benedict to be resident at Rome; and Benedict at Avignon. This multiplicity of Popes bred much disorder, to the great scandall and prejudice of all Christians. So John Sigismund (now above cure this infirmity of the minde, by force) resolved to have vantage vnto the authority of the Church: and to that end he passed through France, England, Spaine and Italy, perwading all Kings, Princes, and Potentates, to hold a Councell at Constance, whither the Emperours of Constantinople and Trebizonde, with the Churches of Greece, their Ambassadors, and all Christian Nations assisted, to the end this Councell might be oecumenicall and vniuersall. In this Councell, John the 23. (being accused and found guilty of grievous crimes) was first depofed and then imprisoned: Gregory the twelfth, and Benedict the thirteenth, were likewise depriued, and Otho Colonne a Roman Gentleman, was chosen Pope by the Councell, and called Martin the first. This decree of the Councell, was accompanied with great and generall complaints, by reason of the contested estate of the Church, the which had exceeded farre in some places. Saine Bernard begun in France, as doth appeare by diuers places of his writings; and by bookes written vpon this subject. But many of his disciples had followed him in great numbers, Gilles de Roquetaillade, Thomas Gentil, and Nicholas Clemangis had filled all France with the complaints. But in England John Wicliffe, and in Bohemia John Hus had perwaded men with greater vehemency: for Bohemia was ready to disclaime the Popes authority. John Hus teaching them not only to leaue the abuse of manners, but the doctrine it self: as is contained at large in the Ads of the Councell of Constance. It shall be sufficient to quote them, my stile not permitting me to set them downe at large. The Reader shall be careful to see the grounds of this Controverfie, may goe vnto the Original, and will observe the effect according vnto the duty of the History. Wicliffe doctrine was condemned. John Hus and Jerome of Prague came to Constance, (having a passport from the Emperor Sigismund and the Councell,) but they were condemned and burnt as Hereticks. Hus in the Bohemian tongue signifies a Goose. John Hus when as the Iudges had pronounced this sentence that he should be burnt, he said vnto them: I appeal from vnto the soueraigne Iudge and preserver of all truth, who a hundred yeares hence, shall raise up of my ashes a Goose which shall not suffer himselfe to be raised. So as John Hus was burnt the yeare 1417, and Martin Luther began to shew himselfe in the yeare 1517.

John Hus, and Jerome of burnt.

There were great complaints against the abuses of the Church, made by Peter d'Almon a Cardinal, and John Gerson Chancellor of the Vniuersity of Paris, and Deputy of the French Church. The Colledge of Sorbon had given him great instructions vpon this subject, but nothing was effected. They only make the Pragmaticall Sanction, to suppress the Popes authority. Gerson returning from Basil dyed for griefe at Lyons. But this Councell did not end those two difficulties for the which it had bene called: for Peter de la Lune, called Benedict the thirteenth, being depofed by the Councell, and recreated John Arragon, had so incensed Alphonfus King of Arragon, as he supported him with violence against Martin the new Pope. And the Bohemians were so moued with the death of these two peronages (whom they reuerenced) as they tooke armes vnder the Command of Zizka a very famous Captaine, and did much annoy the Emperour Sigismund. Peter de la Lune, called Benedict the thirteenth, held his Court apart, dying at Lambeth a Towne in Arragon, as Martin did at Rome; but this humour brought him to his graue.

After his death the Colledge made choice of Giles Munion, who was called Clement the seauenth, Martin dyes in the other fear, and his Colledge doth choofe a Venetian of the family of Condeme, and calls him Eugenius the fourth, who finds the meanes to cause the Antipope Clement the seauenth to relinquish. But the Bohemian action was of more difficulty, for they spake boldly, being in armes: and Sigismund the Emperour prefert to haue audience for them, having receiued great reproaches, for that (to please the Pope) he had violated the publicke faith, and suffered the breach of his passport. These causes made Martin the first to call a Councell at Basill, whether the Bohemians had free liberty to come: but the Emperour gaue them hostages for their surety, trusting his word no more, the which he had broken in the death of their Countrymen. There were likewise many more besides the Bohemians which desired some redresse for these visible confusions: as it was there freely disputed of the necessity to reforme the Church, being set to begin

The Councell
of Basill decreed tie.

A first with the Pope, and not to suffer the fore-past disorders, to the great scandall of all Christians: and that (to avoid a future inconuenience, by the generall discontent of all men) it was reasonable he should submit himselfe to the censure of the Councell, whereunto he was subiect.

As the Fathers of the Councell, with a generall consent had thus concluded, and had drawne articles, that the authority of the Councell was above the Pope: Eugenius fore-seeing the prejudiciall consequence of this Decree, resokes the Councell assembled at Basill, for certain great considerations, which (said he) proceeded from the holy Ghost, and transported it to Bologna, to the exceeding discontent both of the Fathers and the Emperour. They resolute to oppose themselves against this brauado of Eugenius, and to withstand him by the like authority of the Church, whereby he sought to ruine them. By the authority of the generall Councell lawfully assembled, they giue him an assignation to appeare before them; and in case hee disobeyes, they declare him degraded and excommunicate. Eugenius (to calme this storme) makes shew to yeeld vnto this Decree, and promitteth to obey, yet seeking meanes vnderhand to crosse them, relying vpon Charles the seuenth, who followed his party. It chanced also (as Eugenius desired) that the Emperour Sigismund (who was the chiefe opposer to his designs) dyed during these disorders: yet the Councell of Basill was not dissolued, but was resolute to continue firme. Albert of Austria is chosen Emperour after Sigismund, and succeeds him both in his desire to continue the Councell at Basill, and in the Imperiall dignity.

The Councell
of Basill summons the Pope to appeare.

Matters grew then more violent, our Charles the seuenth (being loth to yeeld in any thing to the Emperour, having made a generall truce with the King of England, as we haue said, the English likewise holding with Eugenius) sends his sonne Lewis neere vnto Basill, with an army compounded of French & English vnto, to nourish this notable disunion, the issue whereof was as we haue said. The Councell of Basill incensed by these bitter and violent courses practised by Eugenius, in the end they resolute to degrade him, and in his place they choofe this Amedee Duke of Sauoy (of whom we haue spoken in diuers places) hauing made himselfe a Monke, of purpose to be chosen Pope, amongst so many which aspired to this dignity, and was called Felix. But this cured not the disafection: for at this new election of a Duke of Sauoy to the Pontificall dignity, all Kings, Princes and Potentates were moued (France, England, Italy and Spaine) at so strange a proceeding, and disauow Felix. In the meane time the Colledge of Cardinals at Rome, choofe Thomas Savoyan Pope, and name him Nicholas the first, a man commended in histories, fit to suppress this Schisme, and to reduce the Church to vniou, being wise, modest, learned and quiet: all Kings and Christian Princes allowed of him by a generall consent. Felix was supported by the Germans, for Albert fauoured him, but he dies soone. Frederic the third succeeding in the Empire, a wife and a modest Prince, who (not to contradict the Germanes at first) followed their humour in fauouring of Amedee: but in the end ouer-ruled by a generall consent of all Christendome, he vseth his authority with Amedee, to make him renounce his Popedom. Our Charles doth likewise interpose his authority, and sends John Iuueual of Vrlins his Chancellor vnto him, being well accompanied, who findes him at Lozanna, where he had made his pontificall seat with a rarely colledge of Cardinals. He feared the King more then any man liuing, whom in his conscience he had moued to a iust dislike of him, when as he made a good shew, and yet betrayed him in his greatest afflictions (crosses which wound euen the very heart of a generous minde.) Moreover, Charles was both strong and neere at hand, to controule him, if he should continue obstinate. Felix stands vpon termes; but in the end, (when as the Kings Ambassadors spake vnto him of force) he grew more myld, and treated this businesse by the Kings authority, protesting that for his sake he did willingly resigne his right. Thus all obey Nicholas: and Amedee had a Cardinall haue with the title of Saint Sabine, and was Legate ouer his Countries, and of some part of Germany. This was the end of that feuer which so much commoted all Christendome: the reign of Charles being honoured with the blessing of God, to haue bene a solemne Theater both of the restoring of the Realme, and the reunion of the Church. But alas, during these trouell confusions of the western Church, the Christians of the East (who endured much) were now utterly ruined: Was left them in very poore estate vnder the reign of Charles the sixt, in the yeare 1396. In fifty yeares (during the scandall of this miserable Schisme, and the willfull warres of France and England) there happened a greater greater alteration. Our Kings and Princes had laboured long in vaine to recover the holy land, consuming an infinite number of men and inoney, and prevailing nothing. But Constantinople, the head of the Easterne Empire, remained still in state, with Greece, Macedonia, Thessaly, and a part of Natolia, whereof Trebizonde was the chiefe of that Empire. In this weaknesse which drew nere to a totall ruine, the Christians vanity was so great as to make two Empires, the one in Europe, and the other in Asia, and then either Empire being divided into diuers parcels, held by sundry Despotes or soveraign Lords, that among so many Masters there should be none at all. These confusions did bring in, fortifie, and wholly settle the Turkes, who were the horrible instruments of Mahomet, and enemies to all Christendome. I enter not into the particular discourse of this Easterne History: it belongs not to my subiect. I onely obserue the continuance of time, to shew the estate of the Church, and the Empire, with our Monarchy.

After our French had abandoned (as we haue said) this imaginary Empire of the East, the Palatines seized thereon, and governed it diuerly, according to their passions: Michael, Andronicus, John and Mazuel, hauing brought vpon the stage, both in diuers occasions and with diuers successe, the most horrible Tragedies which impiety could deuise to the great dishonour of the Christian name: in the end Constantine Palatogue gives the last acquaintance of the ancient possession of the Empire, to make a new bond in fauour of the Turkes, that his name might be answerable to his miseries. Wee haue shewed what a breach Baiazet had made in Hungary, making so great a slaughter of the French, when as he tooke John Duke of Bourgoigne prisoner. This beginning of a victory had in few proceeded farther and ruined Constantinople, the which he besieged, but that God (who would suffer the Christians to breath for their amendment) suppressed this Tyrant by another Tyrant: for Baiazet being taken by Tambrlane, did then suffer for his cruelty, but he left the conquest of the great Citie to his posterity, at such time as the wise and iust providence of God had decreed it: the which was fifty yeares after: for the battell wherein Baiazet was vanquished, after he had ouerthrowne our Christians, was giuen in the year 1395, and Constantinople was taken the year 1453, the 9 of May, by Mahomet the second, Grand-child to Baiazet, a fit instrument to punish the impiety, cruelty, and all other kindes of execrable dissolution which then reigned among the Christians, and euery among those which had the chiefe command.

This Mahomet was the sonne of Amurath, borne of a Christian, the Daughter of the Despote of Seruia, & instructed by his Mother in the Christian Religion, to be the more fit to chastise the Christians, who (confessing God in their mouthes and denying him in their deeds, could not be reined by a fitter instrument and more answerable to the crime whereof they were guilty, than a tyrant Atheist, who hauing tasted the true Religion, had spued it out, hauing no Religion, & mocking at all that carried the name of Religion. This Mahomet (seeking to settle his Empire as the eldest of his house, being loath to haue any companion) caused his two brethren to be slaine, Turpin and Calepin: the one he drew ned in a bason, the other he caused to be strangled. Hauing murdered his two brethren by two of his Bashaes, Mosfes and Hely, hee puts these murderers to death for his brethrens blood, shedding their blood who had become the instruments of their murders. Hauing thus settled his Empire by these solemnities, hee applies all his wit to ruine the Christians, being diuided of themselves by strange factions, and as it were inviting him to their ruine. He seileth vpon the Empire by degrees, being called in by the Christians to decide their quarrels, and fortifying the weaker of purpose against the stronger. A potent man, painfull, active and imperious, getting authority by his fearfull tyranny. Being seized vpon the Country, hauing incombred the Christians affaires, and diuided their minds by sundry intelligences, it was easie for him to besiege Constantinople: for who should succour it? The greatest enemies the Christians had within the Countrey, were the Christians themselves. The Latins (with the Churches of the East) had had recourse to the Pope, Emperor and King of France, and by their fauour to the Countess of Pila, Constance and Basill, one after another: but they returned with nothing but winde, despaire and mockery. Thus Mahomet (well assured of his enemies estate) besieged Constantinople, the which was now but the shadow of the Empire: a great mass of building, testifying, that the beauty of the Empire was decayed. The Emperor Constantine Palatogue, (who resigned his authority into Mahomet) had onely a few soldiers from his brethren.

Constantinople taken by the Turkes.

A from Genoa and Venice. Mahomet had two hundred and fifty ships of warre, and two hundred thousand fighting men: amongst the which the most warlike were leaued in those Countreies which made profession of the Christian Religion. The besieged seeing their estate desperate, fought to sell their liues dearly. But what could they doe? their walls being battered downe by the horrible thunder of the Turkish artillery, their port forced by their armed ships, and they themselves oppressed by so infinite a multitude. So as a general assault being giuen, Constantinople is taken by force. The City thus forced on the one side: as Constantine and many of his troope sought to saue themselves by a gate that was free, they were furiously pursued by the victorious Turkes, and the port being stoped by the multitude, many were smothered, among the which Constantine was found dead.

Constantine

smothered.

The Turke incensed for the losse of so many of his men, glutted himself with the slaughter of the poore Inhabitants of Constantinople, killing all indifferently, without respect of age or sexe, young and old, women and maidens, with such exceeding cruelty, as no man can write it without terror, nor read it without teares. When wee shall set before our eyes this goodly Countrey of the East, this Capitall Citie of the Empire, where the voyce of the Gospell had founded in the sacred mouthes of so many holy personages, and famous Doctors of the Church, which haue serued happily in their times, to become now the dungeon of impiety, the fortress of error, the rendezvous of all barbarisme and iniquity: where Mahomet raised himselfe about the Kings of the earth, and threatens Christendome proudly, hauing an Empire not onely fashioned, but also fortified with the force and power of so many Kingdomes. But alas! what speake we of Constantinople the last of our losses in the East? When we begin by Ierusalem; the chiefe Rendezvous of the Elders of the house of God, from whence the Gospell flowed, where the holy mouth of the Sonne of God and of his Apostles haue founded out: when we continue by Iury, a Land which hath so long nourished the true Church, and beene the guard of the doctrine of health: when we crosse ouer this great Countrey of Asia, and from thence passe into those goodly Prouinces of Europe, Greece, Macedonia and the neighbour Nations: when cast our eyes beyond the Sea, and behold from our windowes the heauens, vnder which Asicke lyes, heretofore replenished with so many goodly Churches, and enriched with so many excellent Doctors, and yet all these great and large Countreies are at this day the receptacles of Mahomet, where he vomits forth his blasphemies, and spoyle the miserable remainders of the poore Christian Church: where hee takes the Tithe of sonnes and daughters to giue them to Molue, forcing them to leaue the truth: where hee hath ouerthrowne all liberty, to plant his absolute tyranny, banished all learning and euery thing that may put man in mind that he is a man.

What may wee say in comparing our selues with them? are wee better then so many that haue liued in those desolate places, making profession of the same Christian religion, and the same hope of eternall life? Are our Prouinces stronger, more fertile and richer then theirs, and our Townes stronger and better peopled? O Christians! if he be wise that takes warning by another, how much should these examples serue vs! The same way which the capital enemy of the Church hath made to Mahomet to inuest him in the Empire of the East, is it not open by our common dissensions? A miserable date: the end of the warres betwixt France and England was the confirmation of the Ottomans at Constantinople; and the beginning of many miseries to many Nations, as we shall see in the following Reignes.

But as misery is good for something, nay rather as the providence of God is admirable, who can draw light from darkenesse: by the ruines of the Easterne Churches, those of the West haue bene enriched. The ignorance of all Learning was very great throughout all the Westerne Prouinces, since the rule of the Gothes. The knowledge of Learning and Sciences being banished out of the East by the Turke, came into the West, so as by a singular miracle, the West is now become East, this goodly Lampe hauing lightened the Prouinces, to bee a Herbinger to the Gospell. But the planting of the Muses is due to the Reigne of Francis the first, as well King of the Muses as of the French. The shipwracke of Constantinople did cast these great personages into Italy, the which haue giuen a beginning of solide and perfect knowledge to our Nations, Emanuel Chrysoliras an Athenian, George Trapezondae or of Trebizonde, Theodorus Gaza a Macedonian, Ierome

Ierosme Spartiate, Gregory Tiphernas, Iohn Argypolis of Constantinople, Leonicus Char. A condil an Athenian, Marcus Musurus a Candior, and Iohn Lascaris. These have begun, but our men have followed, as they have furnished them in the knowledge of these goodly professions.

Almost about the same time the Art of Printing had his beginning. Some attribute to the year 1440, to Iohn Gutsenberger borne at Strausbourg, others to Iohn Faust Mayence, in the year 1452. Doubtlesse it is an excellent invention to increase knowledge, although the vanity and malice of men makes it oftentimes their bane, to the prejudice of the truth and all good manners. But having wandred over so many strange Countries, Let vs returne to France, from whence having expelled the English, and reduced this Monarchy to her ancient beauty, by the means of our Charles, we must now see the last act of his raigne and life.

King Charles
and the Dauphin discontented ne with another.

THis last Act of the life of Charles, contains a notable president of the vanity of this world. Charles had passed a languishing youth, borne in the weakness of his father, and bred up in the cruelties of his mother: he began his life with poverty, the which was continued in the despaire of his affaires, and yet he purchased peace to his Realme; but now he cannot enjoy it, banding against his owne blood, and living in so wilfull a waywardnesse, as in the end he brought himselfe vnto the graue after a terrible and tragical manner. The whole Realme being in quiet after a long and tedious warre, beheld a new storme arise in the Kings house. Lewis the eldest sonne of Charles and Dauphin of Viennois, was not well satisfied with his father, and his father lesse with him. The occasions are rather probable then true, as they are observed by Writers. For to what end should Lewis be so discontented with his father, for that he was given to the loue of Ladies? It is more likely that the iealousie of command, was the cause why the sonne was not well satisfied with the credit his father gaue him in the State, and the father feared lest he should attempt more then was fitting. But whatsoeuer it were, behold a divorce betwixt them. Lewis was not able to endure the waywardnesse of his iealous father, craues leaue to make a progresse into Dauphine, to visit his subiects, and he obtaines it; but he spends two years in this voyage. Newes comes to the eares of Charles, of the carriage of his son Lewis, the which he did interpret according to his iealousie: secret spies fly out to observe the Dauphins actions, describing them according to the humor of Charles, and flattering his passions. They observed what men repaired vnto Lewis, and chiefly what great personages he entertained, Iohn Duke of Alanson (Godfather to Lewis) the Dukes of Bourgongne and Sauoy, and the Earle of Armaignac, were those on whose loue the Dauphin chiefly relied. Hee had likewise neede of money, considering the great charges of his traine, and the small meanes his father gaue him. This necessity made him to entertaine James Cœur a rich man, and very industrious to finde meanes to haue money.

This familiarity was very displeasing to Charles, who was not onely iealous of James Cœur his purse, but also of his good iudgement. All these were deepe in disgrace with Charles, but the weakest shall goe to the wall. The Kings choller increased hourly, for that Lewis came not vnto him; but hee delayed the time, and avoided his fathers commands with frivolous excuses. Charles thinks to force him, by taking away the means to entertaine his traine: to this end hee reuokes his assignations, and commands his Treasurers and Receiuers of Dauphine, not to furnish him with any thing. Lewis takes it by his owne authority, and forceth them to obey him. The Officers complaine to the King, and they must haue men to resist this force. The poore subiects pay all, and complaine with the Officers. Thus the irons grow hot by degrees, especially in the fathers conceit against the sonne, by whom hee sees himselfe disobeyed with a publike scandal. So hee takes counsell of his choller, and resolues to force him to that which he could not willingly haue.

With this resolution hee leaues troopes, giuing the charge thereof to Antony Chabannes

The King sends an army against the Dauphin
his sonne.

A Chabannes Earle of Dampmartin, to leadethem into Dauphine, commaunding him to seize both on the Dauphin and on the townes of that Prouince, and with him hee sends the Lord of Chastillon to gouerne the Country, and to haue a speciall care to disperse all his sonnes intelligences, being resolved to follow after with new forces. A dangerous Commission for these two seruants, who in time shall smart for it: but a more miserable employment of a father against his owne sonne, and an vnnatural feare of a child, flying his father as his enemy: for the Dauphin seeing his Country of Dauphine in armes against him, and his fathers forces to approach, persisting wilfully in disobeying of his fathers command, he resolues to retire himselfe into Bourgongne. Iohn de Lefeu, ballard to the Earle of Armaignac, was his great Counceller, with Lewis of Chaalons Prince of Orange, with whom he was when these newes were brought vnto him. And for that Orange is inuironed with the territories of France, Lewis (being loth to be ingaged) departs secretly and slips into Sauoy, being accompanied with these two good guides and their troops, having some houles fauourable for him in Dauphine, from whence he passeth into Sauoy, and so comes safely into the Franche-Comre, and then into Brabant, where he was honourably entertained by the Duke of Bourgongne.

Charles seeing his sonne gone out of the Realme, resolues to punish such as he held to be the cause of his departure, and that were in his power. Hee begins with the Earle of Armaignac, who had giuen him Lewis his ballard sonne for a guide: hee dispossesseth him of Armaignac and Rouergue, so as with great difficulty hee saues himselfe in Arragon: the colour was, that he would not obey the King, but opposed himselfe against the Archbishop of Aix, who was preferred by his nomination, with such other trifles of no moment.

Charles spoiles the Earle of Armaignac.

But Charles himselfe takes the charge to subdue the Duke of Sauoy, against whom hee had an hereditary hated. The Duke prevents the danger, and by the intercession of the Cardinal of Eftouteville, he makes his peace with Charles: hee giues him his children for hostages, and discouers what the Dauphin had said touching the Marriage: his daughter Charlotte, whereunto he would neuer agree without the Kings consent, and so they part good friends in fiew. And for the effecting of that which concerned him most, Charles sends to the Duke of Bourgongne, to demand his sonne, and to let him vnderstand that he fed the Foxe which should deuour his pulleine. The Bourgongnon excuseth himselfe, and so doth the Dauphin Lewis, with so great shewes of reason, as it seems Charles should be content: but yet he parts not from Brabant, being entertained with late by Philip according to his greatnesse. Charles is more incensed by this delay, the which he takes for a denyall, and doubles message vpon message, and to his words he adds deeds. The Duke of Bourgongne had a notable quartell with the Gantois, who were mutined, by reason of some impositions vpon Salt. Charles fauours the Gantois against Philip, whom he commands to suffer them to liue in peace, being subiect to the Crowne: and if hee had found any advantage, he had made Warre against him: which the Bourgongnon fore-seeing, he fortifies his frontiers with new Garrisons, and hee himselfe remains there to stand vpon his guard, to prevent all accidents. In the meane time; Lewis being a Widower (as wee haue said) by the death of the Daughter of the King of Scots; hee marries Charlotte, Daughter to the Duke of Sauoy. Charles was wonderfully disconcerted with his new presumption of his sonne, who was a young man, obstinately bent to his owne will, yet had hee before giuen halfe a consent to this marriage treating with the Duke of Sauoy.

Lewis marries
great dislike of his father.

Fourte yeares passe and more in those domestical broyles, but to what end serues it to relate euery particular, hauing so large a subiect: I haue faithfully continued this discourse, according to the truth of the matter, and the course of ymes. Before we speake of the Duke of Alençon, James Cœur remains a principall part of this criminall subiect. The Treasurer was likewise blamed; not onely for that he furnished the Dauphin with money too liberally, but also directed him with his counsell; being a man of judgement: I know the greatest part of Writers note this accident on his wife; both vpon another subiect, and at another season. As for the time, it is manifest error in the calculation of Alençon, who referres this sentence to the year 1452, and little yeares after; hee employs James Cœur in an honourable Ambassage, to Felix the fifth duke of Sauoy and Pope. But this is not the first contradiction of dates we find in this Author, who had viewed the affaires of France by the eyes of another. As for the effect, hee reports that which all the world knew: that James Cœur was accused to haue robbed the King, and to make his great traffike in the Leuant more free: to haue had intelligence with the Turke, and to haue assisted them both with armes and counsell. These were capital crimes, and yet hee escaped for a fine of two hundred thousand Crownes, and banishment: and thereupon the Lady of Mortaing was punished, as having wrongfully accused him. Yet I find that more likely which the Seigneurs of Lodun and Saint Pons, Gentleman of Viareux, dying very old, affirmed to haue heard, the one of his Uncle, the other of his Grand-father, both household seruants to the Dauphin, that the very cause why James Cœur was thus intreated, was for that he was too familiar with Lewis, as one of the instruments of his youthfull pleasures. Let every man beleue what he thinks most probable, whilest we finish this processe. The Duke of Alanson was prisoner at Loches, whilest that Charles toiled himselfe to punish the Earle of Armagnac, and to recover the Dauphin his sonne. They would haue forced this Prince to haue answered before the Constable of France, and the four Marshalls: the which he refused, challenging the priuiledges of the Princes of the blood. So Charles (after that he had caused him to languish about a yeare in prison, sends for all the Princes of the blood royal, the Peeres of France, and the officers of the Crowne, to meet first at Montargis, and then at Vendome. Hee sends this charge especially to Philip Duke of Bourgogne, who preparing a great army to assist there, was countermanded: & so by his example, nor any of the Princes, & but very few of the Peeres, were present at this arraignment. But the King (meaning to proceed at what price soeuer,) names certain Noblemen that should supply their places that were absent in this action, that nothing might want of all necessary solemnities to iustifie the condemnation. To conclude, according to the forme set downe in this processe, John duke of Alanson was found guilty of high treason, practising to bring the English into the realme, the ancient enemy of this Crowne: witnessses are produced, letters auented, and the confession of the accused: what more? Sentence was iudicially giuen, that he should lose his head, & forfeit all his goods, all being at the Kings good pleasure: the which neither Prefident nor Councillor durst contradict: yet Charles giues him his life, condemning him to perpetual prison, and his goods to his wife and children, where he continued but two yeares, for Lewis being King, he freed him from prison, & restored him to his dignity.

It is a hard law, when force is ioyned to a Kings command. Howsoeuer it were, the cleere sighted iudge, that the Kings ialousie was the true cause of the condemnation of this poore Prince, who had alwaies serued the King faithfully, and the King had loued him about all the Princes of his blood honoring him so much as to make him his Godson, carrying his eldest sonne Lewis to the Font. This his familiarity with his Godson, and the credit the Dauphin gaue vnto his counsels, was held to be a dangerous reftimony against him. Were it then iustly or vniustly that this Prince was thus intreated; who seeth not here a great proofe of the inconstancy of this world of great friends they become capital enemies: neither blood, nor the gages of loue in so holy a thing as the badge of our Christianity, can subdue the violence of passion, the which hath no restraint: yet euen that which should be of most force to vnite loue, hath most power to breed and increase ialousies. A notable preident in two so great personages. Passion makes these two great Princes prisoners, borne of one blood; the one a King, the other capable of a Kingdome. The one is prisoner at Loches with his guard, the other at Vendome or at Tours, in the greatnesse of his Court. This is the difference, the one endures paine forceably, the other voluntarily. But he that commits a sinne, is hee not a slave to sinne?

After this condemnation, Charles seemed alwaies grieved both in minde and countenance, the ialousie which he thought to quench, in suppressing him whom hee suspected, so increased, as in the end it was the cause of his death. Hee suruiued little: about two yeares after this Tragedy, the which happened the tenth day of October, in the yeare of our Lord 1458, and the King dyed the two and twentieth day of July, in the yeare 1461, which time was vnto him a languishing prison, or rather a pining death. Doubtlesse he that serues God doth reigne, and he that serues vice is but a slave: the Crownes and scepters of kings haue no exception in this. The quiet of a good conscience is true liberty: And who can haue a good conscience, but in doing well? How farre better, and more honourable

A honourable had it beene for Charles, to haue beene beloued and respected by his sonne Lewis, who being growne great, and hauing giuen many testimonies of his iudgement and valour, might well haue eased him in his greatest affaires, as Robert did Hugh Capet, being associate in the same reigne, to be honoured and serued by the Princes of the blood, especially of this his trusty friend, who had giuen him so many proofes of his loyalty in his greatest affaires, and receiued likewise from him such firme gages of his loue, and to reape the fruits of this so much desired peace, the which he had purchased for all his subiects. But if he afflicts others, he hath a good share himselfe. He makes his sonne to die, and to beg his bread in a strange Country: he causeth a poore Prince of his blood to languish in prison: and he himselfe feels in his soule a continuall torment of griefe, a fire of chollier and torture of ialousie, trusting no man, but liuing in continuall feare, and was this man at rest? A strange torment, he hath brought peace to all men, and cannot inioy it selfe, hee hath bread and cannot eate it.

But what read I in the Originall of the manners of our Charles? This King Charles (saith Montfret) after his reconcilment with Philip of Bourgogne, was of a good life and descent, but when he had recovered his realme, he changed his manners and polluted his life, in maintaining dishonest women in his Court, leaving the company of a good and loyal wife, suffering more honour and reuerence to be done to those women by the greatest of his Court, then to the Queene: they being more richly attyred then the Queene her selfe, the which was an ill preident in such a person: yet he gouerned his Realme very nobly and wisely, and was indued with goodly vertues, maintaining iustice throughout his whole Realme. Montfret and the History of Saint Denis, excuse the loue of false Agnes, and here they accuse Charles. My dute is to quote euery part faithfully in this my Inuentory, in the which there is nothing of mine owne but the bare report, whereby it appears, that vertues are mixt with vices: and that it is more easie to beare aduersitie then prosperitie. Let the example of Dauid be confronted with this: Wine causeth drunkennesse, and water tempests. Sometimes age is more weake and imperfect then youth, to the end the whole honour of any good that is in man, may be ascribed to God, who is the Author thereof. Joy and griefe, ialousie and loue, be they not contrary affections? and yet behold they are both in one subiect, *D*isturbing him diuersly. Inconstant nature of man! who is a slave to sinne, by the meanes of sinne, which receiues the motions of diuers winds, from North, South, East and West, both sowre and sweet.

It will be now time after all this, to shew the end of our Charles: but wee may not omit some notable things which chanced in this season, during the ebbing and flowing of these seven variable yeares. Lewis the Dauphine was resident at Genepe in Brabant, and married with the daughter of Sabbey, by whom he had a sonne. The Duke of Sauoy with his wife (who was daughter to the King of Cyprus) came to visit Charles, and to pacifie him, with hope that he should soone see his sonne, with this new gage of loue, but all this did but ease and not cure Charles his infirmity. We haue said before, that Henry the 6 King of England, was put in prison by the Duke of Yorke, who pretended the Crowne to appertaine vnto him by a iust title then vnto Henry. He makes an accord with the Duke of Yorke, to free himselfe from this captiuitie: that Henry should inioy the Crowne during his life, but after his decease it should come to the Duke of Yorke, and to his Heires after him: and so the Prince of Wales, sonne to King Henry, should be excluded from the succession of England. By this second Henry was released, but Charles his wife (daughter to King Rene of Sicillia) shewes her selfe more resolute then her husband, who (having provided for her affaires) disauows this accord as preiudiciall to her son, & against the lawes, which allow of no forced contract made by a prisoner: and so she armes to maintain her sonne the lawfull heire of the Crowne. The Duke of Yorke likewise leaues his army to frustrate the Queenes designs. At that time the Queene did win both the victory and the heads of the Duke of Yorke, of his second sonne, and of the Earle of Salisbury his chiefe partizan, whom she took prisoner in the battell and caused to be beheaded, but she shall haue her turne.

In the mean time these troubles which had an occasion vnto Charles to attempt against the English: although (transported with these home bred discontentes) he had a troublesome enemy within himselfe, without seeking one beyond the seas. This was done by the counsell and advice of the Constable of Richmont, who fearing the Kings humour, and and loth to deale in these discontentes, laboured to diuert him, giuing him a better subiect to exercise his spirit. It was also happy for the Constable, that hee was farre off, being likely that ieaousie would haue brought him first in question, whom Charles loued not much, for the crosses he had receiued by him in the beginning. The cause which had drawne Richmont from Court, was honourable for him: for by the death of Peter Duke of Britany his Nephew, he was called to the Duchy. Being Duke he would not leaue the Office of Constable, notwithstanding all the intreaties of his subiects, being desirous to honour that charge in his age, the which had honoured him in his youth, although he enjoyed the Dukedome but three yeares, dying with the good opinion of all France, hauing sufficed it much, both with his counsell and valour.

Enterprise against England.

This aduice to attempt againe England, giuen by the Constable, was executed by the Normans, vnder the command of Peter of Brezay, Seneschall of Normandy, accompanied with a good number of the Nobility of Normandy, and foure thousand fighting men: these might doe some great exploit in a Country diuided and troubled: but God hath pointed the limits of Kingdomes; and that great ditch of the Sea is sufficient to distinguish these two Monarchies, who haue enough to content them without attempting against their neighbour. To conclude, this army lands in England, and takes Sandwich, the which they presently spoile and leaue, and so returne to Henneuesen, from whence they imbarqued, carrying away foreot prisoners and spoyle. Their speedy returne was chiefly to saue their liues and goods, which had bene in great danger, if they had ingaged themselves farther, for any rich spoyle.

A strange death in the middle of ioy.

Charles was intreated by Ladislaw King of Hungary, sonne to that great Iohn Huniade, one of the strongest Champions against the Turke) to grant him Magdalene his daughter to wife, the which he did. As he prepared for this voyage, & a stately traine for his daughter, which might equall or surmount the Ambassage sent from Ladislaw, newes came of the death of Ladislaw, (a young man of twenty yeares of age, and of a generous hope) being poisoned at Prague: whose death was the cause of many miseries, as we shall hereafter see. Their ioy in France was changed to mourning, and the Wedding to a Funerall: to the great griefe of Charles. But to put him in mind of necessary causes, amidst these voluntary afflictions, it chanced that the Mother of Iane the Virgin (to purge the blood of infamy in the death of daughter, being condemned as a Sorceresse by the Bishop of Bayes, to please the English) obtains a reuocation of this sentence from the Pope, & Charles confirms it, causing it to be solemnly published to the content of all French-men, to whom the remembrance of this generous spirit shall be for euer pleasing.

The tragical death of Charles.

In the meane time, this ieaousie which was seld in the heart of Charles, is fed by the daily whisperings of this household flatterers. And now behold a strange accident: A Capitaine (in whom he had great confidence) assures him that they meant to poison him: he beleeueth it, and plants this apprehension so firmly in his minde, as he resolues neither to eate nor drinke, not knowing whom to trust. He continued obstinately for seven dayes in this strange resolution, the which in the end brought him to his graue: for being obstinate in this humour (not to eate, notwithstanding all the persuasions of his Physicians and seruants,) the passages were so stunk, as when he would haue eaten, it was then too late: and feeling his forces to decay he provided for his last Will, and dyed the twentieth day of Iuly at Meun vpon Yeure in Berry, in the yeare 1461, hauing liued nine and fifty yeares, and reigned nine and thirtie, leaving two sonnes, Lewis and Charles: the first shall reigne after his father, and the second shall be the cause of new troubles in France, but not such as haue reigned vnder our Charles the seuenth.

His disposition.

A Prince who hath as much aduanced the French Monarchy, as any King that was commanded: for finding the Realme ruined, he hath restored it: his Predecessors had plained the English in the bowels of the Bastard; he expelled them, bringing in a gentle peace after an intestine war of 100 yeares. A friend to Iustice, good order, and the people, resolute in great affaires, capable of counsell, wise, courageous, happy in the execution of good counsells, and happy in seruants that haue faithfully serued him to the end of his work, his reformation, whereunto God had appointed him. But these great and heroicall vertues were blisfied by some vices, which were more visible in his prosperitie, than his aduersitie: for affliction restrained him, but his happy successfull put him up, and gave scope to his humours, making him suspicious and ambitious, to the prejudice of his affaires, and

A and dishonour of his person. On the one side, vngouerned loue to strange women, making him to forget the lawfull loue of his wife, and to lose both time and iudgement, whereby he blemished his reputation, both with subiects and strangers. On the other side, presumption of his good successfull, made him vnpleasing vnto his best seruants; yet, euen to his house, and in the end it brought him to his graue, after a most fearefull & tragick manner, leauing in his vertues, an example to be followed, and in his vices to be avoided, with a visible proofe in his happy successfull, That God vseth weak instruments, to the end that he might be knowne to be the Author of the good worke they haue in hand, that his grace seeming strong in their weaknesse, the homage and honour of all good might be giuen to him: for whoseuer glories, let him glory in the Lord.

Charles had not sooner closed his eyes, but posts fly to Geneepe in Brabant vnto Lewis, to aduertise him of his death. The original notes it for exceeding speed, that through the diligence of Charles of Anjou, Lewis was aduertised of the death of his father, the very same day hee dyed. This post was speedy, yet slow in regard of the desire Lewis had to returne into France, and to take possession of this goodly Crowne, which attended him.

LEWIS the eleuenth, The 55 French King.

As it not then likely, that this so happy a Catastrophe of the latter reigne of Charles, should haue purchased Lewis as happy and peacefull a Crowne, as his Fathers had bene painful and full of crosses? But the heires of worldly possessions (which we call the goods of Fortune, and of the body) doe not alwayes inherit the same humours and complexions of their predecessors. Charles was of a courteous disposition, affable, a friend to Iustice, and capable of Counsell: hee leaues Lewis his eldest sonne, a Prince in truth, humble in words and shew, wife in aduersitie, painfull, a free entertainer of men of merit, curious to know all men, of a good capacity, perfect in Iudgement, and very continent. But these vertues were blemished with many vices: ill-tongued, reuengfull, cruell, full of fraud, dissembling, distrustfull, variable, a friend to base people, and an enemy to great persons, yet willing to reape the wrongs hee had done to many. But let vs impute this alteration to the multitude of his forraigne and home-bred foes, who had greatly altered the good seeds which nature had planted in him. That which plunged him into a labyrinth of troubles and afflictions during all the course of his life, was, that at his first coming to the Crowne, hee discountenanced most of the Princes & Noblemen, whom Charles had fauoured; preferring mean men to their places, changed (in a manner) all the ancient Officers of the Crowne, and cashiered and discharged the old Companies of men at armes; whereby such as hated him, did take him as an enemy to all valour and vertue. Lewis the Dauphine at the age of eleuen yeares, was rashly ingaged by some Noblemen and others of the Realme, in the Warre called the Praguerie, against his father, who speedily suppressed it by his resolution, as wec haue seene. Being come to the age of man, hee married with Marguerite Daughter to the King of Scots: and as hee fell rashly in loue, so hee reaped nothing but repentance.

After her death (not able to beare the vnpleasing waywardnesse of his father) hee retires into Dauphine, and takes to his second wife, Charlotte daughter to the Duke of Sauiy, by whom hee had Joachim, who dyed young, Anne married to Peter of Bourbon, Iane the wife of Lewis Duke of Orleans, and after King of France, the twelfth of that name; Charles his successor, and Francis who dyed likewise in his infancy. In the end Charles going to suppress the practices of his sonne in Dauphine, and the neighbor Princes, Lewis abandons the Countrey, and retires to Philip Duke of Bourgoigne, at whose charge hee was entertained sixe yeares.

Charles being deceased, Philip of Bourgoigne (to perfect this good office of Hospitality talitie to Lewis,) accompanied with Charles Earle of Charolois his sonne, Lames of Bourgogne Earle of Estampes, Adolfe Duke of Cleues, the Lord of Rauestin his brother, nephewes to the said Philip, the Earles of Nassau and St. Pol, and with many other Noblemen of the Netherlands, conducted him into France, with foure thousand horse well appointed, chosen among a hundred thousand fighting men, the which Philip had leaued vpon a brute that some Noblemen of the Country would aduance Charles the younger brother of Lewis to the Crowne. John Duke of Bourbon (the Duke of Orleans as well for his old age, as for that he mourned for King Charles decaise, came not from Paris) Peter and Lames of Bourbon brethren, the Earles of Eu, Vendosme, Dunoi, Graigne, Philip of Sauoy, with the greatest part of the Princes, Noblemen and Officers of the Crowne, goe to meet him, and conduct him to Rheims, where he is solemnly anointed and crowned by John Inuencal of Vrsus Archbishop of that place, assisted by the Cardinal of Constance, the Patriarke of Antioch, the Popes Legat, 4 Archbishops, 17 Bishops, and 6 Abbots, the 15 of August, 1461, being about 38 yeares of age. Two days after, Philip did him homage for his Duchy of Bourgogne, as Peere and Deane of the Peeres of France: for the Earledome of Flanders as a Peere of France, and for the County of Artois and all other lands hee held of the Crowne. Then made hee a sumptuous and stately entry into Paris, with very ioyfull acclamations of the people, as you may see at large in the Originalls.

After many sports, Tourneyes and publike feasts, Philip taking leaue of the King, exhorts him to lay aside all hatred and spleene conceived against some of his fauourers ancient seruants, from whom he should draw as many good seruices, as they had giuen testimonies of their loyalties to their lawfull Master: to liue in loue and vnith with his brother Charles, and to aduance him according to the degree he held within the Realme. Lewis was no sooner intalled, but the Inhabitants of Rheims minister an occasion to imple the first fruits of his forces. About Saint Remy the Collectors of imposts were taken, and their contracts burnt in open street. The King sends thither many followers disguised like Merchants and labourers, who entering secretly, and at diuers gates, become the stronger and are presently followed by some troopes led by the Lord of Mouy, who fall vpon the towne, takes 80 or a 100 of the most culpable, puts them to death & suppresses the mutiny. About the end of the yeare Lewis made a progresse into Touraine, when the Earle of Charolois coming from the pilgrimage of Saint Claude, did visit him, and the King (in reward of the kindeesse he had receiued from Philip) gives him the gouernment of Normandy, with 36000 franks yearly pension: for the non payment whereof there will soone grow great dissensions and ciuill warres. In sooth the words of a Prince should be held for Oracles, neither should he be lesse iudicious then constant in his promises. The Duke of Alencon was set at liberty, whom Charles the seueneth had restrained. But oh the vanity of man! we shall see him hereafter a prisoner, and condemned vnder his authority, who now giues him both life and liberty. Then the King gaue to his brother the Dukedome of Berry for his portion, and assigned the Queene his Mothers dowry (who shall not long enioy it, but dies in the yeare 1463,) in the Country of Xaintonge; with the towne and gouernment of Rochell, Chinon, Pezenas, and other places. Then he went in Pilgrimage to Saint Sauueur of Redon in Britany, where the Duke did homage for the said Duchy, the County of Montfort, & other places which he held of the Crowne. But deuotion did not so much draw Lewis into Britany, as a desire to discover the Dukes affection, his Country, and Forces, whom hee held in seculousse, and which shall easily draw the Duke into the vnion of the malecontents, as we shall see, which will fall out happily for him, to disappoint the King of the prey he hunted after in Britany.

Lewis in the meane time, carelesse of Philips aduice, notable well so indure the sight of his fathers spies (whom hee accused as the motives of his disgrace) changeth the gouernours of Prouinces, and most of the Officers both for lustice and warre: he placeth new, being chosen out of those that had beene companions of his fortune, the which (to engauate) they called a banishment, imputing it to them that were displaced. Moreover, he prohibited all Princes, Noblemen and Gentlemen, the sport of Hawking and Hunting, vnder great and odious punishments, no further then hee should permit: a second brand of the following combustions. Now the King of Arragon (seeking to reduce

A his rebellious subiects of Barzellona to their duties by force) ingageth the County of Roussillon to Lewis, for three hundred thousand Crownes, whereof hee receiued fifty thousand presently, being followed with a goodly and mighty Army, to succour the said King, vnder the command of Lames of Armagnac Duke of Nemours. Henry King of Castill, complains by his Ambassadors of these succours giuen to his aduerfary, which was a breach of the League betwixt France and Castill: The King as well to end this quarrell, as that which Bianch the only daughter and heire of the King of Nauarre wife of the said King of Arragon, had with the King of Castill, by reason of some places in Nauarre) goes to Bourdeaux, and there concludes the mariage of Antigardene of France his sister, with Gaston the eldest sonne to the Earle of Foix, and presumptiue heire of Nauarre, who lay hurt at Libourne with a Lance at a Tournay, whereof he dyed, leauing a sonne and a daughter: Francis Phabus his successor, (who reigned but one yeare) and Katherine who succeeded him, and was married to John of Albret: then he goes to Bayonne, where the King of Castill comes vnto him, and ends all controuersies: A dangerous and farall enteriew: for these two great Princes, the most strictly allied of all Christians, of ancient time from King to King, from Realmes to Realmes, and man to man, bound by great curses to maintain this necessary league, the which neuer yet had any breach, they now conceived a contemp and disdain one of another. The French of the Castillians sumptuousnesse and pride, in their words, countenance, and apparel: The Castillians of the plainnesse of the French attire, for Lewis had short garments, and of bad stuffe, the which the Spanish nation did impute to miserableness, wherewith he was neuer blemished. So as from that day, these Kings did neuer loue; but both nations continued such a mutual hatred one against another, as they haue left it hereditary to their posterity: and we haue felt the bitterness of this oldleuaine in our late and more then vicuall tumult. So perillous shall the enteriew be of our Lewis with Charles of Bourgogne (who shall hereafter come often in place) at Peronne, as we shall see.

Lewis being returned to Paris, as by the purchase of Roussillon hee had fortified his Realme towards Spaine, so desired he to assure on the other side, redeeming the townes lying vpon Soimne, the which had beene ingaged by the treaty of Arras, to Philip duke of Bourgogne, for foure hundred and fifty thousand Crownes, with this condition, that the King should maintaine all the Officers aduanced by the Duke in the said townes: a promise without performance, for after the oath taken to serue him against all persons, at the first he tooke away the gouernment of Amiens, of Arras, and of Doullans from Sauuse: that of Morraigne from Hautbourdin a bastard of Bourgogne: and the Bayliwick of Amiens from the Lord of Creuencœur (whose lands he did confiscate soon after) aduancing to these offices Lannoy the Nephew of Croy, whereby he did greatly discontent the Duke, and the Earle of Charolois his sonne more, who in despite of the said redemption, did afterwards chase away the Lord of Croy, with his whole family, and confiscate their goods, they being the meanes thereof. Being retired into France, Lewis gaue him the County of Guinnes, with the office of Lord Steward of his house. A discontent which shall hasten the Charolois to arme against our France. Moreover Lewis, to tye the Pope vnto him, (by the meanes of John Balne Bishop of Arras, (who since was made Cardinall, in recompence of so good a seruice done to the Court of Rome) sends Godfrey Bishop of Albi Cardinall of Abbeuille vnto him, to renounce all rights of the pragmaticall Sanction: So doing, the Pope promised to send a Legate into France, that should giue all benefices; so the end that all the money which should be raised thereby might remaine within the Realme, and bee no more transported to Rome. But the Pope being seized of the charter of the said Sanction, made no accompt to performe his promise, and to please the Romans, he caused it to bee dragged through the streets. So as Lewis being thus deceived, did forbid to cary any more money to Rome, nor to bring any Bulls from thence.

He made Sforza Duke of Milan his vassall, giuing him Saouonne which the French held, (a heauy moeting of lamentable warres, which followed) and receiued his homage. But whilst he labours to purchase friends abroad, hee procures himselfe infinitely mighty enemies at home, the Princes and Noblemen to whom the first places in Court, and offices of the Crowne did appertaine, seeing themselves with great indignity supplanted by these new comers growne vp in one night, and put from the Kings fauour, they found one another another, both by mouth, writings, and by diuers messengers: being assured of their actual losses, they open their minds, discover their conceptions, and conclude, To defend and maintain their dignities. For (say they) to what end doe wee suffer the indignities and braueries of these new upstarts? we should shew want of courage not to apprehend the wrong the King doth vs. Wee haue armes, men, friends and money to force him to reason, seeing we are debarr'd his presence by these base people that possesse him. The chiefe were Charles Duke of Berry the Kings brother, John Duke of Bourbon who had married Charlotte the Kings sister, Francis Duke of Britany, John Earle of Dunois, Isard brother to Lewis Duke of Orleans, the Duke of Nemours, the Earle of Armagnac, and the Lord of Albret. The Duke of Berry was easily drawne into this league, discontented to haue no better portion then Berry. The Duke of Bourbon had not yet receiued his mariage money. The Briton could not digest foure hard conditions, the which Lewis (hauing an army ready in case he refused) required of him: That he should no more trouble himselfe, By the grace of God Duke of Britany; That he should coine no more money without his permission: That from thenceforth the King should leaue taxes and subsidies in Britany, and not the Duke: And that all that were benefited within the Dukedome, should acknowledge him immediately for Patron and Soueraigne. Priuiledges which still then had bene alwaies expressly refused to all the Dukes his Predecessors, in the homages they did to the Crowne. The Earle of Dunois had alwaies bene the chiefe of the Army, and Lieutenant General to Charles the seuenth, and now is deprived of all his Offices and dignities by Lewis his sonne. So every one pretended diuers causes of complaint.

Charles of Berry must cary the bable, a yong Prince and credulous, an age which doth easily be men bold and rash, for they would vie him as the reuenging instrument of their passions. But where is the meanes to draw him from Court without lesaule? Behold an occasion is offered. After that Lewis had visited the townes of Picardy lately redeemed, hauing crossed Normandy and Touraine, hee passeth to Poissiers, leading Charles his brother with him. Lewis going one day to his deuotion, John of Rommille, Tanneguy of Chastell (Nephew to that Tanneguy that was charged for the death of the Duke of Bourgogne) agents for the Briton in this action, vnder colour to say, Charles Duke of Berry to the hunting, they lead him into Britany. Tanneguy was discontented, for that hauing disbursed fifty thousand Francks at the funerals of Charles the eleuenth, in the absence of Lewis, he had neither recompence, nor any thanks of the King, and was not satisfied for the space of ten yeares. There remained nothing but to be assured of Philip Duke of Bourgogne, who euen then had great cause of discontent: for during the partialities of England, betwixt the houses of Lancaster and Yorke, Lewis supported Henry against Edward (he being of Lancaster and this of Yorke) for that Henry had married the daughter of Kene King of Sicilia, and by consequence was neere kinsman to Lewis. In fauour therefore of this Queene, he makes a proclamation in the territories of the Duke of Bourgogne, forbidding them to aide or assist Edward, terming himselfe King of England. And for a greater disgrace, King Lewis would impose a custome vpon the salt in the Duchy of Bourgogne.

The Bourguignon opposeth: he protests that Edward King of England is his ally, and that he could not deny him succors being required. As for the custome he shewes forth the ancient priuiledges of Bourgogne, and intreats the King to forbear in the execution of this charge. Behold a sharpe touch, which might easily open the Dukes eares, to hearken to these malecontents: yet would he not enter, but suffers the Earle his sonne to vie all his meanes for this effect, being discontented for the gouernment of Normandy taken from him, and his pension not payed; for the redeeming the Townes vpon Somme, and the aduancement of Croy in France. And although the passing and repassing of the Agents and factours of these Princes were very secretly performed by men disguised like religious men, pilgrims and beggers, yet could they not worke so secretly, but the King had intelligence, that the Britton had sent to practise the loue and league of the King of England, and that by John of Rommille, Vice-chancellor of Britany, he had made a strict alliance with the Earle of Charolois, a violent and valiant Prince. Thus the King sends the bastard of Rubempré, a sea Captaine, to surprize such as he should find passing out of Britany into England, or from the Bourguignon to the Britton. This bastard

from Lewis
Philip.

A lands at la Haye in Holland, he enters the towne (with three in his company) where then the Earle was resident. Being examined of his quality, and of the cause of his landing, he makes some difficulty to discover himselfe. He is put in prison, as a pirate, sent (said they) by Lewis to surprize the Earle treacherously, and so to preuaile more easily with the Duke his father. This brute was dispersed through the Country, which made the King odious. At the first report of these newes, Philip being at Hedin, dislodged without taking his leaue, although hee had promised not to depart without speaking againe to the King. Lewis (aduertised of the bastards detention), sends the Earle of Eu, the Chancellor Morvilliers, and the Archbishop of Narbonne to Liller: they accuse his sonne of treachery and infidelity, for that hee had made a league with the Duke of Britany, a friend and confederate with the English: he complains of the restraint of Rubempré his seruant: and demands amends for words giuen out against the Kings honour: that the prisoner should be enlarged, and for expiation of the crime, that the authors of this slander should be deliuered into the Kings hands (especially Olivier de la Marche, one of the chiefe in the Dukes Court) to be exemplarily punished. The Chancellor who deliuered the speech, being but a blunt man, made it as bitter as hee could, and omitted nothing that might make the fact odious and criminall (for the which hee shall in time and place, be disallowed by the King and lose his office) adding moreover, that he could not conceiue the cause of the Earles discontent, if it were not for the pension and gouernment which the King had giuen him, and since taken away.

Philip answers, that Rubempré being charged with many crimes, was iustly taken, and in a County where Lewis had no right. If the informations did acquit him, he would send him to the King. That la Marche was of the County, and therefore the King nor to bee his competent iudge; yet if hee had done or said any thing against the honor of his Majesty, he would punish him to his liking. Morvilliers insists, vrging that Philip should not deny the King, and that he should command his sonne, not to entertaine any bad conceits of his Majesty, nor beleue the slanders imposed vpon Rubempré. The duke replies: That till then hee had neuer denied the King any thing: and contrariwise the King had failed of his promise, in that contrary to their transaition he had fortified the Townes redeemed, with great garisons, the which hee should haue inioyed during his life; and taken an oath of the Nobility, to cary armes indifferently against all hee should command. That if his sonne were ielous and distrustfull, hee took it of his mother, who had often suspected him to goe to other Ladies: and not from him, who suspected no man. The Earle of Charolois toucht with the Chancellors speech, would haue taken the defence of his honor and the Duke of Britanies: but Philip tearing left choller should transport him beyond reason, commands him to prepare for the next day. The night brings Counsell. The Earle hauing considered well of his plea, answers very respectfully: yet he maintains, that the proceffe of Rubempré would shew, that his imprisonment was both iust and duly made. That he had made an alliance and strict league with the Duke of Britany, being brothers in armes, but their association did nothing preiudice the Kings seruice, nor the good of his Realme, but rather their common forces should bee alwaies ready for the preservation of his Crowne and the publique good. As for the losse of this gouernment & pension (whereof he had neuer receiued but one quarter) he was nothing displeased: that as for any wealth and honours, the fauour of the Duke his Lord and Father did suffice him.

Thus the Ambassadors returne nothing to Lewis, but threats from this Earle, who charged the Archbishop of Narbonne particularly with this speech. That within one yeare he would make the King repent the injurious words hee had caused his Chancellor to giue him, in the presence of the Duke his father. And hauing speedily assembled a great Army out of Artois, Hainault, Boullen, Flanders, Holland, & Brabant, consisting of foure thousand men at armes, and eight or nine thousand Archers, vnder the ensigne of Lewis of Luxembourg Earle of Saint Paul, and afterwards Constable of France; the Lord of Rauestin brother to the duke of Cleues, Anthony bastard of Bourgogne, Isard, Amour, bastard brother to the Earle of Saint Pol, Conia and Lalaise valiant and wise Knights, with many other Noblemen and Gentlemen, and great store of Artillery and carriages, hee enters into Picardy as Lieutenant General to the Duke of Berry, taking armes to releue (sayes hee) the people surcharged with taxes and subsidies; and to recover their ancient freedoms and liberties; to restore the Nobility to their honours and ancient dignities, and to give unto the Clergy their rights and preeminences. In truth these were goodly shewes, able to persuade the credulous, and to supplant the affections of the simple.

For the first fruits of his forces, he takes Nefle (a little Castle neere unto Noyon, in the which there was a garison) Roy, Montdidier, Beaulieu, and Pont Saint Maxence: then having passed the rivers of Somme and Oise, hee comes with little spoile of the Country, to Saint Denis, where all the confederates should meet, but they failed of their appointment. Having presented himselfe before Paris, and skirmished at the gates with some losse to the inhabitants, supported only by the companies of men at Armes of Charles of Melun, Bayliffe of Sens, of the Marshall Joachim Rouault, and the Lord of Nantouille, afterwards great Master: he seized vpon Saint Cloud, where his army passed the Seine, to draw towards Etampes, and to ioyne with his confederates, whom the kings army stayed in their march. In the meane time the Duke of Bourbon seizeth vpon the Kings reuenues and treasure, and of the chiefe Officers, from whom hee might draw any money. Then did Anthony of Chabannes Earle of Dampmartin escape out of the Bastile at Paris, whom Lewis held prisoner, for that he had made warre against him in Dauphine, by the command of Charles the seuenth, vntill he had provided such caution as he demanded for the performance of the condition, for the which hee had given him his life. That he should passe the remainder of his life an Exile at Rhodes. Who going through Gafinois, tooke and spoiled the Castles of Saint Forgeau, and Saint Maurice, and caried away the Captaine prisoner, which was Jeffrey the sonne of James Cœur: hee seized vpon Saint Pourcain, and being aduertised that the King sent to besiege him by the Bayliffes of Sens and Melun, he retired himselfe to the Duke of Bourbon. This sight did suddenly draw the King vpon the Duke. The places of Bourbonnois were in a manner all taken and assured: but having intelligence that the Duke of Nemours, with the Earles of Albret and Armagnac did march, and that succours came to the Duke of Bourbon out of Bourgongne, leauied by the Earle of Beaulieu and the Cardinall of Bourbon, brethren to the said Duke (the which were of more shew then profit) he willingly hearkens to an accord with these Princes, wrought by his sister being wife to the Duke of Bourbon, that they should beare armes for the King, and labour to win their confederates vnto him. A conuention ill obserued, by meanes whereof Lewis had caused the siege of Rion in Auergne to be raised, the which was at their deuotion: this done, he goes towards Angers, to try if by mildnesse and good meanes he might reclaime his brother being in Britany. Not able to effect it, and hearing the Earle of Charolois approached with great expedition to Paris, he leaues Rene King of Sicily and duke of Aniou, and Charles Earle of Mayne his Vncles by the motherside vpon the frontiers of Britany, to hinder these great forces from ioyning with the Bourguignons. And left the Parisians (abused with this goodly shew of the common-weale) should receive them, he being so farre from them, he caused his Vncles to aduance, who dislodging alwaies before the Britton, did greatly annoy him for want of victuals, and hindreth his march, and he himselfe posts to Ordeance with speed, and from thence to Chastres vnder Montchery, with no intent to fight vntill hee had visited Paris, and gathered a greater power, but necessity forceth him. The Earle of Charolois hearing of the Kings approach, marcheth towards him with the bastard of Bourbon, commanding the reuerward to ioyne with the Earle of Saint Pol, who led the forward, and takes his place of battell in the plaine of Montchery, where they appeare at the break of day the 27 of Iuly. Having discouered the Kings army led by the Lord of Brezay great Seneschall of Normandy, he commands all his archers and the greatest part of his men at armes to leaue their horses, and euery man to plant a stake before him in the foremost ranks to withstand the fury of the horse: behind he compasseth himselfe in with his carriages, and on the flanke he fortifies himselfe with a forest adioyning, having resolved to fight on foot in a place of aduantage for the foot, before that all Lewis his troopes were ioyned. Lewis had about 2200 well appointed Lances, besides the Nobility of Dauphine, and some great Gentlemen of Sauoy and Bresse, a great number of Archers, and other men of war, but not equal to the Bourguignon. God, who disposeth of battels, would now chastise our King, but not to his ruine.

The Earle of Charolois like a great Commander vsed a good stratagem, seeing the French

A French army could not descend into the valley of Torfou, but by small troopes: for when as the forward appeared, they were not about 400 Lances, yet hee gaue respite to them that were farthest off to set forward, whilst the two armies spend the time in light skirmishes and Cannon shot. Having past some foure houres, the Earle aduertised that the Parisians (being sent for by the King) might come & compass him in behind, he aduanceth first four forward doth likewise march, but he beats them backe vnto the village, and (to dislodge them from thence) hee fires certaine houses, so as the wind drives the flame and smoke into our archers faces, who did likewise fight on foot: he forceth them abandon the place and to recover their horses. The Bourguignons likewise mount and gallop after our runnawaies, but they had recovered a long and large ditch which they found by chance in the field with a strong quick-set hedge, behinde the which they breasted, whilst the enemy laboured in the pursuit: but issuing at either end in troope vpon the Bourguignons, they charge them so resolutely, as they turne their backs, ouerthrowing their own archers in the flight: some recover their carriages, and some the Forest: amongst others the Earle of Saint Paul and his brethren, the Lords of Rauellin, Haplaincourt, d'Aimeries, d'Inchi, Rabodonges, and many others. The Nobility of Dauphine, Sauoy and Bresse had the chiefe honour of this defeat. The archers thus broken, they remained at the mercy of the French. But being pesterd with the baggage, some Bourguignons rallied together, turne their carts, compass them in, and beat them downe with great beetles of lead. And to increase the losse, the Earle of Charolois fighting on the right hand towards the Castle, had an easie victory ouer our men, chafing them backe about a thousand paces. But having intelligence that they were ioyned againe, and that if he passed but two arrow shoots farther he should be taken, he returned suddenly, and encounters an amazed troope of footmen flying in the village. He chargeth them, but no man turnes head, sauing onely one souldier who strucke him on the breast with a borse-pike, but the foot-man lost his life with some few others, who could not in time recover the gardens and orchards. As hee passed against the Castle, hee met by chance with a troope of men at armes, which saued themselves from the rout at the carriages: one of them in the charge giues him a dangerous wound in the throat with his sword, by reason of this beuer that was false. Jeffrey of Saint Belain, called La Hire, Bayliffe of Chaumont, and Gilbert of Grassy knew him. They presse him to yeeld and not to bee slaine: but behold the sonne of a Physician of Paris, called John Cadet (the history in truth owes his name for so worthy an act) being big and mightie of body, mounted on a horse of the same proportion, rushes through them, and diuides them that held him. Then happily arriues the Bastard of Bourgongne, and the Earles guard, by meanes whereof the French retire themselves to their ditch, where they had bene in the morning. During the which, a false brate of the Kings death had almost ouerthrowne all: for euery one began to faint. The Earle of Mayen, the Admirall of Montauban, and the Lord of Barde embracing this common belief, fly with all the reuerward. Lewis aduertised of this amazement, takes off his helmet, shewes himselfe to his souldiers, and so assures them that he is aliue. On the other side, the Bourguignon rallies his men disperfed and wearied, ready to fly if they had bene charged. At the same instant the Count St. Paul, goes to the field and gathers together vnder his ensigne about eight hundred men at armes, and but few foot. Behold, the two armies standing in battell one against another, mutually discharged their Cannon. The night approached which ended the battell: an encounter, where the notable flying on either side did wonderfully moderate the fury of the fight. The which being thus ended, the King was conducted by the Scots to the Castle of Montchery, having neither eaten nor drunk all that day, and then he retires to Corbell. The Earle keeps the field, spoiles the dead, and therefore holds himselfe a Conquerour. Amongst the Kings men were knowne Jeffrey of Saint Belain, the great Steward of Normandy, Capitaine Holquer Bayliffe of Eureux, with many Gentlemen, to the number of foure hundred horse and but few footmen. Of Bourguignons the Lords of Lalain, Hames, Oigny, Watemaign, almost all the Earles archers: Haplaincourt, Aimeries, Inchy and many others were taken flying, and being prisoners to Paris of foot-men there were more slaine, then of the Kings part. All which were esteemed by some, at two thousand of both sides: others held it at three thousand five hundred: but all assente constantly, that there were more Bourguignons then French, although Lewis lost more horsemen.

1465

In truth, the firme resolution, the constant labour, the dangerous hazards, manfully passed by the King, were sufficient motives to encourage his men to honour: and it had been well and courageously followed, notwithstanding his small number, and want of artillery, the Earle of Charolois souldiers had digged their graues at Montlehrie. Three daies after the battell, the Earle of Charolois being aduertised that his confederates approached, went to receiue them at Estampes. The Dukes of Berry and Britany, the Earles of Dunois and Dampmartin, the Lords of Loheac Marshall of France, of Buell, Chaumont and Charles of Amboise his son, all disgraced by Lewis, and put from their offices, although they had well serued the King his father. They brought with them (saith the History) eight hundred good men at armes, most Britains, who had newly left the companies, every one pretending some discontent. Of Archers and other men of warre resolute and well appointed, fixe thousand on horse-backe, all of the Britons charge, who assured (by some men at armes that fled) of the Kings death, promised him selfe much good in conceit, in case the Duke of Berry came to the Crowne. And if at that instant they would haue giuen him credit; they should haue suppressed the Bourguignons, or at the least diminished them, verifying, That there is final loyalty, and lesse pay in men of warre.

the Duke of Berry loathes the situation of his house.

On the other side, the Duke of Berry began to loath these broyles: for in open Council, hauing viewed seven or eight hundred hurt men wandring vp and down the towne he said: How much more glad would I haue bene, if this warre had neuer begun, then to paye my selfe riches and honour with the price of much blood. A speech wherof a milde Prince and not bloody: but ill digested by the Bourguignon, supposing that Charles would easily make his peace vpon the least motion made by Lewis. And to assure him selfe as well without as within the Realme, he sends William of Cluny (afterwards Bishop of Poitiers) to Edward King of England, although hee had alwaies supported the house of Lancaster, from whence he was issued by his mother, against that of York. Hauing refreshed their troopes they all dislodge from Estampes, and take the way to Saint Maurin of Larcham, and Moret in Gasinois, and hauing an intent to passe riuer of Seine, the Earle employes many coopers to make pipes, hauing brought great store of stiffe for that purpose, wheroun a bridge was made (for want of conuenient boates) through the fauour of the Cannon, which the Earle had planted in an Island in the midst of the riuer.

There ioynes with them John Duke of Calabria the onely sonne of Rene King of Sicily, the Prince of Orange, Thibault of Neuf chasteil Marshall of Bourgogne, and Messias his brother, the Marquis of Rotelin, the Lords of Argueil and Thoulougeon, with many others, leading nine hundred men at armes, of the Duchy, and Countie of Bourgogne, Sixscore men at armes barded Italians commanded by Galeot and Campo-basso, four hundred Germane Crosse-bowes sent by the Count Palatine, and five hundred Swisses (the which were the first that came to our warres, a fatal and lamentable alliance for the Bourguignon, as we shall see in his place) of other footmen very few. All this great rent of an hundred thousand men, enuiour Paris, they seize vpon Saint Maur, Pont Charenton, Conflans, Saint Denis, and other places thereabouts, they tyre the inhabitants with continuall skirmishes, euen at their gates: and shake their affections by practices and deuices. The Duke of Berry writes to the Clergy, to the Court of Parliament, to the Vniuersitie (which then was in great credit in Paris) and to the Bourgeses to stay one a part, shewing them that all these forces tend not but to the peoples ease and profit: and requires them to depute men of iudgement and learning, to vnderstand more at large the causes of this great assembly.

Ten Deputies heare their complaints, being led by William Chartier Bishop of Paris, they report it to the Councill of the City, who answers: That the City shall bee free for the Princes to enter into at their pleasure, they and theirs abstaining from violence and paying their expences. Surely this would haue bene a conquest of the City of Paris. But the great Master of Nantouillet, the Marshall Isachim, and other Capitaines raised view of their Forces, and by this means retaine the Parisians, who changing their mindes, are fully confirmed by the arrival of John of Rohan, Lord of Montauban Admirall of France, with great troopes of men. O light and inconstant people! how easie is it to moue thy affections, and to make thee in an instant to applaud that party which

A which euen now thou didst abhorre. But let vs leaue them in this good humour, and see what remedy the King had for these garboyles, attending the succours the Duke of Milan sent him.

Lewis being (after the battell) retired from Conflans to Paris, flatters the peoples humors, treats popularly with them; creates a priuy Councell of fixe Counsellors of the Court, fixe Doctors of the Vniuersitie, and fixe Bourgeses, to gouerne his affaires, according to their aduice and direction: he leaues 600 Lances in Paris, vnder the command of the bastard of Armaignac, Earle of Combringe, Master of Gilets, of Saint Simon, Bay-liffe of Senlis, la Barde, Craon, Charles of Maurs, and Charles of Melun his lieutenant, in the said towne. Then he goes into Normandy, to assemble all the Nobility and men of warre he could: from whence he sent the Earle of Ruoto, haue the command of the warre, and of the City, followed with two hundred Archers well in order. The Earle being arrived, he sends the Lord of Rambure to the Leaguers, offering to bee a mediator for their discontent vnto his Maiesty, but it was without effect.

The King hauing intelligence of the confederates traffike with the Parisians, knowing that this people doth easily change their affections with the successe: and foreseeing that this baite of the Commonweale, would soone bewitch them, displeased also that the Bishop had without his knowledge treated of an accord, hee hastens his returne, accompanied with the Earles of Mayen and Ponthieure, the forces of Normandy. And for the first fruits of loue to his subjects, hee confirmed all the priuiledges they enjoyed in his fathers life: hee abolished all new impositions, and retained none but the ancient and ordinary farmes of Merchandize that is sold by great: then did hee punish, either with banishment or death, such as had yeelded to the reception of the heads of the League into the City. Hee doth sharply blame the Bishop, (at the infligation of the Cardinal of Albis) to haue bene a dealer in his absence for his enemies, with an inconstant and ill-advised people: and hauing provided for the fury of the City, hee prepares to offend and defend. The Bourguignon likewise vieweth all force, making great and daily skirmishes with the Parisians, sometimes chasing and sometimes chased. And hereupon comes new supplies to the Leaguers, the Dukes of Bourbon and Nemours, the Earle of Armaignac, and the Lord of Albret (notwithstanding the former treaty) with about fixe thousand men.

Means to paccise a people that wauert.

On the other side, the King receiued from Francis Sforze Duke of Milan, fixe hundred men at armes, and three thousand foot, commanded by Galeas his eldest sonne, with this Councill of State: That to diuide this company, he should yeeld to all conditions, and only preserve his men. An aduice which Lewis shal cunningly put in practice speedily. These Milanais were employed in Bourbonnois, vntill newes of the peace shall come. The Earle thus fortified, offers battell, but the King would not hazard any thing, desiring to disperse this mistle cloud without effusion of blood. And to annoy them of Conflans and Charenton, he sends foure thousand francke-archers, and about foure hundred pioneers, supported by the Nobility of Normandy, and some men at armes, who plant themselves vpon the riuers side, right against Conflans, at the English port, where they make a large and a long trench vnto the City, with a Bulwark of wood and earth, wheroun they plant many peeces of artillery, which at the first drues the duke of Calabria out of Charenton, with great losse of his men, and an extreme terror to the Earle of Charolois, who lodged at Conflans in a house belonging to his father. Two Cannon shot passed through his chamber being at dinner, and slue his Trumpeter, carrying a dish to his table. This amazement makes him goe downe with speed: he fortifies his lodging, pierceeth the walles, and plants a cannon for a counter-battery.

A politicke
aduice.

But they must dislodge these francke-archers, and prevent the losse they receiued from the other side of the water. For the effecting of this, hee obtains a truce for two dayes: in which time he made a bridge of boats. The bridge almost finished, the francke-archers leaue their trenches, carry away their artillery, and retire to the suburbs into the Catholians cloister. A part of the Bourguignons army passeth the water: they enter the suburbs of Saint Marceau, and skirmish, but with little losse on either side. Hereupon our Capitaines resolute to assaile the enemy in diuers parts. A page sent by night giueth them intelligence. At the break of day some horsemen charge home to the artillery and kill a Canoniere. This was in shew the effect of the pages aduertisement. All arme: they make make barricadoes and stand firme. The Artillery thunders: the Kings answers them. They send forth two hundred horse to discover: who see a troope issuing forth the City to learne the cause of this tumult, and moreover a great number of Lances in conceit and so they report that all are come forth in battell; but the day breaking they proue but shuffles. So this alarme turnes to laughter. In the meane time they treat of peace, but the demands of the confederates were excellent. The Duke of Berry demands Normandy for his portion.

An enteruew of the two Commanders.

The Earle of Charolois, the towne of Somme lately redeemed. For the better effecting hereof, the two Commanders conclude of an enteruew. The King mounts vp the wall right against the Bourguignons army, accompanied with the Lords of Montauban Admirall, Naitiviller, du Lau, and few others. The Earles of Charolois and S. Pol, come receiue him. He then offers to giue his brother the Prouinces of Bry & Champagne, accepting Melun, Meulan, and Montereau, the which he would not accept. Hee grants Charolois his desire, dil auowes Mouilliers in certaine speeches, wherein he faith, he had exceeded his charge: & for the Earles sake he promifeth to giue the office of Constable to the Earle of S. Pol. These entercoures of either side proue fatal for the King: for he fides that the Princes do daily suborne more of his men then he can draw from them: he hold, Pontoise is deliuered to the Britton by Sarhier, commanding there vnder the Marshall Teuchin, and to finish so notable a victory, hee marcheth towards Meulan to the famous rent: but the inhabitants being aduertised, he returns without effect. There grows and ther vpon in Paris the souldiers want insolently, that the citizens goods are at their free disposition: that they will take the keys of their houses from them, and for a need will pull the chaines out of their streets. Hereupon the Prouost of Merchants calls the Capitaines of the quarters, and chiefe of the City to Councell: hee commands them in night to make fires at all the corners of the streets, and to watch in armes, euery man in his quarter. The people stand vpon their guard, ready to attempt some great action. The King himselfe goes the round, he finds the gate of the Bastile towards the fields open; at the artillery cloyed. But on the prouidence of God! misfortune is good for something. These vnexpected fires disappoint the conspirators practices, they hinder the approach of the enemy, and saue the City. Moreover, Gisors is beleagred, and the garison abandons it. But that which imports more, the widow of the great Seneshall of Breau (gouerned by the bishop of Bayeux) then resident at Rouan, with some other Partisans, giues John Duke of Bourbon entry into the Castle, and so into the City. The City desiring long to haue a Duke remaining in the Country, consents to this change, and Lewis to the said Duke, for the Duke of Berry. In a manner, all the Townes and Castles of the Prouince follow the example of their capitall City.

The peace of Constans, and the conditions.

O strange chance! The Bourguignons army was now reduced to extreme necessity of victuals and money, so as all the Noblemen dreamed only of a retreat. And yet (an admirable thing) the price of victuals was not risen in the City. So many stormes caused Lewis to demand a second interview, before that the yielding vp of Rouan should be known to the Earle. He grants the Duchy of Normandy to his brother: restores the towne vpon Somme to the Earle: to the Britton his County of Montfort, with promise to defray his charges: he giues the office of Constable to the Earle of S. Pol: he promifeth vnto John Duke of Calabria, men and money to recouer his Realme of Naples: to pay what had bene promised for the marriage of his sister to the Duke of Bourbon, with the execution of other clauses contained in the contract: to restore vnto all others their goods, offices, and dignities, which they had enioyed vnder his father Charles. He grants vnto the Princes, that not any one should bee bound to come in person at his summons, but should discharge their homage and duties, in sending such forces as they were bound to furnish at need. To conclude, all the publicke good is turned to priuate interest. The Earle of Charolois accepts these conditions so willingly, as discoursing with the King, the vehement desire he had to see the execution of this treaty, carries him into the trench of the bulwarke of Francke-archers, by the which they entered the City. They Bourguignons hauing lost him, cry out that he was slayed. The chiefe assembl together, they tremble, they condemne their Earle of rashnesse, alleaging the inconuenience happened to the grandfather at Montereau, in the presence of Charles the leueneth, and they begin to talke of their safety: but as they walked into the field on horsebacke, behold they discouer about

1466

A about fifty of the Kings hoile; conducting the Earle to his father. So euery one returned his spirits, and joyfully commend the Kings delay.

Two dayes after the treaty of peace was ready, and Lewis on either side, at Bois de Vincennes, Charles the Kings brother, did homage for the Duchie of Normandy, the Earle of Charolois for the Townes and land in Picardy, and likewise the rest that had homage to do. The Earle of Saint Paul took his oath for the office of Constable: the Earle of Montfort receiued their goods and houses. So the Duke of Normandy was conducted to Rouan by the Duke of Britany. The Earle of Charoloisooke his way to Amiens, and receiued homage of the inhabitants of all other places that were restored vnto him by the peace. Then he entered into the Country of Liege, which had rebelled vnto his father, against his father, vpon the first brute of the overthrow of the Earle his founder at Montsieghy, without attending the faith. Hee pacified the Country, and returned into Brabant. This was called the peace of Constans, which was but continued the 21 of October 1465; the which the Bourguignon had not so easily yielded vnto; hee had receiued (besides that refreshing of men and money, which Philip sent him by the Lord of Sancerre) and was an act of great import, for Lewis to disperse these Princes so cunningly: hee did well foresee that the Charolois beinge from them, and busied in his owne Countries, would hardly recurre in the winter season. Moreover, he knew well the meanes (as he was an excellen plotter of factions) how to diuide the Dukes of Normandy and Britany. And in truth they were scarce arised in their new Duellies; but all the Noblemen, Gentlemen and Captaines, expected some preferment from Charles Duke of Normandy, lately aduanced by this peace; and moreover the Duke of Britany, who had bene formerly engaged in the change, was little amended by the treaty: they all by a generall discontent (tho a notable subject of distrust of their new Duke) so as there is spread abroad all rumors, that the Brittons would carry Charles into Britany. Vpon this brute, the Dukes seruants and the inhabitants troope together, they runne by heapes to Saint Katharine Mount, where Charles remained yet, attending the preparatives of his entry) they ledde him into the City, without any other assistance, but the Clergie in their ornaments. The Duke of Britany, fearing the mutiny of this people, retires vnto his Country: and in his way hee takes some Townes in Normandy, wherein hee leaueh diuers garisons.

Lewis sees vpon his brother.

Lewis imbraceh this occasion; and vpon this diuision marcheth against his brother, meets with the Duke of Britany at Argenton, to winne him from the alliance of the Duke of Normandy: hee takes from him (by the Duke of Bourbon newly reconciled) Eureux, Vernon, Louiers, Pont de Larche, and other places: and by Charles of Melun, Gyfors, Gournay, Chailly: and consequently all bafe Normandy. Caen held with some other places, being in the hands of Lefant, a trusty seruant to both the Dukes. Charles abandoned by all men, and set vpon by so mighty an army, resolues to retire into Flanders, and seekes to the Earle of Charolois, whom this diuision did much grieue: for he desired about all things to see a Duke in Normandy, the which should greatly weaken the King. But the time was vnseasonable, being busied against the Liegeois. Yet for a prooue of his good happe, he labours to put some troopes (gathered vp in Picardy) into Depee: but Lewis presents him, and compounds with the Gouernor. Hereupon the two Dukes reconcile themselves, considering (but too late) that as their diffention had already ruined the one, so might it easily overthrow the other: according to the saying, That by concord small things increase, but by discord great are overthrowne. In truth it is a hard matter for great men to entertaine friendship long: and for the State it is necessary to haue one ouerigne head ouer all, who by his judgment, wiledome, and credit, may retaine the subjects in obedience.

The Dukes of Normandy and Britany are reconciled.

So the Duke of Normandy begs helpe of the Britton, being poore, overcome, and abandoned now in his aduersity, of all them that during his prosperity had grounded the anchor of their hope vpon his fortunes, and had newly made their peace with the King. The Duke of Britany receiues him, and in his fauour sends an Ambassage to the King: giuing him to vnderstand, that for the honour of his blood, and respect of his Matelie, hee had receiued him; seeing him a fugitiue, and vnprouided of necessary meanes to entertaine his estate. Thereupon Lewis makes answer, that he could not dismember

1467

Normandy, the goodliest flower of his Diadem from the Cedre of France, whose demelines are inalienable. The Duke replies, Adds to give a portion to his brother grounded in part of the Succession, rights was an alienation of long time executed in France, seeing that many held it even then by the same title: But they commonly say, it is in vain to preach to them that care not to do well. Lewis could not yield to the protestment of his brother: and the Britons Ambassadors trusted with no other and were but a bare confession, that it was reasonable to give him some portion, and that he would consider of the quantity thereof.

Roman returns to Lewis

Thus Rouan (wanting their Duke some few daies) yielded the King obedience in small adoe: who suddenly saileth away to be executed of his brother Charles to his father. The Lord of Esternay, taken by Charles of Melun great Master, in a Frigate, accompanied with an Augustine, was beheaded: yet some suits that he had were drowned in the river of Vre. The King offended with the emertuousness which the Duke of Britany had given to his brother, and advertised that John Duke of Calabria was dead beyond the mountains, he calls home the troops he had given him, to have the greater force to strike the Briton, for receiving of his enemies, and practising intelligence within his Realme. And even then the D. of Alençon promised to give the Duke passage through his Country, if he would enter into Normandy. Morgouer, so many Ambassadors from the King to the Duke and Earle of Charolois, and from them to the King, from the Earle to the dukes, & from them to the Earle, were but to discover their humors, and under colour of faith, to withdraw mens affections. So the Duke of Britany, not able to persuade the King to reason, enters into Normandy, takes Caen, Bayeux, and Auranches: he burns Meruille and some other places, whilist that the King assembles the forces of Anjou, Bourgois, and Normandy: and the Earle of Charolois resolves to recover his confederates, having suppressed them of Liege and Gant. And for that our Lewis had been so confusedly incombred amidst the complications of those people, let us leave France, to learn better the cause, the proceeding, and the end of these warres.

The Liegeois, hereditary and capital enemies to the house of Bourgongne, (seeing that tend to open warre betwixt the King and the Earle of Charolois) seeketh the kings friendship & alliance, and they obtaine it, upon condition to enter presently into the Countie of Hainault and Namur, belonging to the Duke of Bourgongne, with alliaies of hostility: the King promising vnder his seale, to succour them with two hundred men at armes (every one having three horses at the least) and not to treat any accord or peace with the Duke without their consent, and to comprehend them in it: putt vp with this favour and imagined succours, they send a Herald to Philip being at Brussels, with letters, desiring the Earle his sonne with fire and sword, and thereon demand an answer.

The Duke having read these letters, delivered them vnto the Herald, willing him to carry them to his sonne. So he returns to Liege, but hee is presently sent backe with other letters, desiring the Duke himselfe and all his allies. And suddenly they breake into the dukes Country, they spoile, ravish, burne, and omit no outrage that one enemy may doe to another. Philip assembles the forces of his Country, and sends for the dukes of Cleues and Gueldres, the Earles of Nassau and Horne, the Marquis of Rothelin, and others that were neighbours to Liege. But this multitude finding the King to faile them of his promise, and that they were not able to resist so great forces, they shut themselves vp within the wallles of Liege. Then at the first and false newes of the overthrow of the Earle of Charolois at Montleheric, (as the passions of a disordered mind doe easily make man to beleue what hee witheth) they take a subiect of new folly. Those of Dinan especially (a people of Liege, proud and arrogant to haue at sundry times endured severall sieges of Emperours and Kings, yet neuer conquered) make a picture very like to the Earle of Charolois, and attired with his Armes, they carry it in troope neere to the vines in the Country of Namur: they set vp a high gybbet in the sight of the Citizens, and there they hang this Image, crying with open throat, *See there the sonne of your Duke, that false traitor the Earle of Charolois, whom the French King hath, or will cause to be hanged, as you see here. Hee termed himselfe the sonne of your Duke, hee lyed: hee was a villaine bastard, changed in his infancy with the sonne of the Lord of Hainberghe, an Bishop. Did he thinke to raine the Noble house of France? From these and such like insolent speeches, they come to deeds, armed against the subiects of Philip, with fire and sword,*

A horrible outrage committed by them of Dinan.

A the instruments of their horrible outrages. This was not all, the father must receive the like disgrace by his picture, the which they carried to the dung-hill before Bouvines, and setting it upon a peece of wood, See here (say they) the seat of the great Toade your Duke. Those of Bouvines exhort these mad men to performe the duties of good subiects to the Duke, before that matters grew more bitter. But the bearer of this good and whollome counsell, returned without his head: they fend an innocent child, with the like Letters, hoping his tender age would moue some respect, and mollifie these cruel and unnaturall minds, but in despite of the Duke and of their neighbours, they killed him most barbarously, and tare him in peeces.

Of insolent people: which hath not yet learned, That there is no vice wheron God doth more often show his iudgements, then vpon pride. The great wealth thou hast gathered during thy long felicity, hath it so furiously transported thee beyond the boundis of obedience, and to what end is thy great wealth, but to draw thee headlong to thy ruine? Philip takes his revenge by the defeat of foure thousand Liegeois, fortified within Montena, a village five leagues from Liege. The Earle of Nassau did this exploit, but the Duke would be present in person with the Earle his sonne, at the taking and vnted defolation of Dinand. He besieged it with about twenty thousand horse, beside foot, which were in great numbers, takes it, and destroys it, and drages eight hundred prisoners chained together, to be drowned in the Meuze before Bouvines: an expiation for the tyrannicall indignities they had endured by the Dinandois. Those of Liege did for this time escape the like fortune, but it was deferred, and behold another cause of indignation, which they procure to themselves. Lewis of Bourbon Bishop of Liege by resignation, and admitted to the dignity by the intercession and fauour of Duke Philip to the Pope, begins to preferre the most confident and trusty seruants of the said Philip, to all offices and dignities within the towne. The people are grieved thereat, they mutiny and expell the Bishop. This revolt against their spiritual and temporall Lord, procures the Popes Excommunication against them. Philip after the destruction of Dinand turns head against them: but terrified with so sharpe a punishment, they fly to the Earle of Charolois, who is a meane for their peace and pardon, paying fixe hundred thousand Florins of the Rhin in fix yeares, and three hundred hostages for a securitie of their deeds and promises, specified by the Bishop. Thus this people restored to fauour with their Prince, and reconciled to their Bishop, were absolved of the Excommunication by Onuphrius a Romane Citizen and Bishop of Troyes.

Whilist that Philip subdues the Liegeois, Lewis employes his whole study to ruine the house of Britany, and to confirme a truce with the English, who threatned France with a new descent during our diuisions, and hee practiseth the Bourgignon by all meanes. And to presse him to renounce his brother Charles and the Duke of Britany, hee takes the Liegeois into his protection against their Duke, in case hee shall hereafter wrong them: to the which he doth signifie vnto him by the Constable of Saint Paul, and the Cardinall E. Balne, offering notwithstanding to renounce their alliance, if hee will likewise abandon his brother and the Briton. This brauado proceeds to effects. He sends them 400 Lances of his Odnances, vnder the conduct of the Earle of Dampmartin, the Lords of Salezan, Conyhem and Vignolles, with 6000 Archers. The Earle of Saint Paul, (but without the Kings authority) led them some troopes speedily leaued vpon the frontiers of Picardy. The first act of his Tragedy, which in the end shall make him leaue his head at the Greue in Paris. But it was now time for Philip to leaue the troubles of this world, to enjoy an assured and eueralasting rest in heauen.

This inconstant and mutinous people, supposing by the decease of their Lord, to be at libertie, they breake out, go to field, recover all the townes, chase away the garisons placed by the deceased Duke: spoile and sacke the places they take by force, without any care of their ingaged hostages, who were all ready to bee sacrificed by Charles the new Duke of Bourgongne, to requite the made insolencies of their Countrymen, yet hee referres the reuenge for a more famous memory. Hee parts from Louvain in armes, and well accompanied, and goes to besiege Sainttron. The Liegeois (to raise the siege) issue forth with thirty thousand men, some five hundred horse, and great store of Artillery. The Duke turns head againe, chargeth them, and ouercomes them, hee kills about nine thousand: the approaching night faues the rest. Presently after this charge, charge, the Duke (puff vp with this good successe) speaks bigge, hee writes vnto the Constable like a Rodomont, answerable to the speeches hee had with him at Louvain: That hee beseeched the King for his sake to attempt nothing upon the State of Britany: notwithstanding him of the memorable battell which hee had wonne. After the which Saint Lewis yields vpon conditions, and the tenth man is chosen out at the Dukes pleasure, and then beheaded. Tongres was no better intreated: and these miserable wretches thus tithed, were for the most part of those hostages, which hee had freely taken home, vpon condition to employ themselves to pacifie the seditious humours of their fellow Citizens.

In the end, as he turned all his forces against Liege, premeditating with himselfe of lamentable and bloody reuenge, beheld three hundred of their best Citizens come forth in their shirts, bare-headed and bare-legged, bringing the Keyes to the Duke. Hee took the City by a great breach of twenty fadome, beaten downe in the wall, disarmed the inhabitants, take from them their artillery which remained, razeth all the Towers & town-walles, and chaggett them with heavier imposts then euer his father had done. A waile of heauen which quencht the fire of sedition, which began to flame at Gand, a rising people, and second to the Liegeois in inconstancy: of whom it is commonly said: that they loue the sonne of their Prince, but not the Prince himselfe. So the Gantois bring vnto him on foot as farre as Bruxelles, the seuentie and two banners of the occupations, which hee had granted them at his entry, with all the priuiledges and letters they had tumultuously wrested from him.

Charles sent the said Banners to Bologne la grasse, to accompany those which his Father had in like sort taken from them: hee disannulled their priuiledge of the law, whereby the people had right of fixe and twenty Sherifes of the towne, to choose euery yeate two or twenty, & the Prince but foure: hee condemned them in thirty thousand Florins to himselfe, and fixe thousand to his officers and followers: All other townes compounded for money, and then he made his entry armed into Gand. Thither came Ambassadors vnto him from Lewis, labouring to draw him to consent to the warres which hee pretended to make in Britany: the which notable to obaine, the Winter was spent in sending one another: and Summer being come, Lewis enters the said Duchy, with an army of seven men: and at his first arrival hee takes Chantefle, and Ancenis, and after some other military exploits, hee forceth both his brother and the Duke of Britany, to accept such conditions as he would prescribe vnto them: That they should renounce all alliance, and especially that of the Duke of Bourgongne: That his brother Charles, lately Duke of Normandy, should haue twelve thousand Franckes a yeare rent, for his portion, issuing out of some lands which should carry the title of a Dukedome or County, and three thousand Franckes for his pension; but there is much difference betwene promise and performance.

In the meane time Charles of Bourgongne, at the instance of his allies, was already advanced to Peronne. Then had Pope Pius the second sent a Legate into France, for the nunciation of the Pragmaticke Sanction, made by Lewis at his comming to the Crowne. The Parents are read in the Chastelet without contradiction. Balus comes to the Palace the first of October, to haue them in like sort published: But Master Iohn of St. Romain, the Kings Proctor generally, opposeth himselfe directly against the execution thereof, withstanding the iniurious threats of the said Cardinall: Replying (saith the Originall) that hee had rather lose both his office, and all his wealth, then to doe a thing against his conscience, to the hurt of the Realme, and preiudice of the Kings dignity. In the end, the Rector of the Vniuersity, (for then they maintayned by faithfull obedience their ancient authority) and the Deputies thereof, goe to the Legate: they appeale from him, and the effect of the said Letters to the holy Councell, the like they doe in all other places where need required. They protest the like at the Chastelet, and depart not before their opposition be registered.

Hereupon the King sends the said Legate and Cardinall with Iohn Ladrische Treasurer of France, to the Duke of Bourgongne, to signifie vnto him the accord made with his brother and the Duke of Britany, and to treat of a peace with the said Duke of Bourgongne, but alwayes tending to diuide him from them: and (for a baite) hee promiseth to give him sixscore thousand Crownes of gold, the one halfe to be paid before hee should Lewis soliciting the Liegeois to a new rebellion.

A gish, for the charges of his leaue: and hoping to win him wholly to his will, he concludes an interview at Peronne, by the means of the said Galas, and to this effect: the Duke writes him a letter with his owne hand, as a warrant to goe and come. And in the meane time, that Charles (bush at home) should no wayes hinder Lewis in the Warre hee pretended to make in Britany, (for he still gaped after the conquest of that Province) hee had sent againe vnderhand, to sollicite the Liegeois to a new sedition, wherunto they were so prompt for their owne good: they arme, and by stealth surprize Tongres; and carry thence the Bishop with many Chanoines (whom they hated to the death) prisoners to Liege. Yet some-what respecting the Legates presence, they were content to pull out the hearts of three or fixe of them, in sight of the Bishop, when an outrageous violence, shewing one of them into many peeces, the which with a brutish dirision they cast one at another like vnto Tennis Balls.

These two Princes liued in continuall distrust, and feared one another: for the safety of their persons at this meeting, they fortifie themselves with great forces. Lewis to free the Duke of all ielousie, comes ill accompanied, but he is followed by Iohn Duke of Bourbon his brother in law, the Cardinall brother to the said Duke, the Constable of Saint Paul, the Cardinall Balus, (a man which dealt much in matters of warre and state) by Antony of Chastel, newly receiued in fauour, and many other Commanders of troopes. Charles had sent for the army of Bourgongne, where there were many Noblemen in former times ill intreated by the King: as Anthony Chastellaineuf, Lord of Lau, who had escaped from Vison, a strong place in Auvergne, where Lewis kept him prisoner, vnder the guard of Charles of Melun, who (sparing his own head) imbrued three scaffolds with blood, with that of Charles of Loches of Remones, son to the wife of Charles at Tours; and of the Kings Proctor of Vison in Meux: Ponce de Rinsore, of Vrfe (afterwards Master of the Kings Horse) three Princes of the house of Savoy, that is to say, the Lord of Bresse, the Bishop of Geneva, and the Earle of Rhosmond, brethren followed by many Gentlemen, Savoyards and Bourgongnons. The King seeing all these within the Towne, and the Army lodged thereabout, finds that he wrought pollicely: but cunning is preuented by cunning. So the prouidence of God blinds man in his owne malice, and shadowes his eyes, to discern him in his fraudulent designs. And to increase his folly, he requires the Castle of Charles to lodge in: for that the greatest part of those that were last come, were ill affected vnto him. What then? an enemy that had a desire to crosse the policies of his aduersarie, would he refuse him this Cage, that sought to intrange himselfe in his owne snare? yet he perswades him to feare nothing. Let Princes learne not to commit themselves rashly to such assemblies, the very baits of deceits, collusions and peruries.

The newes of this second mutiny at Liege, being reported vnto the Duke, he suddenly catcheth the gates both of the towne and Castle to be shut, but vnder a cold pretext. That one had lost a male full of Jewels and money. Lewis seeing himselfe coopt vp, and many marches at the gate, being lodged moreouer right against a great Tower, whereas the Earle of Vermandois had once caused Charles the Simple his Predecessor to die, blame him not if hee feared. So (as an ancient said) Malice drinks the greatest part of her owne poison. They could not treat of a more important matter, then the life of a King of France and of his Estate. Charles doth first impart this busines to some of his Chamberlains & Groomes of his Chamber (amongst others to the Lord of Argenton, to whom the King since gaue this commendation, to haue bene a great helpe in this pacification of Peronne) who then tempered this spleen all they could. He holds a Councell the most part of the second day, and almost the whole night, hauing all the desire in the world to doe the King a shrewd turne, who in the meane time practise with all vehemency such as hee thought might serue him: he vnfurnished his most trusty seruants, being farre from his Treasure, commands to make distribution of fifteene thousand Crownes: (but the Commissary retayned a part as the King was since aduertised) he giues to some, and promiseth to others. In the end their resolution in counsell was, that Lewis his excuse should be admitted, who did sweare that hauing sent his Ambassadors to Liege, when as the Duke did some against France, the great affection hee had to a final and vniuersall peace had so transported him, as hee had forgotten to conteraund them. Thus promise being made to Charles of Bourgongne, to accompany him at his request in the voyage of Liege, and to give unto Charles his brother the Earledomes of Brie and Champaigne, (which the Bourguignons did, that as need they might haue more meanes to succore one another) the treaty of Arras and peace of Charenton were reconfirmed & sworn vpon the crosse, which Charles made was wont to say, called the crosse of victory.

Truly experience hath alwayes testified, that Princes do more wisely pacifie their quarrels by graue and trusty seruants, then by enterviews, from the which such as haue had any matter to determine together, doe seldom part without mutuall dislikes and enuies, the seeds of diuisions and warre, the which may be long smothered, but at length it breaks forth. From henceforth you shall see vpon this stage a wretched people, pained yet with the Bastardies lately received: but not yet vanquished, and so much the more lamentable, for that their owne calamities cannot make them wise, who having obliuiously rebelled against their naturall Prince, and indiscreetly embraced our Kings quarrell, headlong to their totall ruine. Lewis was engaged by promise, and summoned to perform it. Besides the Scots of his guard, he sends for three hundred men at armes, having with him John Duke of Bourbon, Charles Cardinall of Bourbon and Archbishop of Lion, and the Earle of Beauieu brothers to the Bishop of Liege. A City then of the signesse of Joan, exceeding well peopled, seated in a mountainie Countrey, fertill, watered with the river of Meuze, which runs through it; but by the last yeares drouth almost all dismanned, and greatly weakened of men, so as the Marshall of Bourgonne and the Lord of Humbercourt leading the forward and gaping after spoile, thought to haue entered at their first approach, before the King or Duke were arrived. John of Viletre chiefe Tribune of the Liegeois, and other Captaines seeing them lodge confusedly in their suburbs, they issue resolutely by the old breaches, and kill about eight hundred men; amongst the which was a hundred men at armes: they hurt many, and amongst them the Prince of Orange. All the people were ready to make a generall fallie, but some Canonadoes shot into the street kill very many, and keepe in the rest. The Tribune was hurt, and dyed within a few dayes after, with some other Captaines; whilst the two Commanders arrived, and took their lodgings, Lewis in a great farm, a quarter of a league from Liege, Charles in the best of the suburbs, where the King went to lodge the next day night against the Bourguignons lodging. This approach breeds a great distrust, for Charles doubted that he would cast himselfe into the towne, or practise something against him, or at the least cast himselfe before the taking of the towne. To be the better satisfied, the Duke doth lead three hundred of his men at armes in a barne betwixt his lodging and the Kings, the better to obserue the Kings actions.

In the meane time, they make a good shew, and keepe good guard vntill the nine and twentieth of October, the eight day of the siege, when as Charles and all his men disarmed themselves to be the more ready the next day for the assault. During these eight dayes, the besieged gaue liberty to their Bishop to goe to the Duke and to offer him their towns and goods, desiring nothing but their liues. But he had refused a sharpe reuenge, and raynes the Bishop, not accepting of any offer. The Apostolike Legat had no money credit with Charles, neither was he so happy as he expected. The Liegeois abandoned by the French despairing of all foraine succors, and of all grace with their Prince, beheld a troope of fixe hundred choile men of the Countrey of Franchemont issue forth, haile for their guides the Masters of those two lodgings where the Generals did lie. The party was well made, and the enterprize great, but ill managed; yet did they hardly faile in it. The guides should lead them secretly through the hollow rocks neere vnto these Princes lodgings, to surprisethem, kill them, or at the least to cary them away before their guards were in armes.

Moreover all the people should issue forth by the gate and breaches right against the great street of the suburbs, and with their cries and fighting discomfort the whole army, or at the least sell their liues deare, in dying gloriously. They issue forth, kill the sentinels, and staid at a pavilion in the which the Duke of Alencon, and the Lord of Craon were lodged, where they slew some seruants with their halberds and partizans; they charge euen vnto the grange, whereas the three hundred men at armes were in their first place, the whole multitude runs thither, and troubles both Nations; some crying, God save the King, others God save the Duke of Bourgonne, and some also cry God save the King, and fall to slow diuision betwixt the French and Bourguignons.

They

The Liegeois disparaging hazard all.

They awake, they arme and defend the entry. In the meane time succors come from all parts to the Duke, being charged by a Squadron led by the master of the lodging. Hee is daunt first, and then all his company. The King is no lesse amazed, his host compaseth his house with another band. The Scots are about him, they first kill the host, and then his followers: and so the multitude recouers the towne in disorder. The two Princes talke together, and thanke God for their deliuey, and with a iust cause: for if these desperate men had not beene liued at the Pavillion nor at the grange, without doubt they had had these two Princes at their discretion: but God would reuerse ours, for the restoring of his Church and the ease of his seruantes with the Bourguignons losse: and the Bourguignons for a moste tragick end. Our Lewis grew likewise pale with distrust, foreseeing that if he should take the towne by assault, the burthen might light on him, and that he was engaged to be stayed and taken, being the weaker in the army. There was no hope of staying, then was well guarded: and his honour likewise engaged. Thus he stood vpon that rocke, yet resolved in them, and alwayes an absolute dissembler. A miserable estate of these two Princes, who of late had solemly sworn a peace, and yet one could not assure himselfe of another faith. This desperate fallie had amazed the dukes men, who (vnto the King advice) would willingly haue delayed the assault for some dayes, but Charles, constant in his designe, lets Lewis understand, that if he pleased hee might retire to Namur vntill the towne were taken; as for himselfe hee would not part without seeing the issue the next morning: but Lewis was engaged to honour, who would neede giue the least suspicion of cowardise, he therefore answers, that hee would take his part of the sport. The day being come, every one repairs to his Colours, the signe is giuen by a field peece and two shot of a serpentine to the end the vanguard lodged on the other side should charge at the same instant. The trumpets and drummes found, the companies approach, and all march resolutely. But when they thought to ioyne, they found insupportance. These chiefe Commanders were dead, the most apparent being flung out of the towne, some one way, some another, the common people were gone to dinner, saying that to morrow would be a day of rest. So the whole army, consisting of about twenty thousand men, enter at both ends, and find themselves engaged: they kill at the first encounter two hundred men, women, children, and religious indifferently: they ransacke houses, and make spoile the City, and holy places: the Duke takes the great Church of Saint Lambert with great difficulty, the people flye ouer the Meuze, and fo themselves in the forest of Ardennes, and other places thereabouts, where to increase their misery, some gentlemen (who till then had held their party) strip them, kill a number, and take the best prisoners, and by this treachery and pious stratagem make their peace with the Duke. Many dyed of hunger, cold and sleepe, the History makes mention of a gentleman that had the palsey in one legge, and a page that had syne fingers, of which and faint off. The wine was frozen in the pipes, and for three dayes was cut out with hatchets. And for the last act of this tragedy, the Duke doth place four thousand men about the quarters of the City, to beat downe the bridge vpon the Meuze, to demolish the houses of the Clergy about the great Church, & to preserve the other Churches from ruine, whilst that others set fire on the towne, quench the walls and fill up the streets. Wrath and victory doe neerer forget any kinde of reuenge. And if we shall beleeue some writers, there perished about fifty thousand soules in this warre, most cruelly beyond all bounds of humanity. Leuans O ye nations, consider your liues in the obedience of your Soueraignes, and not so invade your selves, as by in Princes quarrels, who retire themselves easily out of the mire where they leaue you engaged, and charge is a president vnto you, wherein you may obserue the iust judgement of God vpon a cruell robbish people, enemy to all sovereignty, both spiritual and temporal, of long time subjected to dayly rebellions, vntill their generall ruine. As yet haue brought our Lewis to Liege, so let vs returne him into France. Charles, exceeding proud with the happy successe of his designe, suffers himselfe to be sought vnto by mediators from the King for his departure: and afterwards see himselfe moued him, as desiring to goe and cause their accord to be proclaimed and registered in his Court of Parliament at Paris (which else were of no moment) and the next yeere to meet in Bourgonne, and to feast there another seasonally for a monthes space. Charles (having drawne a promise from the King, to confirme all he had sworn at Peronne, yeelds, but not without guiding and having accompanied him halfe a league, he causeth him to be conducted to the frontiers, by the Lord of Cordes, & Murs great Bayliffe of Hainault. A pitious spectacle to see a Soueraigne reduced to that extremity, as to humble himselfe before this wretched man; yet we must haue patience for seuen yeares, and then shall we see a strange alteration of fortune: and yet seuen yeares after, another Catastrophe no lesse tragical in this kind of Bourgongne: and the vniuing of the said Duchy to the Crowne of France.

After the Kings departure, Charles enters the Countrey of Franche-mont he kills, burns and makes all desolate: then (glutted with reuenge) hee returns into Brie, Lewis taking his leaue of the Duke, demanded of him capitoully in what his brother was in Britany, would not accept the portion he had given him; how he would bring him to gouerne himselfe: and the Duke answered, that if he were so mean, it should please him whatsoeuer they did. This speech was cunningly construed by the King; for hee inrouled the said vniung in the Court of Parliament, and proclaimed it throughout the streetes of Paris: he offers Charles, Guichart, and Chappaigne his brothers, a labour hood with the Bourgignons being suspected into him; Charles doth not like to displease the Duke of Bourgongne, who by Ambassadors and admonitions extorts him to change: for if happily the King should annoy him, he might daily haue new wrongs of Bourgongne.

Charles was in all things gouerned by another, namely by Odet de Noie Lord of Ligon and afterward Earle of Comingess. Lewis subornes him, and by his means winnes of him to accept of Guienne, as more plentiful and rich, with men all affluences to such as hee thren and good friends. For confirmation whereof they were at Chartres and feast together, then they depart, Lewis into Touraine, and Charles into Guienne. The Duke of Bourgongne grieved with this exchange, employs the Cardinal Baluz, a turbulent and pious member in a State, a dissoluer, and taking pleasure (as they say) continually in his finger betwixt the barke and the tree. A wicked man: The most which Lewis could in this man, was the means to procure him a Cardinals hat, and towarden the King he sent an ambassage to Paul the second, and also one of his most noble seruants, to persuade the Pope to desist from the ventral he had made thereof, being advertised of such things that did dislike him; at which vigorous perswasion Cardinals hat was granted him: yet behold he writes to the Duke of Guienne in the name of the Bourgignons, in this charge, that hee deceiue, dividing him by this means from his friends, and in the rate: and by other intelligences hee subuerteth the Bourgignons. That the year cometh betwixt the two brethren was a bait to surprise him: the which the King desired, and thus his brother had visited the new Duchy, and set an order in his house. Let him therefore arme and begin fight. These letters are surprised, with other instructions, so as the Cardinal is rested and carried prisoner to Montesson; where he shall continue eleuen yeares. Lewis having thus platted this peace with the Bourgignons, comprehended the Briton therein, and then the Duke of Guienne to his brother Charles for his portion, he had no more to fight enemies against whom he should employ his forces: yet would hee I dismisst his troopes, for there came a new task in hand: To keepe them in practice, he sends part of them vnder the command of the Admirall barbaz of Bourbon (for Montesson was dead) and the Earle of Dammartin, into Armaigne: He had bene once the War of the common wealth, and this enterprise did alwayes sicke in Lewis his stomach. At the first without any effusion of blood, they make him peaceable possessor of the Countrey, whereof they must his brother, and so the yeare ended.

But let vs see the first fruits of the following yeare. To be reuenged of Charles of Bourgongne, hee must haue some apparant colour. Lewis doth vnder-hand practise the townes lying vpon the riuier of Somme: animates the Nobilitie of the Countrey to complain in the Parliament at Paris of the difficulty they had to receiue iustice, and a charge on to requite the Kings assistance and fauour. Moreover, they charged the Bourgignons, that hee extended his limits farther then he ought by the treaty, and vnrped the Kings rights and prerogatives, forcing some Lords, whose lands did hold directly of the King, to doe him homage and seruice against all men. Vpon colour of these complaints, Lewis sends the Estates at Tours, in the moneth of March and April, (the which was all hee euer held: ) but he calls none but his most confident seruantes; who would not commit him in any thing. For a conclusion of the assembly, the Duke is summoned to appeare

At the Parliament of Paris. Hee retains the Officer many dayes at Gant, and in the end sends him backe.

As all things were prepared to ruine the Duke of Bourgongne; behold there falls out another matter of some moment in this action. The Earle of Warwicke (hauing about all others supported the house of Yorke against that of Lancaster (had besides his patrimony enriched himselfe about foure score thousand Crowns a yeare reuennue in rewards and Offices by Edward King of England, Competitor to Henry the 6, whom he kept prisoner at London, which Henry had to long ruled out of France. This his great credit draws seaulouse after it; too ordinary in soueraigne Princes, especially to them whom they haue raised vp: whereby the Earle falls into some disgrace with Edward. The Duke of Bourgongne, to whom the Earles great authority, and the secret intelligences he had with our Lewis was wonderfull odious and suspect (for the Duke had married the sister of Edward, to fortifie himselfe against Lewis, not for any affection he bare to the house of Yorke, being by his mother issued one of the house of Lancaster) feeds this hatred of Edward against Warwicke, who finding himselfe forced to yeeld to the stronger, resolueth to retire into France: hee leads with him Margaret the wife of Henry, daughter to René King of Sicilia: the Prince of Wales sonne of the said Henry and Margaret: the Duke of Clarence son in law to Warwicke, and brother to Edward, the Earle of Oxford, with their wiues and children, and many followers. In his passage he takes many ships from the Bourgignons subiects, and fells the booty in Normandy. And for a requirall Charles causeth all the French Merchants to bee taken that were come to the faire at Antwerp: he complains to the Court of Parliament at Paris, of the reception the King had made of the Earle of Warwicke, threatening to fetch him whereloeuer. But the arrogancy of his words was but the leuaine of his spleene.

Lewis gives such entertainment to the Earle of Warwicke, as hee might hope for: hee armes all the ships he can find in his fauour: by means whereof hee returns happily into England, and gathers together an infinite number of men, which ioine with him from all parts: he marcheth against Edward, & forceth him to flic to his brother in law into Holland, being accompanied onely with seuen or eight hundred men for his guard, without money, and without apparell, other then for Warre. Hee draws Henry out of prison, where he himselfe had formerly lodged him, and instals him againe in his royall State.

Edward (notwithstanding the presence of the Dukes of Gloucester and Somerset, sent by Henry) obtains of the Duke of Bourgongne (but vnderhand and secretly, for that hee would by no means incense Henry, whom all England now obeyed) succours of men, ships and money: hee returns into the Realme, is receiued into London: hee meets with the Earle of Warwicke, fights with him, and kills him, with his brother the Marquis Montagu, and cuts all his army in pieces. The Duke of Clarence (before the battell) goes to his brother Edward, and with his owne hand slue (as some write) Henry, whom Edward had taken in London and led to this battell: this was in the yeare 1471 on Easter day. This happy victory is seconded by another no lesse famous. The Prince of Wales sonne to Henry, follows after, with whom the Dukes of Gloucester and Somerset had already ioined, leading forty thousand men of his faction. Edward putt vp with the prosperous success of his first victory, marcheth towards him, fights with him, kills him, takes the Earle of Somerset prisoner, and the next day cuts off his head.

To conclude, Warwicke had conquered the Realme of England in eleuen dayes: and Edward recovered it in twenty, and remained in peaceable possession vnto his death. If the Earle had patiently attended the great forces which Prince Edward brought vnto him, who will not thinke but he had remained a conqueror: But he feared Somerset, whose father and brother he had put to death, and hee must feele the effects of the diuine Oracle: He that hath shed mans blood, his blood shall be shed, for God hath made man after his owne image; and: A Wither that hath taken the sword, shall perish by the sword. In the meane time whilst these stirres are in England, Charles the eight of that name, afterwards King of France, was borne vnto Lewis at the Castle of Amboise, a happy propofan old decayed father. This birth causeth the Princes hereafter to be lesse respected, and the King more feared and honoured, who hauing now an heyre to whom hee might leane the Crowne, bandies all his wits, to weaken his enemies, as well for his owne priuate regard, as to leaue the Realme whole and peaceable to his successor. Charles of Guienne liued for few, in good good amity with the King. Francis of Britany (although he had preferred the order of the Golden fleece before that of Saint Michel, the which Lewis had offered vnto him) being loath to lose assured friends, to accept the friendship of a Prince in whom he could repose no confidence, yet he contained himselfe. Charles of Bourgogne wore the garter openly, and molested the Kings subiects and friends. Moreover, Lewis had iust cause to be grieved for the brauadoe done him at Peronne. The Nobility thrust him on, namely the Constable of Saint Paul, fore-seeing that the continuance of peace would be a great hinderance to his great Offices and pensions. He had a pay without cheeke for four hundred lances, of forty thousand frankes yearly, besides the fee for his Office, and allowance for many places where he commanded. Men fish most freely in a troubled water. He offers the King to take Saint Quintin by meanes of the credit he had in the Conmy: most of his liuing lying thereabouts, and vaunts to haue great intelligence in the Low Countries.

The Duke of Guienne offers both his person and his meanes, with five hundred men at armes for this war, but it was the least of his desires, for he was corrupted with the insinuations of that age, in the which all great men sought to maineine themselves with the meane one of another. The Duke of Bourgogne takes the alarme, put the greatest forces he can to field, entertained with halte their pay. Lewis suffers him to man on four or five moneths, entertayning him with sundry Ambassages, to cease him from all feare, so as troubled with that great charge, in a season when as money was scant, he dissolues this army, and leaving his frontier towne unfurnished, retires into Holland. In the meane time Arthur of Longueval takes Saint Quintin, the Constable enters it with two hundred lances, and takes an oath for the King. They practise Amiens: the Kings army comes before it, one part holds for the King, another for the Duke, who might haue assured it, if he had had sufficient forces ready to enter, but four or five hundred horse (with the which he came posting) would not suffer him to hazard his person.

The Kings friends discovering this brag, double their courages and let in the Kings army. Abbeville meanes to follow, when as the Lord of Coudes enters for the Duke and assures the place. The Duke vnto provided of men, and doubting the intelligences which the Constable bragged of, retires with teares and speed to Arras, to haften a leaue both of men and money. Thither notwithstanding the promise which Charles of Guienne had made to the King) comes a secret messenger vnto him, with this aduice written and signed by the said Charles: Labour to content your subiects, and then take no care, for you shall find friends; but these were but iests. This letter makes the Duke breathe: he sends to the Constable, to let him vnderstand, that this warre was without desie or summons, intreating him, not to deale against him according to the rigor of his present forces. The proiect of the dutes of Guienne and Britany with the Constable, was to imbarke these two great Princes in mutuall warre, in a season of aduantage for Lewis: that the Bourguignons necessity (being abandoned of his allies) might force him to giue his only daughter to the said Duke of Guienne: the which he had often promised, but without performance: whom (as Seneca in his Hippodamia) he promised to many, and gave her not to any.

Charles of Bourgogne abandoned of his friends.

So this Constable who tooke delight to nourish these Princes in feare, and mutual trust, answers the Bourguignon: that the King had a strong and flourishing army, and great intelligences in his Countries, that he knew no better expedient to avoid this storm, then to accomplish that to the Duke of Guienne, which he had so often reiterated: which done, the Dukes of Guienne and Britany would declare themselves for him, and would succour him with their forces. But what shall the Constable get to entertaine these princes in distrust and ialousie one of another, either of them being too cunning to discover his policies? Within short time both of them (having ioyntly conspired against him) shall set his head to sale, and in the end plant it vpon a scaffold for a spectacle. The Britton writes to him in the like and more rigorous teames: suffering the Lord of Lelou to lead a hundred men at armes, Britains to the King. This proceeding caused Charles of Bourgogne to conceiue a great hatred in his heart against them all: but misfortune good for something. It made them the more affected to the Kings seruice during this war, so as at this time the Bourguignons estate was in great danger, whereas by the said marriage he had wonderfully weakened the King: but man purposeeth and God disposeth.

It is commonly said, that halfe the world knowes not how the other liues: and the ordinary

Lewis liues in Picardy.

A ordinary custome of man is to be cleere sighted in other mens affaires, but blind in his owne. Behold two Princes incensed one against another, and yet who should examine their consciences could allege but frivolous pretences. Lewis hating put foureene hundred men at armes, and foure thousand franke archers into Amiens, commanded by the Constable, and other chiefe Officers of the Crowne, assembles the body of his army at Beauvais, having with him the Duke of Guienne his brother, Nicholas Duke of Calabria, the eldest sonne of John Duke of Calabria and Lorraine, the only heire of the house of Anion, and a great number of Nobility, whereby he recouers Roye, Montdidier, Abbeville and all the Country of Ponthieu. Charles passeth the riuier of Somme, takes Piquigny, plants himselfe betwixt Bapaume and Amiens, and keeps the field about fixe weeks, with a firme resolution in shew, to fight with the King if he presented himselfe.

But blockt vp within his campe, and seeing himselfe (ready through want) to be forced to yeeld at the Kings will and discretion; his Maiesties army in Bourgogne (commanded by the Dauphin of Auvergne, sonne to the Earle of Montpensier, in the which were the Earle of Cominges, the Lords of Combronde and Chateaufort, Master William Cousin and others) having likewise vanquished all the enemies forces, Charles by a letter of his owne hand, humbles himselfe to the King: he is grieved that he had so wronged him for anothers pleasure, not being duly informed of all things.

Charles humbles himselfe.

Vertue finds some respect euen in an enemy. Lewis, who vnder a simple bait to recouer the towne vpon Somme, had not so hotly kindled this quarrell, without the great intelligences wherewith the Constable had abused him, especially in the towne of Antwerpe, Bruges and Brussels: he grants a truce for one year. This was the fourth day of May. An unreasonable truce for the Constable (who then serued his master, without dissembling) and other horie-leeches, whom neither troubles, oppression of the people, nor the tediousnesse of affaires did any thing touch, but as pleasing to the Duke as the peace of Conflans. So the King returns into Touraine, Charles into France into Guienne, the Duke of Bourgogne into Hainault, where he assembles his Estates, and shewes the losse he had received, for that his men at armes were not so soone ready as the Kings, and giues order to be no more surprisled vnawares. Thus the Estate is pacified, but the Duke of Guienne was no sooner returned home, but there springs vp new feedes of diuision. He receiues the Earle of Armaignac into fauour, and restores him to full possession of the Lands which the King had confiscate. Lewis moued with this reconciliation, sends forces and takes the lands into his owne hand, disappoints the Earle, whom he knew to be a stirring and a factious man: and euen then he resolved to dispossesse his brother of the Duchie of Guienne, as he had done of that of Normandy.

And obtains a truce.

New troubles by the Duke of Guienne.

The Duke fore-seeing this storme sends often to the Bourguignon, and vnder colour to seeke his daughter, labours to bind him more strictly vnto him by that alliance. The Bourguignon hauing his heart putt vp with as great conceits, as his person was susceptible of itself, but exceeding the capacity of his sense, he sed him with hope: yet had he no such reasoning, but preferred her, as a most pretious iewel to be courtied by many, and to serue him at need, according to diuers occurrents, both of their persons and meanes. Neither would he haue so great a sonne in Law, as the only brother of a King of France, whom he might not rule at his pleasure, neither could he digest the words and proceedings of the Duke of Britany and the Constable. The Constable would haue the Duke of Guen beholding vnto him for this marriage, the Britton repined he should haue the honour. The King comes to crosse it, and with reason, for this alliance had wonderfully fortified his brother, who (being ioynd with the Duke of Britany) had greatly crossed the Kings Estate and his Childrens. Moreover, the King of England did much dissuade the effecting thereof: (said he to the Duke of Bourgogne) if the King of France comes to die without children, his brother succeeds to the Crowne, and this marriage vnto it to so many Prouinces and Seigneuries, the estate of England were neere her ruine.

But to what end serue these affectionate and contrary pursuits? Alasse! some one thinks himselfe found, that carries death in his bosome. But he that reigneth in heauen laughs them to forme: within few monethes our Charles of Guienne, leauing the world, shall leaue his loues. So it is, that their vehemens soliciting, extorted some verball promise, confirmed by a letter, but he had great Cornualis, who all pretended to haue the best best part in the pie: Nicholas Marquis of Pont, sonne to Iohn Duke of Calabria and Lewis raine, Philip Duke of Sauoy, Maximilian Duke of Austria, sonne to the Emperour Maximilian. All these marched in equal rancke: but in the end Maximilian shall be conquerour, yet not during the life of Charles of Bourgonne. This marriage gave a good favour to these Mediators, but vnder the shadow thereof, they treated of other matters. They must auoide this storme, ready to oppress the Duke of Guienne. Behold therefore the publike Ambassadors, and priuate messengers of these three Dukes, are sent respectively one to another. The Lord of Vrie and Pencez de la Riviere, Agents for Charles of Guienne. The Abbot of Begard, since Archbishop of Lion, is an instrument for the Britton to the Bourguignon, they take the King to haue practised and suborned, what friendship, and what by force, the Duke of Guiens seruants: to haue already dedicated place belonging to the Lord of Elitillac, with many other things: shewing that the King would soone dispossesse his brother of Guienne, if he were not speedily prevented, for to this effect he was armed, and ready to enter into Xaintonge. The Duke of Bourgonne sends often to the King touching these affaires. The King excuseth himselfe, and accuseth his brother, as haue treated with the Earles of Armagnac, and Poitiers, to his prejudice, seeking to enlarge his limits without his priuaty, and to enter into factions with his enemies: yet he prometh to suffer him to enioy his portion peaceably.

Anew league betwixt the Dukes of Bourgonne, Guienne and Britanie. against Lewis.

This promise carries no credit, and workes lesse effect: the Dukes of Guienne and Britany insist: they presse the Bourguignon: yet that it may be done without the assistance of the English, the ancient and generall enemy of this Realme, seeing that all their common designs, tended but to the good and ease of the publike: that his assistance, with great intelligence he had with many gouernours and Captaines of places, did not make them sufficiently: pleasant people, to seeke with a bloody wound once againe to the common people with this baite of publike good, and to couer their priuate ends with so pleasant a shew. Charles of Bourgonne calls the stone and hides his arms, and is better to disguise his proceeding, he forces the English secretly to invade France on one side, whilst that he seemed blind, and not to see it. But it was in vaine, the English he more willingly assisted the King, if this marriage had not allyed the 2 houses of France and Bourgonne. In the end, behold a number of Princes in great perplexity, the which more lamentable, for that they shall trouble their heads with so many preiudiciall and extravagant conceptions: this confusion shall in few yeares oppress them in a manner all, and Lewis (particularly fauoured of heauen) shall suruiue them and carry away the spoiles. They preuaile thus much, the Duke of Bourgonne (possessed with an earnest fire to recouer Amiens, Saint Quintin, and other townes vpon Somme) armes two hundred lances, three archers to a Lance, well armed, well mounted, and good leader. What doth our Lewis? In truth hee had too good a iudgement to want his fight, and hee that thought to surpriseth shall be surpriseth. To diuert the Bourguignons leauy, he had often sent the Lord of Craon, and the Chancellor of Oriole, who being very truly seruants in the end conclude an absolute peace. The King yieldeth to the Duke the foresaid townes, he abandons vnto him the Earles of Neuers and S. Paul Constant: the one (hauing serued the King loyally at Peron) had purchased the Dukes indignation, the other (hauing nourished hatred and distrust betwixt these two princes for his owne profit) had so vnreconciledly estranged them from him, as they bandy ioyntly his destruction, & giues him all their lands to incorporate them to his owne, if he could. The Duke in exchange, forsakes the dukes of Guien & Britany, & their Seigneuries, to dispose at his pleasure, promising not to deale as all in the warres which Lewis pretended against them. A foule and dishonest trafficke, made to the prejudice of so great personages.

Notable deceit and treachery.

The Duke signes and wears this fraudulent and counterfeit peace. A blow able to amaze the Dukes of Guienne and Britany at the first hearing, to see themselves thus abandoned of their chiefe support. But he repaires it with an after-blow, and by letters of credit written with his owne hand, giues them aduice to continue their course: that his intent was only to recouer his townes vpon Somme: which done, he will beseech the King by especiall Ambassadors to desist from making warre against them, and vpon his relation he will succour them with body and goods: that as the King at his pleasure had broken the treaties of Confians and Peronne, so might hee infringe his promise and oath. As for the Earles of Neuers, and S. Paul the Constable, although he had a iust occasion to hate them,

A them, yet would he remit their iniuries, and suffer them to inioy their owne; and beseech the King to doe the like by the Dukes of Guienne and Britany, suffering euery one to liue in peace and safety, vnder the Articles respectively accorded: if not, he would succour his allies.

Craon and Oriole had likewise sworne for the King, leading Simon of Quinchi (a gentleman bred up in the Dukes house) to recieue the oath of his Maiesie. But from a new suspect springs a new proiect. Behold newes are brought, that the Duke of Guienne is sicke, and without hope of recovery. Vpon this aduice, the king delays the oath, finds euasions, attending the course of his disease, and in the meane time doth speedily seize vpon many places of Xaintonge: he doth presse Rochel, the which (vpon these accidents of reconciliation and sicknesse) inclines to a composition: hee withdrawes many of his brothers chiefe seruants, and resolues to signe this peace, as the fawourable euent of his affaires should lead him: and in the meane space he protracts time with the Bourguignon, during the which Charles Duke of Guienne dies at Bourdeaux, the twelfth day of May, by the which Lewis recouers the Duchy without blowes; and moreover, retaines Amiens, and Saint Quintins.

Guienne dies.

O subtill wits! both deceiuers, but not of like industry: for our Lewis shall mote easily avoid the snare. But oh death in generall! which by the dissolution of the body & soule, doth dissolve great designs: The Britains were ready to enter, building vpon great intelligences and practices within the realme: the which without doubt had much troubled the State. But oh vnseasonable death in particular! how fitly shalt thou serue to shadow the fishy and hateful (yet well coloured) reproches of enemies, and the murmurings of the most respectiue? A death too much neglected, but by some affectionate seruants to the deceased duke, who discover, that Jourdain Faure, born at Die in Dauphine, great Almoner to the Duke, and Abbot of S. Iohn d'Angely, assisted by Henry de la Roche, one of the said Dukes kitchen, had hastened his death by too violent a poison, as with a strange and lamentable contraction of his sinewes, his haire fell off, and teeth fell out before his death. The Lord of Lescut retired himselfe into Britany, leading prisoners with him these cursed murderers, where the Abbot was found one morning strake dead in his Chamber with a Thunderclap, Having his face swollen, his body and visage black as a coale, & his tongue hanging halfe a foot out of his mouth. God doing that Iustice in the twinkling of an eye, which men desot. Let vs confesse the truth, and without passion: the vertie of the Historie doth presse vs vnto it: that Charles had bin an ill brother, and ought more honour and obedience to him, to whom that great Author of Nature had giuen the right of eldership above him, yet should he haue bin regarded as a sonne of France, and from his infancy recieue a portion fit for the entertainment of his estate and house. Kings haue alwayes power to controule the insolencies of their neere allied, when they forget their duties.

Note the murder of Princes.

But howeouer, let vs obserue the order of diuine Iustice, who easily raiseth vp homebred scourges: but in the end he doth cast the rod in the fire. Lewis must bee measured with the same proportion he had measured his father, and Charles must suffer for the rashnesse of his rebellions.

This death being little lamented, makes such to speake, as had but too diligently obserued Lewis his speech, hearing one day of the death of the King of Castiles brother: He is but too happy (saith he) to haue lost his brother: but hatred and ill will ground their passions euen vpon needlesse points.

At the same instant, Nicholas Marquis of Pont, heire of the house of Aniou (one of the aboue named riualls) made sure to Anne, the eldest daughter of Lewis, abused with the great (yet vaine) promises of the duke of Bourgonne, renounced this so worthy alliance of his souereigne Lord, for a frustratory hope, which the vassall gaue him to marry his daughter: but hee was ignorant that death the yeare following would punish this rashnesse, and prevent him from the inioying, either of Anne or Mary. A season likewise famous by the death of Charles Earle of Eu, a wife and veruous Prince, whose faithful service to France deserues this testimony: that being sonne to Philip of Bourgonne, Earle of Neuers & Bethel, and grand child to Philip the Hardy, a son of France, and duke of Bourgonne, and by consequence neere kinsman to Charles, yet in all these combustions, he had faithfully serued the King, and preferred the Flower de Luce before the Red-crosse. Let vs likewise obserue the death of Willia Gharrier bishop of Paris, who (after his conference with the league before Paris, in the Kings absence) was alwayes in such disgrace with him, as after his death, Lewis caused his Epitaph to be changed, making mention of the bad seruices he had done him, during the warre of the common-weale, suborning the Inhabitants in fauour of the Bourguignon. The death of the Duke of Guienne had wonderfully afflicted Charles of Bourgongne, and to encrease it, he had intelligence, that the Britains would not arme, considering that he was dead for whom they should rise. In the meane time the chance was cast: he had bene at great charge, and to winne had without restitution, were a shame: but that which made him mad, Amiens & Saint Quintin were lost: he must hazard all. And first he writes to many townes: he chargeth the King to haue consented to his brothers death, and labours to draw them into armes, declaring himselfe their Protector, but no man stirres: so the small effect of his letters, sent him on fire, and in his choller he marcheth to Nefle in Vermandois: hee spoyle, burnes and makes all desolate, bessegeth the towne, batters it, and takes it: kils the greatest part of five hundred Archers, commanded by one called Little Picard, takes some, and amongst others the Capraine, and cuts off some of their hands. Many souldiers and townsmen flying into the Church, are barbarously slaine at the altars, imbracing the Images: the Duke enters himselfe into the Church on horse-backe, and seeing the caualiers, Behold (sayes he) this is goodly, I haue good Butchers: then he burnes and razeth the place.

Fiftene hundred franke-archers being in Roye, vnder the command of Peter Aubert, Bailiffe of Melun and Noien, are amazed, and at the Dukes first approach, abandon the Towne, and yeld it vnto him; Loifer of Balagni, Mouy, Rubempre, and others of the arrierban, with about two hundred lances compound, leauing horse and armes, euerie man at armes only hath a horse. The Duke puts a garison therein, and likewite into Montdidier. Thus he hotly pursues his conquests: but Beauvais cooled this heat. He did beleager it (being vnprovided of men warre:) the Inhabitants were commanded then by the aforesaid Balagni, and some few men at armes, so as they were not able to fauour the towne, without the present assistance of him, who doth loofe and restraine the reins of his Iustice at his pleasure. At their first approach, the Lord of Cordes leading the vanguard, plants two Canons against the gate, makes a great hole, but for want of munition the battery ceaseth, they come to blowet, the one to enter, the other to defend the entry, and they presse the Duke to fet forward: the defendants ready to be forced, set fire on the portal, which makes the assailents to retire. The Duke arises, and suffers the fire to take his course, hoping in the end the towne would be his. And indeed if he had lodged a part of his army towards Paris, there had bene small hope of safety. But God had otherwise decreed, for in sight of the enemies troopes, he gives courage to the Earle of Dammartin, to the Marshals of Joachim and Locheac, to William of Valieu, the Seneschals Lieutenant of Normandy, to the Lords of Crussill and Rubempre, to Beine and Tracy brethren, to Buil, Salazard, Theuemet of Vignoles, and Meri of Croy (all braue men & worthy of memory in his siege) to thrust themselves into the towne, with a good number of foot, and about two hundred lances: who at their first entry, giue their horses to the women (who take them, set them vp, and looke vnto them) and present themselves vpon the wall, encouraging the Beauvoisins, and discouraging the Bourguignons. The Duke being enraged, makes all his Canons to approach, and thunder 15 dayes together: he makes a breach, and giues a sharpe assault, but well defended. Sixscore men are slaine, and 1000 being wounded, leaue the place, so as the Duke retires his companies appointed for the assault, and being frustrate of this conceiued hope, pressed by extreame famine, he raiseth the siege, and retires in good order, fearing a charge. But these valiant Captaines knew that the best course was to make a bridge of gold to a flying enemy. This was on Saint Magdelins day, the 26 of the siege. A small aide doth sometime great good. Beauvais waunted, and was ready to compound. But what courtesie might they expect of a passionate enemy, who breathed nothing but blood and fire? For the annoyding whereof, louing & kind dealings were of great moment, which this town receiued of those two mighty neighbors, cities, Paris & Orleans, assisting the with pionsers, victuals, canon, powder, bowes, arrows, pikes, rooles, apparel, and other necessary refreshings, but especially from Orleans, with 4 hundred pipes of Wine, a meane whereby the eternal prouidence preferred them from sacke, spoyle, and a generall desolation by fire, wherewith the Bourguignon threatened them, if force had preuailed. Beauvais freed, the Duke marcheth into Normandy, and presently

sieged and resued.

A presently takes Eu, Saint Valery by Crotoy, Rembures, and (being the scourge of this desolate Realme) leaues in all places behind him the pitifull and cruell markes of his passage: he spoiles and burnes all the Country of Camu, Neufchafel, of Nicourt (a good and a great towne of warre, but vnfurnished of men) Longueuille, le Fahy, euen vnto the gates of Rouen, being little annoyed or hindered by the Constable, who led foure hundred Lances: whose winking serued as a Whetston to sharpen the Kings displeasure and hatred against him, and the ialousie of both these Commanders, hauing of purpose entertained this warre betwixt them, who cunningly smooother a secret dislike, which cost the said Constable his life. Then Winter approaching, he retires into Picardy, he had no sooner turned his backe, but these braue Captaines in Beauvais, recover Eu, Saint Valery, Rembures, and so casting themselves into Noyon, they frustrate the dukes purpose, who meant to besiege it. The Bourguignons fire flames yet farther. A swarme of his partisans, led by the Earle of Rouffy, the Constables sonne, falls vpon the Country of Tonnerre, spoiles the Country, runnes as farre as Joigny, and vnto Troies, burnes both Farmes and Villages without resistance. For reuenge whereof, the Dauphin of Auvergne flies to Bourgongne, drawing after him, where he passeth, a burning besome. Pitifull exploits of war, the witness of reuenging spirits, and alwayes the people smart for the error of great men. But behold other troubles, Peter of Bourbon, Lord of Beauieu, being at Lestore, as Lieutenant general for the King in Guienne, was surprised by the Earle of Armagnac, who was lately dispossessed of his lands: who by this meanes recouers the said towne. Lewis moued with this affront, causeth his army to march, and followeth himselfe in person: but the Cardinall of Arras commanding the troopes, receiues the towne by composition, makes the Earles appointment: and the better to confirme it, he breakes the Sacrament in two, takes the one halfe, and giues the Earle the other, either of them swearing this accord. Trusting therein, he abandons the Towne to the Cardinall, who brings in the army, and by some souldiers suborned, he caused the Earle to be murdered saying of his prayers, not in the Castle, but in a priuate house neere to Saint Geruais Church, and then sacked the towne.

Gods Iustice is slow, but in the end it payes home. This Earle had (vnder a false Bull of dispensation, purchased for money of Ambrose of Cambray, Referendary to Pope Calixtus) married his owne sister: and after by sundry rebellions, purchased the Kings displeasure, and made himselfe guilty of diuine and humane treason. But abhorring the Earles life, let vs likewise abhorre the Cardinals proceeding, selling (vnder the holy Communion) his blood to them that trusted in his oath. The King put many Gentlemen in prison at Loches, who had followed the said Lord of Beauieu, whom the Earle had sent home: but the chance fell vpon John Deymer, being quartered at Tours: who dying, charged the Lord of Saint Basil, a younger brother of Albret, with this treason, being nourished and bred vp in the house of Bourbon, for which crime he lost his head at Poitiers, the seueneth of April 1473. And to increase Lewis his crosses, Pargignan (a towne in the County of Rossillon) is by treason deliuered vp to the King of Arragon, the ancient Lord, where he enters with his sonne, about the end of April. But the King had an army ready, the which he sends thither, and bessegeth it: the French were yet masters of the Castle, by the faithfull valour of master James of Fou (issued from the house of Britany) hee recouers it, and giues the government to Tanneguy of Chastell. Thus the troubles raised by the Earle of Armagnac, and the King of Arragon, were like to fire of Straw.

Let vs observe in the same course, the apprehending of the Duke of Alanson, so shall wee see the carriage of our Lewis. He is accused to haue offered the sale of his Duchy, and other lands in Perche and Normandy to the Bourguignon: and then to follow his fortune, (a crime which shall put him in minde of his condemnation pronounced at Vendosme) hee was seized on by Trifan the Hermit, Proutost of the Kings house, (a speedy executioner of his Maiesties will) and brought before the King, who sends him to the Loure at Paris, where by a sentence giuen by the Chancellor of Orlole, the 17 of July 1474, hee was condemned to lose his head, reseruing notwithstanding the Kings good pleasure, who in the end of the year 75, shall bind him vnto him the second time for his life.

pignan, he assembles all his forces vpon the Marches of Britany, to the number of 50000 men, ready to employ them in that Country. But the Duke, by reason of the death of the Duke of Guienne, being frustrate of the intelligences he had in France, and too weak to auoid this storme that threatened him, sent vnto the King, (lodging at Pont de See.) Philip of Efflars, a Gentleman of his house, & William of Soupleinville, a follower of the Lord of Lescot. His maiesty giues eare to an accord. The duke of Britany being possessed of so wilfe & valiant a man as Lescot, might much annoy him: For in Britany there was neither ingement nor verue, but what proceeded from him (so saies the History.). Moreover, he had auoiding during these partialties shewed himselfe a Frenchman, and would neuer yeeld that any places of Normandy should be giuen to the English: he must therefore be dealt with. To this end the King commands Soupleinville to giue him the demands in writing, which his master made as well for the Duke as for himselfe. He doth it, and obaines them all: forty thousand Franks pension for the duke, the which was paid in 2 yeares. For his master, fixe thousand Franks pension, the moiety of Guienne, the two: Seneschalships of Vahnes and Bourdeleois, the Captainship of one of the Castles of Bourdeaux, that of Blay, the two Castles of Bayonne, of Dax and of Saint Seuer: foure and twenty thousand crownes in gold, payable in foure yeares: the Kings order, and the County of Comminges: for Soupleinville fixe thousand Crownes, payable at like termes: twelue thousand Franches pension, the Mairalty of Bayonne, the Bailiwick of Montargis, and other small preferments in Guienne: for Philip of Efflars, foure thousand Crownes in reward, and twelue hundred Franches pension, the Bailiwick of Meaux, and to be Master of the waters and Forests of France: which things they should enioy during the life of Lewis, who was likewise well and faithfully serued by Lescot.

Now the Britton is satisfied, and sequestered from the alliance of Bourgongne, against whom Lewis now turns head, but the season in the which the Duke of Bourgongne retired into Picardy, caused a truce for one yeare, ending the first of April 1475. A truce which (while the Bourgougnon shall giue our French leaue to breath) shall imbarke him in so many quarrels, as in the end, the most important shall swallow him vp. A truce likewise concluded to the Constables great prejudice: for both the King and the Duke hated him deadly, as the motive of these diuisions. He had lately seized on Saint Quintin, expelling the Lord of Curton, & a hundred men at armes, which he had in entertainment from the King. Charles had likewise many causes of dislike: he was the instrument to take Amiens and S. Quintin for the King, he sought to reduce him to that estate, as to force him to marry his daughter with the Duke of Guienne: but the chiefe ground was, that during the siege of Amiens by the Duke of Bourgongne, the Constable had made a road into Hainault, spoiled the Countrey, and burnt (among other exploits) the Castle of Seure belonging to Baldwin of Launai, of whom the Duke made good account: for reuenge whereof he passed into Picardy and Normandy, as we haue seen. Moreover, he had mighty enemies both with the King and Duke, who all ioyntly conspired his destruction, and animated their masters with all their credits. So all this yeare of truce is spent chiefly in making merchandise of the Constables life. Himbertcourt and Hugonnet Chancellor of Bourgongne, had some priuate spleene, for in a conference held at Roie, where the Constable was employed for the King, they grew so bitter in words, as the Constable had giuen them the lyke: to whom the Bourgougnons modestly answered: That they did not impute this injury done vnto them, but to the King, vpon whose word they were assembled, and to their master, whose person they did represent, to whom they would make report.

In the end, at the instance of either part, a day is held at Bouvines: for the King there came the Lord of Curton Gouverneur of Limosin, and Master John Heberge afterwards Bishop of Eureux; and for the Duke, the two aboue-named. They pronounce the Constable an enemy, and guilty to both Princes, they promise and sweare one to another, that the first that may apprehend him, shall put him to death within eight dayes, or deliuer him to his companion to doe his pleasure. That he should be proclaimed by Trumpet, an enemy to both parties, with all those that should serue and assist him, and confiscate all his goods, mouables and immouables. The King promiseth to giue S. Quintin, Han and Bohain to the Duke, with all the money that might be found within the Realme, appertaining to the Constable, and all his lands holding of the Duke, and at a certaine day

Charles of Bourgongne seeks to pay for the King.

A day the King and the Duke should meet before Han, and there with their vniued forces besiege the Constable. But some will say, to what end serue all these voyages, and so many meetings? whereto so many complots to intrap the Constable: mult the King (to be reuenged of his seruant) make an agreement with his capital enemy, who euen of late had sought to take away his life by poison, promising a Merchant named Thier fifty thousand Crownes to effect it: who hauing imparted it to John Hardy his seruant, sometimes in household with the Duke of Guienne, he suffred the said Hardy to lose his life, and to be quartered publicly at the Greue in Paris:

Lewis judged of the future by the present, and with one stone gaue many blowes. Hee disarmed his enemy, or at the least gaue him means to transport his armes farther off, whereto the great designs of his ambition did draw him, as wee shall see hereafter: and moreover, the King could hardly seize vpon the Constables person, without the dukes intelligence, for he was seated directly betwene both. Hee held S. Quintin, and had Han and Bohain, his owne places, very strong and neere, hee might put in men from whence and when he pleased. Hee had intertainment for foure hundred men at armes well paid, whereby he gat much, in not keeping his companies full. Hee exacted a Crowne for euery pipe of Wine passing through his Countrey into the low Countries. Hee had fixe and forty thousand franks of ordinary entertainment from the King, very rich Siegneries, and great intelligences both within the Realme and in the Dukes Countries. Hee was a man of action, and could both helpe and hurt much. To conclude, hee knew well that flying from the one, he should bee well accepted of the other. Moreover, the personage and the places he held, deserved a good peace, and either of the two Princes would gladly haue enioyed him absolutely, if hee had bene constant, and not dissembling to either.

Yet for all this hee auoydes all danger. Hee is aduertised that his head is set to sale, wherupon he sends to both Princes, speaks big, and faith, that hee vnderstands all their practices, but especially to the King, That the Duke by this conuention sought onely to draw him to his party, and to put him in disgrace with his Maiesty, and this did Lewis apprehend most. In truth these two Princes laboured exceedingly, who should deceiue his companion most. According vnto man, it is better to deceiue, then bee deceiued. Lewis presently countermands his Ambassadors, giues them charge not to conclude any thing against the Constable, but to prolong the truce, so as the foure Ambassadors (who had already mutually giuen their seales, containing their resolution taken against the Constable) deliuer them vp, and returne without any conclusion. The King fearing lest this affront might force the Constable to make his peace with the Duke, and so deliuer vp to him S. Quintin and other Forts, that were in his power, prevents him, giuing him to vnderstand, that an enteriueu shall make his peace. They appoint a day and place, three leagues from Noyon towards la Ferte vpon a little river. The Constable came first, but as a confidence prick with the feeling of his misdeeds, wants no distrust and feare, hee demands hostages. The King seemes to like well thereof. On the riuers side, they make a strong barre with grates very high towards the Constable: there he presents himselfe, accompanied with three hundred Masters, hauing armes vnder a loose cassoche. The King approacheth, accompanied with aboute fixe hundred men at armes, and amongst others Chabannes Earle of Dammartin, Lord Steward, and a mortall enemy to the Constable. Oh Lord Steward! but for thy presence, with what colour could the Constable haue shadowed his excuses? At the first entrance hee kneeles downe, and beseecheth his Maiesty, not to hold it strange, if he appeare in armes, and thus followed, considering the quarrell he had with Dammartin. Then they treat together, the King grants him a general abolition of all that was past, he leaues him the guard of S. Quintin, and continues him the pay of his men at armes, being before refrained of some quarters pay. The Constable promiseth to serue his Maiesty against all men, without exception, and so he opens the barre and passeth to the Kings side, who reconciles him with the Lord Steward, and the next day suffers him to returne to Saint Quintin. A presumption of too hard digestion for so iudicious a Prince as Lewis was, to see his Officer present himselfe like a Prince that were his enemy, yea his equal in power. But all comes to one end, if wee will haue patience. The Court could not endure this manner of proceeding, and the murmuring which Lewis heares, makes him remember; that it is too great a presumption in a seruant to plant plant a bar before his master, and to present himselfe vnto him accompanied with men of armes, all being his subiects and vnder his pay, and too base in him, to goe and receiue the submission of his Constable. A folly approaching neere to that of Peronne.

An act which shall much incense the Kings hatred against him, and breed a worke in the Constables conscience, the which shall gnaw him with continuall disquiet, doubtfull how to maintaine himselfe betwixt two such mighty enemies: but in the end he must fall to reach vs, That neither our merits, nor any seruices we can doe to our Princes, should cause so great presumption, as to thinke they could not liue without vs, or that wee haue meanes to prescribe them a law. For naturally they hate such as thinke they are beholden vnto them, and dispatch them at length that haue braued them. Good decisions pleasing, whilst that hee which receiues them hath meanes to recompence them, but when they are so great, or we esteeme them so, as they are beyond all compass of retaliation, in stead of thanks wee receiue nothing but hatred and ill will. It is therefore better to be beloued then feared.

Let vs now see what passed during the truce. Lewis hauing his mind free, and his body discharged of armes, hee resolves to provide for his heires. Doubtlesse the choice which he made of two Princes of his blood, did testifie, how much he did cherish his house, giving them two precious pearles out of his Iewell house, Anne his eldest to Peter of Bourbon, a goodly Princeesse, and Iane the youngest to Lewis duke of Orleans, being yet very young, and afterwards the 17 French King: whereunto he did not yeeld but to please the King, for the was soule and crooked. This season is likewise famous for a notable Ambassage from Arragon, touching the affaires of Roussillon. The King making the Ambassadors to iudge of the whole pece by a patterne, causeth them to see, the 20 of Aprill, a hundred and foure thousand men armed in battell, all in one livery, with red cassockes crossed with white, all Officers, Bourgeois and Inhabitants of Paris.

We haue said, this truce should proue an incomber to the Duke of Bourgogne, let vs examine the effects by the causes. At what time the King tooke Amiens from the Bourguignon, Adolfe that wicked and vnkind son of Arnold Duke of Gueldres (repining at his fathers long life) took him prisoner one night going to bed: and making him to march on foot without hope, in a most cold season five Germane leagues, he thrust him in the bottome of a tower, where as the Sun did neuer shine, but by a small grate, and there he held him 6 months. The Duke of Cleues, whose sister the prisoner had married, undertakes his quarrell, and seeks by force to free his brother in law. But Adolfe hauing married the Duke of Bourbons sister, in the Bourguignons house finds great fauour. So the Duke of Bourgogne labors to reconcile them. The Emperor deales in it, but at without effect, vntill the Pope had interposed his authority, who commanded Charles of Bourgogne, vnder great penalty, to draw the old man by force out of prison, seeing his sonne would not enlarge him by intreaty. Adolfe on the one side, seeing so many Potentates busied in this action, and on the other fearing the Dukes forces, he released Arnold, who in the dukes chamber, (notwithstanding the inequality betwixt the father and the sonne) offers his sonne the combat. Charles seeks to reconcile them, to the sonnes advantage, to whom he offers the title of Gouernor of Bourgogne, the Countie of Gueldres with all the reuenues, onely Graue, a small towne, should remaine to the father, with three thousand Florins of rent, and so much pension, and the title of Duke. But oh impious and horrible answer! I had rather (sayes Adolfe, to those that deliuered this speech vnto him) cast my father headlong into a ditch, and my selfe after him, then yeeld to this accord: he hath bene Duke these 44 yeares, it is now time that I were. I will willingly leave him three thousand Florins a yeare, upon condition that hee neuer enter into the Duchy: with many other words vnworthy of a Sonne. Charles grieved at the obstinacy of Adolfe, leaues both father and sonne at Doullans, and retires to Hedin. Adolfe to recover the Country, disguiseth himselfe like a French-man, and passing a ferry neere vnto Namur, he is discouered by a Priest, who giues intelligence, whereupon this young Duke is taken and caried prisoner to Namur, where he remained vntill the death of the Duke of Bourgogne, that the Gantois deliuered him, hoping by force to make him marry with Mary the heire of Bourgogne; afterwards Dutchesse of Austria, after the folly which they had made him commit before Tournay, a fatal place, for the reuenge of the wrongs hee had done to his father. Arnold died during *Adolfe*s imprisonment, whose ingratitude had

Lewis married his two daughters.

Adolfe on vs. kind sonne.

Adolfe taken prisoner.

A iustly moued him to leaue the succession to the Duke of Bourgogne. So Charles building vpon this donation, goes with force to take possession of the Duchy. This new conquest bred new projects, and euen then hee conceived such an imaginary power as in the end hee funke vnder the burthen. Hee neuer had so goodly an army, especially in horse. The Earle of Campobasso, and Galcot a Neapolitan Gentleman, (the first a Greeke in disposition and most wicked, the second a very honest man,) commanded 1000 men at armes, Italians: hee had 3000 good English, and good numbers of his owne subiects, well mounted, well armed, and of long time trained vp in warre, with great store of artillery. Hee was at truce with our King, and to keepe him occupied, the English by his practice were ready to land in France. What then? should hee suffer his men to liue idle without employment? Gueldres had encouraged him. The Emperour was no man of resolution, willing rather to endure some disgraces, then to be at charge, and without the aide of some Princes of Germany his power was small. These baits thrust him in forwards, but the expiration of the truce might haue stayed him. Yet he obtains a prolongation of the King for sixe moneths, whereunto Lewis yeelds willingly. Foreseeing (as he had a more sound iudgement then those which did diswaide him) that this Prince sought his owne ruine: that hauing finished one enterprize, another would spring vp, and so quarrell grow vpon quarrell, which the Princes of Germany would well preuent, being alwaies vnited in matters which concerne the Emperour.

C So it chanced. And as in to great a project, he must needs wonderfully discontent the Nobility and Commonalties of Germany, so was it expedient for him, to tye some vnto him. He procures an emercuue with the Emperour at Treues, and there treats of the marriage of Mary of Bourgogne his daughter with Maximilian Arch-duke of Austria, the Emperours sonne: which done, the Emperour should erect his lands and siegneries in Gaule Belgique, to a royalty: hee should incorporate foure Bishopricks to this new Kingdom, whereof the royalty should appertaine vnto him, and not to the Emperour, and should create him vicar Generall of the Empire. Fredericke findes these demands so inuicill and vnreasonable, as hee leaues the Duke of Bourgogne at Treues, and parts without bidding him farewell. And now another occasion thrusts him on. He that had once passed the bounds of modesty, must needs grow exceeding impudent. Two contended for the Archbishopricke of Cologne, the one was brother to the Langraue of Hessen, the other a kinsman to the Conte Palatine of Rhin, whom the aduerser faction had expelled. Charles was banded for the latter, and undertakes to restore him by force, hoping to plant his ensignes in Germany, or at the least to haue some part for his charges.

He first comes to Nuz vpon the Rhin, foure leagues from Cologne, supposing (that if hee tooke it) to fortifie it well, and then to plant another Fort about Cologne by the surprize of some towne of importance, thereby to force the towne to yeeld, and so to mount vp the Rhin to the Countie of Ferrete (the which he had in pawne of Sigismund Duke of Austria, brother to the Emperour) and so to command all that great and rich passage of the Rhin, euen vnto Holland, where it ends, thereby to deuour Lorraine, and so without the Emperours ayde, to usurpe the title of King of Sicile and Ierusalem. But Nuz was not vnfinished. The Langraue of Hessen had cast himselfe into it, with many of his kinsmen, and friends, to the number of eightene hundred horse, with a sufficient number of foote, to keepe the place. The Citizens of Cologne, with their neighbors, arme sixteene thousand foot, and incampe vpon the Rhin, right against the Duke, to cut off his victuals that came out of Gueldres, and to stay the boats with their Cannon.

The Emperour, and Princes both spirituall and temporall doe arme, and as the King had often solicited them, they send vnto him to make a trial of his intent. Lewis failes not to grant what they demanded, promising twenty thousand men, when as the Imperiall army should be at Cologne. But he had worke at home. Edward King of England discontented, that Lewis had supported Henry, and the Earle of Warwicke, against him, prepares (in the Bourguignons fauour) sixteene hundred masters, all Gentlemen well mounted, and the most part barded, which made a great number of horse, and 14000 Archers all on horse-backe, with a great number of foot. The Duke of Britany hauing already consented to rebellion, should receiue three thousand English, and Ioyne his army with them as appeared by letters written by the hand of Prise sometimes master of the kings horse, and then to Charles many enemies.

In the meane time, the King treats of a peace with the duke of Bourgongne, to prevent this storme, or at least to prolong the truce. The Duke excuseth himselfe vpon his word giuen to the English, who labours to draw the Duke from Nuz, exhorting him to accomplish the conuention, considering his great charge, and that the season fit for warre was almost spent. To this end, the Lord Scales, nephew to the Constable, makes two iourneys to Charles, who pretends (by friuolous euasions) that his honour is much engaged in this siege, and that he could not rise without disgrace. Lewis to crosse him (being alwaies his crafts-master in any action, either of war, or peace) procures him many and new enemies. It was no matter of difficulty to draw in Rene the sonne of the daughter of Rene King of Sicile, the heire of Lorraine, by reason of his grandmother, after the death of Iohn Duke of Calabria and Lorraine his vncke, and of the Marquis Nicolas sonne to the said Iohn. For the duke being dead, Charles of Bourgongne, desirous to winne this Duchy to his Countie, had caused him to be taken prisoner: but he was deliuered in change for a yong Germane Prince, who was taken studying at Paris; and marching presently with his army, hee had easily deuoured that Prey, if the King following him, had not forced him to passe on. Rene therefore sends to desie him before Nuz, and fortified by some French troops, commanded by the Lord of Craon, he enters the Duchy of Luxembourg, spoiles the Countie and razeth Pierrefort, a place of the said Duchy, and neere to Nancy. Sigismund of Austria, had in the year 1469, engaged his Countie of Ferrere, to the D. of Bourgongne, with all the lands he enjoyed on either side the Rhin, for threecore and ten thousand Crownes. Charles had placed Peter of Hagenbac there for Governor, a wicked man, a violent extortioner, and insupportable both to the Nobility and people, who complained Sigismund, beseeching him to succour them against the outrages, and concussions of Hagenbac. Sigismund had been long in dislike with the Suiffes, his neighbors; but by the kings means, they were all easily reconciled.

So they conclude a league, in the which the imperiall Cities ioyne, Strasburg, Basil, Colmar, and Slesstad, and contribute to furnish the sum due by Sigismund to Charles; the which they configne into the hands of a banker at Basil: then the inhabitants of these ingaged lands, signifie vnto the duke of Bourgongne, that they had freed themselves of the oath they had made vnto him. And holding themselves freed from the Bourgignons obedience, they reiect his Lieutenant generals command. To suppress them, he assembles a great troop of Picards, Flemings, Henniuers and Lombards, & on Christmas day at night (a good worke on a good day) he seeks to bring them secretly into Enflus. The Citizens beate them backe, kill & take many, the rest fly to Brianfon with Hagenbac. The Brianfons arme, and are the stronger, they seize on the Gouernour, expell the soldiers, and then doe they speedily informe of his misdemeanours, giuing intelligence to all their allies, and demand Iudges to iudge of the proccesse. They depute some from Alstaz, Strasburg, Basil, Songoy of the blacke forest, Fribourg, Berne, Soleure, and other places, who condemne Hagenbac to dye, vpon foure principall crimes: for that hee had caused foure men of Honor to be beheaded at Than, without any forme of law: to haue made and displaced Officers at his pleasure contrary to his oath: to haue brought in foraine nations into places with all liberties: and for that he had rauished women, forced virgins, and committed incest with Nunnes. The Duke of Bourgongne aduertised of the death of Hagenbac, resolves to be reuenged of such as had bene actors. And hereupon Henry Earle of Wittemberg and Montebiard, is taken by the dukes men. Those of Basil aduertised hereof, send a number of men with artillery to Montebiard, to stop the Bourgignons passage, who summon the Caste: the which refusing to yeeld, he sends fixe thousand horse, vnder the command of Stephen Hagenbac, to reuenge his brothers death, and to make warre vpon the Bishop of Basil, who (whilest that Sigismund assembles his confederates) spoiles about thirty villages, kills, takes, carries away, and rauishes men, women, children and cattle. Behold a strong party made against Charles of Bourgongne, by the Kings policy, whereby the Suiffes entering into Bourgongne, take Blaimont, besiege Hericourt, defeat the Bourgignons that come to succour it, and kill two thousand which done they retire.

The Duke of Bourgongne
Lieutenant executed by the Suiffes.

Open warre betwixt the Duke of Bour-gongne and the Suiffes.

A The truce now expired: as the King had vader-hand stirred vp the Duke of Lorraine, the Germanes, and the Suiffes against the Duke of Bourgongne, sufficiently busied before Nuz, he now by open force takes from him, spoiles, and burns, Ironquoy, Montdidier, Roye, Montreuil, and Corbeie: and then sends the baltard of Bourbon Admiral of France, General of his army, before Arras, and thereabouts, who spoiles and consumes with fire most of the places lying betwixt Abbeuille and Arras. The inhabitants of Arras force their men of warre to goe to field, vnder the command of the Earle of Rhonoyne the Queenes brother. But the Amirall hauing layd a strong ambush, sends forth about forty Lances to draw forth the townemen, who falling out as to an assured victory, are conu B passed in like partridges in a net, defeated, chased and slaine to the number of fourscore or fifteene hundred, many are taken prisoners, and of the better sort, Lewis of Saint Pol, the Constables brother, the Lords of Conray, Carency, and others. At this time the King did set the Prince of Orange at liberty, (being of the House and bearing the armes of Chalon) taken in warre, being set at thirty thousand Crownes ranfome, who which the King did moderate to ten thousand: and caused it to bee presently payed to the Gentleman that held him, by meanes whereof he became the Kings Leige-man, and did him homage for the said Principality. So as the King gaue him power to intitle himselfe, by the Grace of God Prince of Orange, and to coyne money of gold and silver of as high a standard as that of Dauphine: to grant all graces, remissions, pardons, but for heresie, C and treason.

This transaction, with the former prizes, did wonderfully discontent the Constable, zealous of the Kings good successe, & fearing likewise some check by so mighty an army, which the Admiral and the Earle of Dammartin had at his gate. For the auoyding whereof, he giues the King a false intelligence, that the English were at sea, ready to land at Calais: hee perswades the King to provide for the places of Normandy, he promised faith- fully to defend the marches of Picardy, and in his masters absence to reduce Abbeuille and Peronne to his obedience.

But let vs heare another notable part of treachery: hee seeks by all meanes to weaken the King, and yet would hee not fortifie the Bourgignon: but that the English should C crosse both their Estates, that his owne might stand firme in the midst of their contentions. With this designe, he procures the Duke of Bourgongne, to send Philip Bouten, and Philip Poi Knights, to the Duke of Bourbon, and hee for his part sends Heister of Ecluse, to signifie vnto him, that the English would soone land, that the Duke of Bourgongne, and hee and the Constable, ioyning all their powers together, would easily conquer the Realme, exhorting him (for the auoyding of his owne ruine and his Counties) to ioyne with them, the which if he refuse, and that it fall out ill for him, he was not to be pield.

The Duke of Bourbon sends the King two letters of this tenor, brought to him at diuers times by Ecluse, who makes answer to the Duke and Constable: that neither promises nor threats should draw him from the obedience and faithfull seruice hee did owe E vnto his Maiesty. Lewis will produce these letters to the Constables confusion, in the end of the next year. For the present, he must assure his frontiers. There is no newes yet of the English. Lewis makes well this chafe, and will cause the Constable (who supposed himselfe to haue the aduantage of the game) to lose the party. Poore Nobleman! how many misfortunes fore-tell thy approaching ruine? Thy brother prisoner: Thy wife dead at the same instant, one of the chiefe pillars of thy house: who as sister to the Queene, might at need haue preferred thy head: Thy Nephew Scales prisoner, with the instructions hee brought, from England to the Bourgignon. And to fill vp the measure, thy son the Earle of Rouilly defeated at Grey in Bourgongne, and prisoner with the duke of Bourbon, who shall not leaue him vntill the end of the year, (for forty thousand Crownes ranfome) with the losse of two hundred men at armes, Lombards, the Baron of Couches and many others. The Marshall of Bourgongne, sonne to the Earle of Saint Martin, two sonnes of the house of Vireaux, wherof the one was Earle of Joigny, the Lords of Longey, Lille, Digoine, Montmartin, Ragony, Chaligny, the Bayliffe of Auxerre, the Ensigne beare to the Lord of Beauchamp, and many others, escaped death but not imprisonment.

Sufficient warnings to amaze a resolute mind. Hereafter the Constable is afflicted with strange distemperatures, fed with the neighbourhood of the Earle of Dammartin, be- ing ing lodged neere S. Quintin, whom he knew to bee none of his friends. And fearing lest the King should assault him, he sends to take assurance of the Duke of Bourgogne, intreating him to send him his brother James of Saint Pol, the Lord of Fienens, and some other his kinsmen and friends, to put them into Saint Quintin, and to keepe the towne to the Dukes deuotion, (without bearing S. Andrews crosse) the which he promised to forevnto him within a prefixed time.

They come: they present themselves within view of Saint Quintin, once, twice, and thrice: but the Constable suspects them, and sends them backe. They came still, either too soone or too late: so as at the brute of these forces the Admirall casts himselfe into Arras, wherof he followed the taking of James of Saint Pol, who being brought before the King, hauing liberty to speake, he confessed, that at the two first iournies, he came only with an intent to comfort his brother: but at the third time, seeing the Constable had deceived both his Master and him; that he had been the stronger, he would haue kept the place for his Master without offering any violence to his brother: whereupon his Maiestie kept him at libertie; very well appointed, seruing him vnto his death. And although the Constable had lately done a notable disgrace vnto the King, yet his Maiestie dissembled wisely: and to take from him all cause of ieaousie, he wills him to goe and make warre with Hainault, and to besiege Arras, whilst that the Admirall was busied in Arras. The goos, but very loth, and with exceeding feare, and stayes but little: he retires betimes, being aduertised (as he informed the King) that two men in his army (whom he described by apparent signes) were suborned to kill him. This new feare, accompanied with distrust, bred a terrible distemperature in the Constables head, who hauing lost his credit both with the King and Duke, will yet entertaine himselfe by both, and perswade them that he is seruant but to one. He lent on to the Bourguignons campe, to draw him from the siege of Nuz; that he might ioyne slyly with the English at their coming on land, and then vpon the returne of his messengers, he gaue the King some plausible intelligence, to cause him to like of his conference with the Duke, sometimes disgracing his officers, to win the credit of an affectionate seruant with Lewis, sometimes extolling the Duke, to terrifie the King: But oh policie simply shadowed!

On the other side, he knew well that he had greatly offended the King by his last action. He sees himselfe forsaken by his most confident seruants, Iulius and Mary, whom the King had entertained. These might haue assisted him in his peace-making, the which he shadowed with some recompence, that the King had promised him for the Colony of Guise. Lewis heares them, giues them good words, and commands the Constable to come vnto him. But the conscience of our misdeeds, is a grieuous testimony. The variety offe troubled thoughts, will not admit an easie reliefe. He offers to come, so as his Maiesty will swear vpon the Crosse of S. Lau, that he will neither doe, cause, nor suffer any treachery nor outrage to be done to his person. This Crosse hath been kept at Angiers time out of mind, with an old beliefe, That whosoever swearing thereon, doth forswear himselfe, he dies within the yeare, of a miserable and violent death: Lewis remembers this oath, but submits himselfe to any other. The more he excuseth himselfe, the more the Constable presseth him. Thus pass they hourly from either of them vpon this assurance: behold, two great personages of sundry humours, wonderfully troubled in mind, and it seemed they feared alike, to perish or to separate themselves absolutely. Yet Lewis was the more cunning, and did his businesse more courtely. But if these two afflicted themselves in this sort, Edward of England, and Charles of Bourgogne were in no lesse doubt one of another. The King had sent Iohn Tierclis the Lord of Brosse, to make his excuse vnto the Emperor, for that hee had not sent the army promised by the treaty, assuring him to doe it, when hee had ended his enterprises begonne, and for the most part well forward both in Bourgogne and Picardy, intreating him in the meane time not to make any agreement with the Duke: and that the one should not treat of a peace without the other. That hee should confiscate all the Dukes Siegneries that held of the Empire, and that hee would seize vpon such as depended on the Crown of France, as Flanders, Arthois, Bourgogne, and many others.

The Emperor, a man of more witten vertue, answers by a gentle Apologie, That they must not divide the Beares skin, before the beaſt be dead. As if he should say, Come according to your promise, let vs take this man, and then weare his spoiles. Let vs now see what

A what he doth before Nuz, where wee haue left him much perplexed how to spee. himselfe with his honour from this enterprize. Two mighty armies attended him and cast off his vials both aboue and beneath the Rhine: all the Princes of Germany both spiritual and temporal, had ioyned their forces in infinite numbers; all the townes and commonalties did willingly contribute to this charge. Two other considerations did trouble him. The King made great war against him, and had burnt many places in Bourgogne, Picardy, Arthois, and Ponthieu. Moreover, he had laboured all his life to draw in the English, but without any effect till now, and would bee abandoned so goonly an army, hanging now betwixt Douer and Calais, complaining of his breach, threatening swift delay, if any longer to take another course. Yet must the Bourguignon find some honourable pretext for his sinning.

There was with the Emperor an Apostolicke Legate, going from army to army, to mediate a peace. The King of Denmark was there in person, for the same effect. In the end, the place is deliuered into the Legates hands, to dispose as the See of Rome should decree. That Nuz after a yeares siege, sees the Bourguignon lodge with the host of foure thousand of his choise men. A hard departure; that notwithstanding the necessity of his Army, and this mighty Imperial power, yet not daring to affront him, hee dedde the beleagued Citizens overcome with hunger and toyle, who had been tormented within ten dayes to yield to his mercy. Charles would willingly haue been reuenged of Riche for his deſe: yet hee forbears vntill the next yeare, but with another issue then hee expected: he shall be well beaten & then slaine. At this time vrgent necessity drawes him elsewhere, and his troops hauing need to be refreshed, he sends them to liue vpon the spoiles of Lorraine and Barre, and himselfe with a small traine goes to meet Edward at Calais: Edward being yet at Douer, send Garter his King at armes, a Norm and by nation to Lewis with a letter of defiance, the tenor whereof smels more of the French then the English.

He summons him, To yeld vnto him the Realme of France, at his right; that hee might restore the Church, Nobility and people to their ancient liberties, and free them from their great burthens and afflictions: and upon his refusal, hee proſeſſes of all the miseries that should follow, after the accustomed manner and forme in such like cases. A bare deſie grounded vpon a subject long before debated, and often decided. The King reads the letter, commands the Herald to be brought into a chamber vnto him, being alone, and saies vnto him; That he knew well the king of England was thrust into this enterprize by the people of England, by the Duke of Bourgogne, and by the Constable of Saint Paul. That the Duke came from Nuz like a vanquished and needy man, that winter grew on, vnfor the effects of warre, that the Constable would deceive King Edward, and liue onely in his dissimulation, entreating euery man, and trusting no man. In the end, he solicits Garter, to perswade his master to make an agreement with him, giuing him three hundred Crowns with his own hand, and promise of a thousand, if it might be accomplished: and in publicke, he caused a goodly peece of crimson veluet to be giuen him, containing thirty elles.

The Herald promitteth to doe his best indagation, aduising him to send a Herald to obtaine a safe conduct for the sending of Ambassadors, at what time as Edward should haue passed the sea: who at his first entry finds himselfe much deceived of his expectation, for the Duke had promised to ioyne with him, with two thousand five hundred men at armes, with a great number of other horse and foot: and for this assurance, to put some strange places into his hands, namely, Saint Quintin, relying vpon the Constable: That sending the King overcharged, and ready to recieue a mate, hee should begin the wars in France, three moneths before the landing of the English army, but his army was so weak and poore, as hee durst not shew it.

Let vs here acknowledge another notable fauour of God to this Crowne, who had fo blinded the iudgement of this duke, as he continued obdurate & wilfull, before this strong place resolutely defended, whereas he should haue attended the English. Wee confesse that both together would haue dangerously shaken the estate of this Realme. So the English and Bourguignon part from Calais, passe by Bouillon, and draw towards Peronne, where thinking to lodge, they were disappointed, which gaue some dislike vnto the English. Being at Peronne, the Constable sends Lewis of Cressille to the Duke of Bourgogne, excusing himselfe, for not deliuering vp of Saint Quintin: whereby (said hee) he should haue lost all his credit, and intelligence in France, and haue beene altogether vnprounprofitable for him. But he was now wholly at his devotion, seeing the King of England within the Realm. Moreover, he promised the said Duke, to defend and recover his lands with his friends and allies, as well the King of England, as others; and he made all these promises, excepting: and intricates him that that writing of his owne hand may serve as a pledge of credit with the said King. The Duke gives him letter unto Edward, allying him together, that the Constable should not only give him entrance into Saint Quintin, but also all his other places. Both the King and Duke beleaved it. The King, for that he had married the Constable's daughter, for that the Constable was in so great feare and distrust of our Lewis, it seemed he should not dare to faile of his promises. They part from Peronne, and approaching neere S. Quintin, they send some English troops before, to enter the town to the taking of a certaine possession. But the Negro (saith the French) changed his hew. The signal they give them of their approach neere unto them, were smoke and Cannon shot. Two or three English are slain, and some taken; & so they recover their army, greatly discomfited with this affront. The Bourguignon, to colour this foule and treacherous part, pretends the Constables meaning to be very good, that he could not see the yielding thereof, with any apparent profit, if as the simple sight of his malice he should be amazed, that he would be forced thereunto; and if all the while army marched, he would make no refusal. But these were jells: he desired but to win time, and to show himselfe enemy for any man. The next day Charles of Bourgonne takes the person of Edward, promising to returne speedily with all his forces. Edward and his men had small practice in the estate of our Realme, they are not the braue warriors which had so long governed our France: they needed conduct and direction to fashion them to our armes, without the which they know themselves at the first trial to be unprofitable: but in a short time they are fashioned, and become good soldiers. In the meane time they are abandoned, and the season of doing any thing is trost past: they must therefore resolve. And thus the King desires that Edward would agree. The English had taken the servant of James Graffe, a Gentleman of the Kings house, but for that he was their first prisoner, Edward gives him liberty. At his departure, Howard and Stanley, (both in credit with Edward) said unto him; Recommend us unto your King your master, if you may please him. (Garter the Herald had named these two to obtaine a passport for the Ambassadors that Lewis should send to treat.) This message had some ielousie in the Kings head, who then was at Compeigne; for Gilbert the brother of James Graffe followed the duke of Britany, and was in great credit; but being carefully examined, they find, he deserved credit. Lewis remembers the direction the Herald had given him, and suddenly takes this resolution with himselfe, To send a servant the sonne of Meridol of Rochel, belonging to the Lord of Malles (or Strake) in quality of a Herald. This servant had his countenance and personage very vnplesant; yet a good wit, and a sweet speech. But why did Lewis make choice of a servant, whom he had neuer seen before, amongst so many thousands more capable of that charge; hee might discover him if need required, as intruding himselfe, or at the least admonishing without his priuie, and at all hazards, the losse of a servant was not great. This Herald fashioned after the Kings mind, hath his charge deliuered him, and is attired with a coate of armes, made like wise in hast, of a trumpets banner, enameled like a petty Herald, that belonged to the Admirall; and then he goes to horse backe, without any man priuie excepte Villiers, Master of the horse, and the Lord of Argenton. Being arrived at the English army, he is brought before the King, to whom he deliuers his charge; That the King his master had long desired to haue good amity with him, to the end that both their Realmes might hereafter liue in peace: That since his coming to the Crowne hee had neuer made warre, nor attempted any thing against the Crowne of England. Whoe had receiued the Earle of Warwick, it was only to crosse the Duke of Bourgonne: That the Duke of Bourgonne should not haue procured his passage into France; but to make his peace with more advantage with the King. If any others were actors (meaning the Constable) it was but to ferre their owne turnes in crossing him, and to worke their priuate profits, not regarding the affaires of England. That now winter grew on, that his army was not raised without exceeding charge (this was secretly to offer a recompence of all or part, which was a great word adre to peace.) That such as nourished this warre betwixt them,

The Duke of Bourgonne
reproacheth

The Constable
perplexed.

A were some Noblemen and Merchants, who made their profits of the peoples losse: That if the King of England would give care to a treaty, the King his Master would embrace it with so great affection, as both himselfe and his Realme should remaine well satisfied: And for prooffe, if it pleased him to grant a safe conduct for an hundred horse, the King would send Ambassadors unto him well informed of his pleasure: vntill hee desired a mutual interview in some place, mid-way betwixt both armies, then the King should grant a safe conduct for his part.

These speeches please, and this counterfeit Herald returnes with a safe conduct, as he desired, accompanied with another Herald, to carry one from the King of the same tenour. The next day, the Ambassadors of either side meet, in a village neere to Amiens: For the King, came the bastard of Bourbon Admirall; the Lord of S. Pierre, and Hoberge Bishop of Eurcu. For Edward, came Howard, Sellenger, and Doctor Morton, afterwards Chancellor of England, and Archbishop of Canterbury. In truth it was much to humble himselfe, but the weighty burthen of affaires which oppressed our King, forced him thereunto, who with one stroke gaue two strokes: for Lewis sent backe his enemy, to the great confusion of the Duke of Bourgonne. Lets generally confesse, that it is not now alone, that God doth shew his singular grace and fauour to this Monarchie; The Britton was watchfull, and ioynly with the Bourguignon, they practised crosses of dangerous consequence.

The English from a general demand of the crown of France, restraines himselfe to the Duchy of Normandy or Guienne. But a franke demander, requires a bold denier. Lewis protests, that he would do any thing to send the King of England out of his Realm: but to yield him the possession of any lands, hee will rather put all to hazard. He had a goodly and mighty army, which they esteemed (saith the Original) an hundred thousand fighting men, and in the west might doe much, the English being in bad teames with the Bourguignon. But the quiett counse is the best, and both being willing to agree, and accord is soone made. In the end, the King grants the English three score and twelve thousand Crownes present payment: (Paris lent the money, upon promies of restitution by the Feast of All Saints next following.) The marriage of Charles with the eldest daughter of King Edward (both being yet very yong, neither shall it take effect) and for the estate of her house, the Duchy of Guienne, or fifty thousand Crownes yearly, payable in the Tower of London, for nine years following, at the end whereof, he and his wife quietly to enioy the reuenuues of the said Duchy, and the King should remaine discharged of the payment of fifty thousand Crownes to King Edward.

Moreover, the King promised sixtene thousand Crownes pension to some of Edwards fauourites, who had much assisted in this reconciliation: to Hastings two thousand, to Howard, to John Cheney Master of the Horse, to Sellenger, Montgomery, and some others, the remainder. And besides, there was great store of Siluer and Plate distributed among King Edwards seruants: so euery Saint had his candle. These conditions performed, Edward should repasse the Sea, and leaue Howard and the Master of his horse in hostage, vntill he had recovered England: yet not without an careruey of both Kings. This peace should continue nine years, comprehending the Dukes of Bourgonne and Britany, if they pleased. The Bourguignon hearing these newes, halts to returne to the English, followed only with sixtene hundred Horse: At his first arrival he discouers his inward passions by his outward countenance. But he came too late to prevent it. Edward tells him, that hee hath made a truce for nine years, and exhorts him to enter, according to the reueration he had made. Charles replies by fits, and after a reproachfull manner: That Edwards Predecessors Kings of England, had performed many high exploits in France, and with much sweate and toyle had won great reputation. He checketh him that he did not procure the English to passe; for any need hee had, but only to give them occasion to recouer their ancient inheritance. And to make it manifest, that he had no need of their coming; he would not accept of any truce with the King, vntill that Edward had beene three moneths in his owne Country. And hauing thus layd, he returnes towards Luxembour, from whence he came. A braudo of ill digestion to the English and his Councell, but plausible to all the friends of confusion.

But what is become of our Constable? is there no speech of him during this treaty? Now is he more incombred with feare then euer. He knows well, that he hath displeased the king, the English and the Bourguignon, al alike, and fill he apprehends the conclusion at Bouvines. In the meane time he seeks to please all, and sets a good face on it. Edward had freely made offer to the French Ambassadors, to name some Noblemen, that were traitors (said he) to the King and his Crowne, and to proue it by their hand-writings.

The King holds a Councell vpon this matter: some maintaine, that this accusation is fraudulent, and that the English would make his demands the greater with the wracke of anothers honour, as hauing good intelligence in France. But Lewis his judgment was more sharpe, he knew the Bourguignons courtes, he considered the season, that the English had not any one place in their hands, and that the Bourguignon had deceived them. Moreover, he knew well, that the Constable would not giue them any entry: and yet he should be farre imbarqued in the league, the King entertained him with many lenities and kept him in good humour: and the Constable likewise sent often vnto the King, always swimming betwixt two streames, vnderstanding that the treaty betwixt these Kings, grew to some perfection, hee seemed well satisfied, and sends Lewis of Creuile, Gentleman of his house, and John Richer his Secretary, aduising the King, that woyde this threatening foraigne tempest he should procure a truce; and to satisfy the English, it were good to grant them one or two small Townes to winter in. He supposed in doing this, the English should be beholding to him, and rest fully satisfied for the affront at Saint Quintin.

Note alwayes, that Lewis was a wonderfull instrument of diuision, when hee pleaded Contay a prisoner at the defeat of Arras, went and came vpon his faith to the Duke of Bourgongne, to treat a peace. He was by chance in Court at the comming of the two persons. The King hides him in his chamber behind the hangings, to heare and report his master the speeches the Constable and his people held of him. Creuile by the Kings commandement, with aloud voyce, said, that the Constable had sent them to the Duke of Bourgongne, with many instructions, to diuide him from the English; and that they had found the said Duke to farre incensed, as by their perswasions he was not only ready to abandon them, but to charge them in their retreat. Creuile in speaking this, did counterfeit the gesture of a passionate Prince, stamping and swearing, Saint George (the oath of Charles of Bourgongne) saying, that he called the King of England, blancbourne, and the sonne of an archer, whose name he carried: words accompanied with all the dignities that might bee spoken. This moued laughter in the King, who taking pleasure at the repetition thereof, and seeming somewhat deafe, made him to straine his voice in the report. Contay no lesse amazed then the King was pleased, would neuer haue believed it, if he had not heard it.

The Constables treachery.

And although it grieved the King much to dissemble the Constables counsell, to giue some places to the English, yet would hee not discover his discontent to these Deputies, but answered them graciously: I will send to my brother (the Queene and the Constables wife were sisters) and let him vnderstand my minde, hauing cunningly drawne a promise from his Secretary to reueale what did concerne him. And at the same instant hee dispatched Contay to the Duke his master with letters of credit of the Kings owne hand: and somewhat to satisfy the Constable, he giues the English Eu and Saint Vallery, to lodge in during the treaty of peace. In the meane time (oh notable trechery!) behold one of the Constables ordinary trickes; hee sends his confessor to the King of England whilseters of credit, and intreats him earnestly not to trust to the Kings promises, but rather to seize vpon Eu and Saint Vallery, and there to passe some part of the winter: that within two moneths he would lodge him better. Yet he giues him no other security, but much hope, and an offer to lend him fifty thousand Crownes, with many other goodly shewes, to draw him from so profitable an accord. Edward answers, that the truce is concluded, and that he will not alter any thing. That if he had kept his word, he would haue accepted it. Thus our Constable despaires on all sides. The King (foreseeing that the Constable would thrust Edward into ialousie) resolved by his bounty to take away all cause of suspition for the effecting whereof, hee sends Edward three hundred carts laden with the best wine hee could get: and within Amiens (Edward lodging within halfe a league, for confirmation of the truce) hee causeth two long tables to bee set vp at the entry of the towne, furnished with exquisite meates, and all kinds of prouocations to drinke, with men to attend all commers and goers at the table. At euery table where fixe or fixe men of reputation sat

A far and big, the better to encourage the Drinkers: amongst others were the Lords of Craton, Briquebec, Brefme, and Villiers, Gentlemen of a pleasant humour: and wheresoever the English tooke any lodging, they might not spend any thing. This bounty continued three or four dayes; during the which, if Lewis had meant treacherously, hee had good meanes, they entering into Amiens confusedly, to the number of nine thousand, for of this great multitude, some did sing, and some slept, ouercome with wine and drowsinesse. But contrariwise, he committed the guard of the gate to English archers, whom Edward (at Lewis his request) had sent, to take in, and put out whom they pleased. It was then concluded, to appoint a place for an enteruiew of these two Kings. It is done with lesse confusion and hazard in a small place. Piquiny vpon Somme was held conuenient: an ancient Prophesie which the English obserued, described this very place. To this effect they build vpon the bridge two pentises of wood, the one for Lewis, the other for Edward, either of them capable of ten or twelue men. Betwixt both was a partition, with grates to put through ones armes, going ouerthwart the bridge, that no man might goe from the one to the other. Lewis made his profit offore-past edvents: hee knew that if the barre at Montereau had had no more passage then this, John Duke of Bourgongne had not ended his dayes so lamentably, in the narrow bounds thereof. The 28 of August Lewis comes first to the barre, accompanied with John duke of Bourbon, the Cardinall his brother, and followed onely with about 800 men at armes. Edward comes after, hauing with him the Duke of Clarence his brother, the Earle of Northumberland, his Chamberlain Hastings, his Chancellor, and others: and behinde him all his army in battell. Either King had twelue men about him, foure of the which went from one part to another, to search if there were nothing practised to the preiudice of their matters. They embrace each other through the grate, and sweare vpon the holy Bible, to obserue the Articles agreed vpon. The oath taken, Lewis mingling his serious discourse with some mirth, inuites Edward to come to Paris, that hee would feast him with the Ladies, and giue him the Cardinall of Bourbon for his Confessor, (a pleasant man and off free life) who willingly would giue him absolution, if happily he should siane in that case. Then they conferte together a while without any witnesses. And vpon the Kings demand, whether the Duke of Bourgongne would not accept of the truce, (men take an oxe by the horne, and a man by his word, as with the like policie the Duke of Bourgongne might haue bene surprized at his departure from Liege.) Edward answered, that he might doe as he pleased, I will summon him againe (saith he) if he will not hearken to it, I will referre my selfe to you two. This accord being made, Lewis begins to play vpon another string, and makes the like demand touching the Duke of Britany, for whom he chiefly made the motion. But he findes the English resolute in his protection, as hauing found no friend so kind in his affliction. Lewis increased, and with a wonderfull courtesie takes leave of the King of England, contents all his followers with some kinde words, and giues presents to some priuate Noblemen, the Heralds and Trumpets, who to shew their thankful minds, beganne to cry, A largeesse for the most noble and mighty French King: a largeesse, a largeesse. He had alwaies made it manifest, that he was exceeding suspicious, and that from an antecedent hee could cunningly draw a good consequence. He is no sooner on his way to Amiens, but hee studies of Edward facility to hearken to the going to Paris: that he was a very goodly Prince, and of an amorous complexion, and that some nice Parisian might stay him longer then his estate required, or at the least draw him to passe the sea another time: that his Predecessors had loued Paris and Normandy but too well: He therefore desires to see their backs, and must by some meanes with-draw him from this humour, wishing rather to haue him his good brother and friend beyond the seas, then here. The necessity which forced the King against the Bourguignon, serued for an excuse.

An enteruiew of the Kings.

B Moreover, the King was grieved, to see the English so resolute to defend the Britons quarrell: hee would gladly haue obtained that freedome, to make warre in Britany, the which hee wonderfully affected, and made a second motion vnto him by Bouchage and S. Pierre, who returned with this answer; That whosoever doth attempt (saith hee) against the Duke of Britany, I will passe the seas in person, and succour him. So hee was no more importuned. Edward had an especial cause to entertaine the loue of the duke of Britany, for at the defeat of Henry King of England, as wee haue heard, Henry Earle of Hereford, and nextest kinsman to the said Henry, after the death of his sonne the Prince of Wales,

Wales saued himselfe with his Vncle the Earle of Pembroke, and hauing entred a barke in haste, they were with tempest driuen vpon the coast of Britany, and there forced to take land, where they were seized on, and led with sure guard to Vannes. A very happy chance for the Duke, for while he holds this goodly gage, he was assured to command the forces of England: but very vnhappy for the Earle, for if he might haue landed in France, Lewis without doubt (to crosse Edward) would haue laboured to restore him. This truce did wonderfully displease some of Edwards household seruants: Lewis of Bretrailles among the rest, a Gentleman of Gascony, was greatly discontented, giuing out, that the King his Master hauing in person wonne nine battels, had gotten more dishonor by the voluntary losse of this tenth, (which was in a manner gotten) then he had purchased honour in the former nine. That the French might with reason laugh at Edwards credulous facility, Lewis aduertised by the Lord of Argenton, of this Gascons free discourte, resolues to stop his mouth, to the end he should not hereafter spend his tongue to the preiudice of this Estate: He sends for him, and makes him dine with him, offers him great aduancement, so as he will serue him. Vpon his refusal, he giues him a thousand Crownes presently, and promisseth to doe good for his brethren that remained in France: binding him to maintaine (as much as in him did lye) the friendship growing betwixt these two crownes. Bretrailles did not iudge amisse. Our Lewis had sometime a more liberrall tongue then was conuenient, and feared much, lest some words had passed him, whereby the English might discover that hee mocked him: and so it chanced, yet behold how hee couered it. The day after this enter-view, being in his Cabinet, hee fell to iest of the wines and other presents he had sent to the English. But hee discovered not a Gascoyne Merchant dwelling in England, who by chance was crept in to obtaine a licence of the king for the transporting of certaine pipes of wine, freed from impost. This Merchant might talke, hee must therefore be won, and stayed in France, vnder some apparent pretext. The King sent the Lord of Argenton to walke with him, aduanceth him to a good office in the towne where he was borne, he giues him a thousand Franks presently to transport his family, the transport of wines he required, and a man to condu& him to Boudeaux: but all vpon condition that not he, but his brother, should make the voyage into England. Thus the King made amends for his rash speech.

Edward is now vnder saile, he was a new Conqueror, his presence was therefore more needfull in England: he did neuer much affect the voyage. Two principall reasons drew him into the action. The one was, all his subjects gaped after the possession of this crown, did sollicite him, and the Bourguignon prest him. Another was, he might referre a good part of the money that should be raised for this voyage (for the Kings of England leaue nothing about their reuennues, but for the warres of France.) But see the policy of Edward: he had of purpose brought with him ten or twelue of the chiefe Bourgeses of the City, whose credit was great with the commons, and who had with all care procured this tax. These men were soone weary with this military toile, presuming that at the first ariual, a profitable battell should decide the quarrell. And to make them taste more feelingly the sweetnesse of peace, from the sharpnesse of warre, Edward doth sometimes trouble their heads with doubts, sometimes with feares, to keep them from murmuring at his returne into England. On the other side, he loued his pleasures, and was of a complexion not able to endure the trauels requisite for the Conquest of this Realme: and although the King was overcharged with enemies, yet had hee provided well for his defence. But see the most vrgent reason of Edwards retreat. The performance he desired of the mariage betwixt the Dauphin, and his daughter. A mariage which made him dissemble many things, whereof Lewis will make his profit. To conclude, as they which haue bene deceived in their friendship, hate without dissembling, Edward before hee parted from Calais, sent the King those two letters of credit, which the Constable had writte vnto him, with all other verball assurances which he had giuen him. Sufficient testimonies to accuse & conuince him of these crimes, whereby he shall be hereafter charged. Lets now reconcile the dukes of Bourgongne, and Britany with the King. Contay was now returned from the Duke of Bourgongne, the day of the enter-view, and had found his master in a good humour, when as the English were returned. A men of warre, that one of the English hostages, whom the King had led with him, tooke occasion to say, that if the Duke of Bourgongne had bene followed with many such men when he came to salute King Edward, peraduenture they had not made a peace. The Visconte of Narbonne answered: That the Duke wanted no such men, and that hee had sent them to refresh themselves, but fixe hundred pipes of Wine, and a pension which the King gave them, made them hast home to their Country.

The English moued herewith; it is as every mans said (replies he) that you would dectine us. Doe you call the money the King giues vs a pension? It is a tribute: and by Saint George you may talke so much, as we will returne againe. This quarrell staid their proceeding: neither did they preuaile any more the second time, when as the King appointed Tanneguy of Chastel, and the Chanceller Oriole to heare the said Ambassadors at Veruins: but the third assembly which was in the Kings Chamber, made a full conclusion: and in truth Bretray had reason to say one day to the King, that his horse was well laden when he was on him, for that he caried all his Council with him: for indeed hee did effect more in his presence, then all his Ambassadors together, where there was a truce accorded for nine years, according to the other, but by reason of the oath which Charles of Bourgongne had sworne to Edward in his choller, it might not be published vntill the twentieth of October following.

Edward (discontented that the Duke of Bourgongne would treat apart) sends Montgomery (a Knight very inward with him) to the King to Veruins, he requires two things, the one, that he would take no other truce with the Duke then that which he had made: the other that he would not suffer Saint Quintin to be yelded vnto him: and if hee would continue the warre against the said Duke, he would returne the next spring, and ioyne his forces with the Kings, so as he would recompence him for the losse he should sustaine by the customes of Woolle at Calais, which would be of no value, (being estimated at fifty thousand Crownes) and pay halfe his Army.

The King to satisfie Edward, answers, that it is the same truce they had made together, and for the same terme; but the Duke would haue letters apart: hee thanks him for his good offers, and returnes him home his Ambassador and hostages. Lewis had lately learned, that the French and the English do easily quarrell when they are together, and a small matter would reconcile them with the Bourguignons. As for the Britton, the King could not well digest the answer which Edward had made to Bouchage and Saint Pierre, whereby he easily discovered the strict alliance betwixt them: but seeing he could not diuide them, being in the Abbey of Victory neere to Senlis, where he had a priuate deuotion, the peace was absolutely confirmed, whereby the King renounced all rights pretended by him to the Duchy of Britany, refering the souerainty and homage according to the ancient custome. He promised to keepe the Dukes person in safety, and to maintaine his priuiledges, and prerogatives, without forcing him to follow him out of his Duchy: but with his owne good liking: and moreover, he should cause to be giuen vnto the Duke of Britany, the hands and seals of all the Princes of his blood, and of the Noblemen of the realme, both spirituall and temporall, with reuocation of all alliances, or former promises, and restitutions, to be made, of all things taken during the warre. The patent hath the same date with that of the Duke of Bourgongne.

Lets now bring the Constable into open view, to play the last act of his Tragedy: finding that all these shifts and deuices, could not breake the reconciliation of the two Kings, the next day after their enteruiew, he writes very humbly to the King, by a seruant of his named Rapine: That hee was well informed how his enemies laboured to bring him in disgrace, charging him with many things whereof hee had shewed contrary effects: for that during all the fore-past confusions, hee had faithfully kept all these places which his Majesty had committed vnto him, and beate backe the enemy whensoever hee presented himselfe. And to purchase some credit, he offers to deale with the Duke of Bourgongne, who if the King please, shall helpe to defeat Edward and all his army. Lewis dissembles, and writes to the Constable, what was concluded the day before, that at this time hee was busied with many affaires, and had need of such a head as his. A captious word, but well vnderstood by Rapine, who takes it for a beginning of fauour for his Master. But alas, how easily doth man deceit himselfe in his imaginations: and what can a perplexed iudice pronounce, but trouble and confusion: the truce is no sooner confirmed with the estate.

Bourguignon, but the conclusion of Bouvines is renewed, whereof we haue made mention. Now this poore Constable knows not to whom to flee.

And as every man runnes as far as he can from an imminent shipwrack, his best friends, his most affectionate seruants, and his most confident souldiers abandon him. What shall he then doe? whom shall he implore? what Sanctuary? what succours? he knows well he hath equally displeased, Lewis, Edward and Charles; his lands are on all sides inuolued by his enemies. He is too farre from any safe retreat. He holds strong places, yea almost impregnable: but who shall defend them? he inioyes great treasure, but they violently hunt after it.

What refuge shall he choofe? shall he goe to the King? but by what meanes shall hee purchase grace? he is too farre incensed, and is seized of the letters which the Constable had written to the King of England, and the Dukes of Bourbon and Bourgongne. May he rely vpon Lewis his word? but he would not sweare vpon the crosse of Saint Lau. Shall he passe the seas? he gaue Edward too vnkind welcome nere Saint Quintin. Shall hee call himselfe into Charles of Bourgongnes armes? but he hath spoyled his Country of Hainault, he would haue forced him to marry his daughter with the Duke of Guicenne deposed, and hath often treacherously deceived him; being aduanced by his meanes to that great dignity of Constable.

The Constable
in a desperate estate.

To conclude, he alone hath more then all others maintayned these Princes in hatred, so as what party soeuer he takes, he is vndone. Yet must he needs vnmaske himselfe and flee to one, for what meanes hath he to warrant himselfe alone against so mighty enemies which shall he choofe? poore soule! beaten with distrust, feare and despair, for yielding to the one he incensed the other. Moreover, there is lesse danger for him to be besieged by two, then by one alone, being impossible for two armies to accord long together: and contrariwise, being charged but by one, there is some hope to make his peace. Sometimes hee resolves to flee into Germany, and to buy a place there, vntill he be reconciled to the one: sometimes to keep his strong Castle of Han, the which he had well fortified to serue his need. But he is so amazed as he dares not discouer himselfe to those few seruants that are left him. Moreover, they are all subiects to some one of these Princes. Yet he must resolve: and better is it to fall once, then stagger alwayes.

But they haue both ioyntly conspired his death, he is well informed thereof, and hath sene a copy of their mutual feales. Yet when once he hath passed his word, he will make a conscience to breake it. But there is no faith in the Court of France: hee hath offended the King too much, and hath too great aduersaries, and no man might safely loue him whom Lewis hated. The Duke of Bourgongne is more moderate, more easie to pacify, and if he giue his faith, he will be asham'd to deliuer him, who had thrust himselfe vnder his protection. He gaped after Saint Quintin, he must yeeld it vp vnto him, and redeeme his head with the price of this good place. He stands firme in this resolution, and beseecheth Charles to lend him a safe conduct, to go and treat with him of matters concerning his estate and person. At the first Charles makes some difficulty, but in the end hee thinks he may well dispense with his conscience for Saint Quintin.

The Constable
yeilds to the Bourgongne.

So the Constable accompanied onely with fifteene or twenty horse, goes towards Mons, in Hainault, to Esmeritz great Bayliffe of Hainault, the dearest of his friends, according newes from the Duke of Bourgongne, who made warre in Lorraine vpon the desse we haue spoken of. The Foxe is now out of his earth. It must be foreseene, that this yielding reconcile not the Constable to the Duke. The King well informed what troopes were in Saint Quintin, and of the Inhabitants affection, hasteth therewith with fifteen or eight hundred horse. They meet him with their keyes: the quarters are ordered, all his forces enter, and he follows. And to take from the Bourgongne all hope to recouer Saint Quintin by the Constables meanes, he giues him aduice to the taking thereof: for although in the diuision made at Bouvines of the Constables places, this fell to the Duke, yet would not the King that he should make his peace with the Bourgongne by the deliuey thereof.

Charles aduertised hereof, sends to the great Bayliffe, that he should guard Mons well, that the Constable goe not forth, and that hee should appoint him his lodging for a prison. Here the Bayliffe preferres obedience to his master, before the Constables loue. Lewis aduertised of the Constables detraction, requires the Duke of Bourgongne by

Bouchage,

The Constable deliuered to the King.

A Bouchage, and Saint-Pierre, either to deliuer him, or to performe the conuention. Hee promisheth to doe it, and causeth him to be caried with a sure guard to Peronne. Hee had now taken diuers places in Lorraine and Barrois, and did batter Nancy, whereof hee desired to see issue, for the deliuey or retayning of the Constable, so as with this deligne, in stead of eight dayes concluded on at Bouvines, he lets passe a moneth and more. But the Kings great instance, and his army which lay houerling in Champagne, as ready to succour the Lorraine, and to crosse the Bourgongne in that enterprise, the conquest whereof he greedily pursued, to vnite his Territories, and to passe freely from Luxembourgin to Bourgongne, (for inioying this Duchy, he came from Holland vnto the Confinnes of the Diocesse of Lion, vpon his owne land) made Charles to lend Himbertcourt, and the Chancellor Hugonnet, (both great enemies to the Constable) to deliuer him at an appointed day, to such as the King should send. Charles supposed to haue wonne Nancy by that day, but he was deceived in the time. And in truth they had no sooner left him, but a countermand comes from the Duke, after the taking of Nancy, but too late.

The prefixed day being come, they deliuer the Constable at the gates of Perronne, into the hands of the bastard of Bourbon, Admirall of France; Bouchage, Saint Pierre, Crispian, and others: who led him prisoner to the Bastile at Paris; the said Admirall charging the Chancellor, first President, and other Counsellors of the Parliament being there present, in the Kings name, to make a speedy triall of him, vpon his letters written to the King of England, and the Dukes of Bourbon, and Bourgongne. So by iudgement of the Court, giuen by the President Popincourt, he was beheaded at the Greue, the 19 of December, and by an especiall grace was buried at the Gray-Fryers in Paris. A pittifull spectacle, to see so great a personage laid vpon a scaffold, allied to the houses of France, England, Bourgongne, Sauoy, and many other great personages, the chiefe Officer of this Crowne, mighty in lands, in treasure and in friends, abandoned of his friends, his goods confiscated, degraded of his Offices, and finally to serue as a spectacle to the whole world.

beheaded.

He was witty, valiant, and of great experience: but in his latter yeares bereaued of the grace of God. Let vs apprehend this Oracle: It is a terrible thing to fall into the hands of the liuing God. The pit he had digged for another, must swallow him vp. He had with all his force laboured to maintaine these two Princes in hatred and mutuall diffention, to subist in the midst of their partialities. He had often and impudently lied vnto them, and being both very reuengefull, it was impossible to auoide their snares. But who can warrant the Duke of Bourgongne from the law Cornelia? must his cruell couetousnesse force him to giue security to this poore Lord, to thrust him into an vndoubted ruine. Fourscore thousand Crownes in mouables, and threescore thousand Crownes in ready money which he got by his spoiles, were they valuable to the falsifying of his conscience? God leaues nothing vapunished, and we shall learne hereafter, that this disloyall act in him was the iust ruine of his house: a house for a hundred yeares flourishing in all perfections of felicity, which hereafter shall runne headlong to a strange Catastrophe: and by the means of a young and vnexperienced enemy, weak in regard of the Bourgongnes great and redoubted power: God resists the high minded, and chooseth contemptible things to ruine and confound the proud. Let vs with one breath, see the declining and overthrow of this house of Bourgongne.

Cornelia of Bourgongne breaks, his oath with the Constable afflicting the side of a King.

The violent ambition of Charles, had (as we haue heard before) armed him with a boyling desire to be a King; but Frederic the third earned it. From that time he still plotted to geth this quality. René (before Earle of Vaudemont, sonne to Ferris of Lorraine, and of Yoiland, daughter to René King of Sicilia, and Duke of Anjou, and of the onely daughter of the Duke of Lorraine, eldest brother to John Earle of Vaudemont, Father to the said Ferris, and now Duke of Lorraine) had defied him before Nuz, grieved with the Bourgongnes outrages. This is a good expedient to purchase this pretended royalty. Lorraine made him a free passage, to vnite his countries, and moreover, by the conquest of this Duchie, he should qualifie himselfe King of Sicilia, and Ierusalem, the hereditary title of this house. This vent of vaine-glory transports Charles into Lorraine: and for pretext of a quarrell, he pretends a great summe of money to be due vnto him by René: predecessor: for non-payment whereof (after the taking of many places) he camps before Nancy, besiegeth it, batters it, but takes it not so soone as hee presumed, being valiantly defended beyond his expectation. The King also vnder-hand fauoured this young Duke,

Duke, procuring him secretly the alliance of the Suiffes, and the Imperiall Townes of Alsatia.
